Tom Reed Among His Neighbors

THE LESS KNOWN BUT BETTER LOVED REED OF PRIVATE LIFE. HIS DEVOTION TO HIS CLUB AND HIS OLD CRONIES. HIS LOVE OF A LAUGH AND A JOKE

By HOLMAN F. DAY

OF SO dominant a spirit, his close friends can hardly yet say "was" when they speak of Reed.

Only the present tense can be vivid enough for his portrayal here.

Now, then, here comes Tom Reed!

The scene is Portland, Maine, corner of Deering and High Streets, nine o' the morning of a Congressional vacation. Reed is back at his home. Around the corner he sweeps, bound downtown from his residence. A looming sort of a man! His gait is a combination of pudgy roll and lurching stride, terminating in a jolting shrug of the body every time his heel meets the sidewalk. His shoulders swing. His head—that round knob of a head—is slightly bent forward and oscillates a little. His eyes, black and round as beads, stare straight ahead. This one and that of the chance passers touch hat or bow respectfully. But Reed gives no sign that he has noticed. He is thinking of something this morning and his thoughts are too valuable to be broken in upon by casual greetings of constituents, loyal though such adherents be. He scorns fence-building. Once or twice he grunts in answer to some especially sweeping obeisance or when the saluter is a political lieutenant. But most of the throng he doesn't see—that is to say, he sees, perhaps, but does not greet. 'Twould be a bold citizen indeed who would step in front of this fleshly tower and grope for a handshake.

"When the Falmouth town pump was retired at a good old age I was nominated to succeed it, but I have never qualified," Reed said once when pressed to allow a handshaking levee.

And now the first citizen of Portland steers his abdomen around the corner into the more populous thoroughfare of Congress Street. Every eye is lifted to the serene visage towering above. The visage betrays no sign that the constant scrutiny of the throng is even noted. Nearly every pedestrian turns to cast a look at the broad back swaying down the street. The first citizen doesn't claim more than his share of the sidewalk, but people appear to instinctively duck away from his path, and so he goes straight on through the busy stream of travel, silent, impassive, ponderous, a human frigate among shallops.

As a matter of fact, such was Tom Reed as a great majority of his Portland neighbors knew him. Every one in the city spoke of him as "Tom," but only a choice few spoke out that "Tom" to him. He was never the man to encourage general or promiscuous familiarity. He knew many hundreds of Portland's thousands, but the Yankee habit of "How-dy-ing" every one along the street entailed too much bother to suit the Reed régime. If any one wanted to "How-dy" him full privileges were extended, but Mr. Reed didn't "How-dy" back, and his serene demeanor as he passed showed that the greeting was no more than a fly buzz in his ear.

Such was Tom Reed to the mob in Portland.

But Tom Reed to his friends—the staunch little coterie that he affected? Well!

Behold away down the street that gray-haired business man bobbing along! You need only half an eye to see that he isn't a statesman and would scarcely be picked out as a running mate for statesmen. You could safely wager that a tariff discussion would bore him. And that mouth with the corners turned up so cheerily wouldn't discourse about parliamentary law even at the gun muzzle.

He is still chuckling over a new story that another old boy has just been telling. He spies Reed—the looming, solemn-visaged, meditative, self-absorbed Reed trudging down upon him.

"Hello, there's Tom! Hey, Tom! Tom will like this. Hi, there, Tom!"

Those nearest in the passing mob gaze around in astonishment at the call. There in a doorway where he has darted for refuge is posted the little man. His face is all alight with cheeriness and chuckles. His finger is crooked and vibrating in invitation. And who is he calling to his covert? Why, "Czar" Reed, Speaker of the National House of Representatives. And Reed? He sees at last on his way downtown a crony—one of the Old Guard of the Cumberland Club of Portland. His saturnine countenance begins to pucker at the eyes. The upper lip protrudes like a scoop. A smile takes rise in the corrugations under his chin and dodges wrinkles and crisscrosses up to the brow in radiating streams, then comes cascading down over the face in an effulgence of good humor. And out of the midst of the smile comes that drawling voice like the soft note of a cornet—or the lower tone of a clarinet—"Why, har-r-r-lo, Ben—har-r-r-wye, ye?"

And into the doorway goes the big man, and the little man nudgingly tells his story and the ripples of the Reed chuckles chase each other to the beach of appreciation, avant couriers of the great wave of mirth that comes roaring at the story's nub.

Then, minding not the stares and smiles of the passers, Reed tells a story himself, pudging a stubby finger into the little man's waistcoat and shouting an occasional peal of laughter out from under that humorously protruding upper lip.

And now, perhaps, you may be able to grasp the two sorts of estimation in which Reed was held at his old home in Portland. To most of the populace he seemed a cold, supercilious, pachydermatous sort of a man, with a grunt instead of a greeting, and more often masking himself behind entire obliviousness of any one's presence.

It was a Maine newspaper man who, after every persevering attempt to interview Reed for years had met rebuff, was asked by a stranger, "What do you consider Mr. Reed's chief personal characteristic?"

"Bristles!" snorted the newspaper man.

But at home in the Cumberland Club, in the quaint tiled room at the rear of the building, with a cigar cocked comfortably between his inimitably humorous lips, a very small sup of rare old brandy or some mild compound of gin and seltzer at his elbow, Reed was more thoroughly himself, jovial and generous, than anywhere else in the world. It is a fact that next to his own home he loved his corner in the Cumberland Club best.

"By Godfrey, boys!" he used to say, "this is where the old turtle can shed his shell."

Mr. Reed was naturally suspicious of the general run of mankind. His abiding fear was that he would be misquoted and misrepresented. He realized the vitality of "first stories." He was never ashamed of his blunt opinions nor afraid to declare them, but that they should appear in public garbled by some inefficient reporter or warped by the misquotation of an eavesdropper wrung his soul. When in company in Washington or other places he was pretty likely to keep mum on any topic that was important.

If any one led up to a question of this sort his little black eyes would twinkle or snap, and he would either dismiss the thing by a bland stare or else fire a shaft of wit that washed all away in a flood of laughter. The writer was sent by a Maine paper to interview Mr. Reed. It was the first time I had ever spoken to him. I stated my errand. He looked at me a long time and a quizzical smile commenced to play over his face. "Now, frankly," he drawled in the most cheerful way, "frankly"—visions of an interview at least a column long rose at this apparently auspicious opening; "frankly," he repeated, "I will not tell the Blanktown Journal what I think of this matter because the Blanktown Journal might—now I don't say that it would, but I say it might—go off and tell some one else, and that wouldn't be nice, you know." And he beamed as though he had disclosed the innermost secrets of his soul.

The habitués of the Cumberland Club, one hundred matter-of-fact business and professional old neighbors, did not pry into Reed's motives, plans or reasons. They met him simply as "Tom," called him Tom and treated him as merely another like themselves. And Reed came back at them in kind. He dropped all his habitual reserve and suspicion of betrayal when he handed his overcoat to the Cumberland Club's cloak-room boy. He discussed any matter that was brought up and did so with entire candor. His old chums of the club did not sit about him like devotees around an oracle—far from it! The great sport of the club was to "bait Tom." He was in for unmerciful chaffing whenever he entered into argument. Reed was always at his best when assailed by numbers and fighting single-handed, and the fun-loving members of the Cumberland Club knew it.

So he would sit squeezed between his chair arms in his corner of the tiled room, his broad hands spread upon his knees, taking all the chaff from the chattering circle and nipping back with the Reed vigor that made him feared by every antagonist. He spared no one when he saw the opportunity to score. If any one entered the skirmish that one needed to be willing to take Reed's returns and smile.

The Cumberland Club members will always place first in their memories of their old friend and neighbor the picture of him there in the sanctity of the friendly circle, where Reed could be himself after all his Washington repression and weary battles. Happiness and ease and deep content radiated from his broad smile and rippled in his laugh. He would lead along some argumentative friend step by step and those sitting about "could see it coming" with delighted anticipation. Then when the unsuspecting one was at last in full range, bang! went both of the Reed barrels and down would go the adversary with the Reed roar leading all the rest of the laughter.

Unless one has seen Mr. Reed and knows the piquant flavor of his drawl and the mellow quality of his tone, the unutterably droll cast of his countenance when he was mirthful and the quickness with which he replied, all stories of his repartee are necessarily lacking in spirit. Then, too, there were the occasions and the persons involved—one must be able to appreciate what they stood for.

One of Mr. Reed's earliest political supporters at last turned against him and became a demagogue of a violent type, full of cuffs, crotchets, new doctrines and diatribes. Reed was standing before his old law office on Exchange Street one day with a few friends. Down the street came stumping the gray-haired reformer, his hands behind his back and his head bowed in theatrical style. Every now and then he would throw up his chin in reflective fashion.

"Look there, fellows," drawled Reed. "There comes old Smith, and he thinks he is thinking."

Smith joined the group with some uneasiness apparent in his manner, for he had just written an article excoriating Reed as "a hog" because he had resigned from Congress and had not taken the trouble in his letter to thank his faithful constituents for their loyal support all through his career. No Portland paper would publish that article, by the way, and Smith had it printed on sheets and circulated it at his own expense. It fell very flat. If Tom Reed had written any gushing sort of a valedictory his constituents would have thought that their reticent god was losing his mind.

"Har-r-r-de-do-o-o, Smith!" cried Reed cheerfully, and he grasped the rather coy hand of the new arrival. "I have known Smith, here, for two thousand years, fellows," he continued, "and, by Godfrey! he's a fine piece of old pottery. But I have never dared to handle him very roughly on account of the crack in his cover."

One day Hon. William Widgery Thomas, of Portland, now minister to Sweden, had a spicy taste of Reed's jocose familiarity with old neighbors. Mr. Thomas rushed up to Reed on the street and cried, "Say, Tom, what do you think of that bear story I wrote for the last Atlantic Monthly?"

"I think it is a da-a-amned lie!" bellowed Reed, to the immense astonishment of a dozen citizens who were passing at the time.

Of the most pompous and self-conceited lawyer in Portland Reed said one day, jabbing his finger at the figure approaching up the sidewalk, "Have you ever noticed how narrow 'Squire So-and-so makes the street look?"

The Simplicity of His Personal Habits

Reed's old friends speak admiringly of the absolute simplicity of his tastes. He and his wife entertained only to the extent of welcoming a few friends for an evening. He hated the ordinary Portland banquet, frankly said so, and could only occasionally be coaxed to attend one. But he really liked to go with the members of the Cumberland Bar on their annual outing and dinner. Many of the lawyers used to sit with him before the big open fire in Manasseh Smith's law office in Portland in the old times and talk tariff. The old lawyers say that in those days Reed found the tariff such a puzzling problem that he couldn't get it through his head. By the way, though Reed made a good city solicitor and bright State attorney-general, he wasn't a good jury lawyer. He almost always talked to the ordinary jury with a sort of sarcastic contempt.

Mr. Reed loved outdoor rambles in the woods and enjoyed boating, but he never had any use for a horse.

His cottage at Pine Point, a few miles from Portland, was his haven of refuge when even the chums of the Cumberland Club failed to strike the right chord in his peculiar nature. Reed was a man who could have a magnificent time all by himself, and very often he indulged himself in this diversion. He didn't consider that he was really settled into the atmosphere of Pine Point until he had dug out and put on a certain old straw hat and a torn, checkered coat. Then, as he said, he felt "as though his radiant personality sort of jibed with Pine Point Nature in her joyous moods."

He used to like to go out and rummage the gullies and slopes of the near-by woods after mushrooms. Alone or with a cottage neighbor he would roam for miles inshore, resting under trees and sprawled on his back like a great boy. Sometimes he was all for talk. At other times he would not speak to his companion for hours. He would come out of a reverie with a peculiar little gasp and grunt as though he had said to his mind, "Now that is settled and we'll go on with something else."

The only canoe he was ever in was owned by Mr. Ira Crocker, his neighbor at Pine Point. The craft was comfortably broad of beam, and after Mr. Reed had inspected it with much doubt and suspicion he finally allowed himself to be assisted in and a start was made. At one point the stream that they sailed made a sharp turn and there was quick water. Mr. Reed sat in the bottom of the canoe, his hands nervously grasping the sides and his broad face wrinkled with a look of great apprehension.

"Hold tight, Tom! Don't rock the boat in this swift water," said Crocker.

"Ira," hissed the statesman without turning his head, so fearful was he of destroying equilibrium, "you have insulted me. You are insinuating that I am a da-a-amned fo-o-ol!"

Another amusement that Mr. Reed relished was cunner fishing. He stipulated always that some one else should row the boat and that he should be allowed to occupy the stern seat, so that "he might compose his lissome shape in more striking lines of symmetry and comfort."

On one occasion he and Mr. Crocker and the latter's son Harry were fishing from an anchored boat. The others were hauling in good ones, but Mr. Reed in the stern was catching only an occasional cunner about as long as his stubby finger. At last he drawled, "Harry, I wish you'd let out that anchor rope and drop me down somewhere out of the neighborhood of this nursery I am in just now."

When Reed First Rode a Wheel

It was Harry Crocker's bicycle, though, that brought the Czar down from his proud estate. One day the young man left his wheel beside the cottage. It was during the days of the bicycle craze, and Mr. Reed confided to Mr. Crocker as they sat there that he wanted to buy a bicycle, and would do so had he any idea that he ever could learn to ride.

"Why don't you try Harry's there?" advised his neighbor.

"It wouldn't hold up this superior example of the human form divine," objected the Speaker.

"Harry weighs one hundred and eighty-five and the wheel is strong. Get on!" persisted Crocker.

Mr. Reed took a careful look around the landscape to see if any observers were in sight. The field was clear—and so was the coast—not a boat in view along the beach. The hard sand sloped to the sea and at the top of the gentle declivity Mr. Reed mounted palpitatingly. Mr. Crocker held up the bicycle. When Reed had groped his feet to the pedals the neighbor pushed him along gently. Down the slope the bicycle sped easily. Crocker held on.

"Are you hanging on to that seat, Ira?" Reed asked solicitously.

"Sure!"

"Oh, this bicycling!" chortled the Speaker. "Why, it's easier than counting quorums. I have always admired myself, Ira, but now I bow before my talent. I can—say, Ira, you still have a good grip of that seat, haven't you?"

"You are all right!" But Mr. Crocker had let his hold go in order to give the rider a run for his money. Reed detected that the voice was a bit too far behind.

"By Godfrey mighty, you're lying, Crocker!" he yelled, and at the same time snapped his head around to see. At that instant he cramped the handle-bar and down he went, a mighty foot through each wheel, and shouting maledictions on the recreant Ira. The wreck? Well, the repairer gingerly took in hand the ancient Roman S represented by the twisted frame and wheels, and compassionately asked if the bicyclist also had been hit by the cannon-ball. He thought that some wheelman had run afoul of the practice guns at Fort Preble.

Mr. Reed played golf a few times in his life, but he didn't care much about the game. He preferred a sport like deep-sea fishing, and delighted in wearing oilskins on a trip and an old Scotch cap with the peak rakishly over one ear.

Then once on a time he took up the photography fad. He insisted on developing his own pictures, "and," relates one of his neighbors, "the results pictured things that were like nothing in the heavens above nor the earth beneath. Talk about double exposure and halation and twisted focus and double-jointed scenery and undertime and overtime—why, Tom Reed's pictures looked as though he had created and then photographed a new world. But Tom exhibited those pictures as proudly as though they were triumphs of art.

"One night my wife and I called on the Reeds. We overheard Mrs. Reed say to her daughter in the dining-room, 'Kittie, won't you hunt up some plates for the cake? Your father has photographs soaking in all the plates I can find here.'"

O' winters Mr. Reed occasionally joined little poker parties that met about his neighborhood at the smoking-rooms of his close friends. He was usually the life of the party, always losing and jesting about his ill luck. One evening a jackpot had been "fatted" several times, and Mr. Reed having nothing in his own hand worth "staying to" dropped his cards and proceeded to give very audible advice to his neighbor.

"Now, don't you daub in here, Tom," objected a player. "You're out of it."

Reed surveyed the speaker with whimsical distress. "You're like an undertaker," said he, "who would refuse to let one of the mourners look at the remains."

Whatever Reed was to the world, to his old comrades in Portland he was simple, unaffected, jovial "Tom."

"Oh, the Republican managers knew too much to allow Reed to be nominated for the Presidency," says a Portland detractor who was not in the circle of his intimates. "When it came to appointments he would have paralyzed the nation. Bill Smith of the Cumberland Club would have been Postmaster-General, Joe Jones of the Cumberland Club would have been sent as Ambassador to England, and Tom would have lined up the rest of 'em for anything they wanted."

One of Mr. Reed's unfailing sources of innocent enjoyment was to poke fun at the late Congressman Dingley. Reed knew that his mischief plagued the serious, matter-of-fact, practical chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. When he could evoke one of those well-remembered sniffs of disgust from the fretted Dingley, Reed retired, blissful.

One day the writer of this sketch, then employed by the Lewiston Journal, Congressman Dingley's newspaper, was in conversation in Mr. Reed's Portland law offices with the Speaker's former partner, Mr. Seiders. Mr. Reed sent for me to come into his private room, stating that he wished to inquire about his colleague. Reed was squared behind his broad desk like an ocean liner moored to a jetty. After satisfying himself concerning the Congressman's summer plans the Speaker leaned back and with that familiar outshoot of his upper lip asked:

How He Worried the Conscientious Dingley

"Do you and the rest of the devoted young men of the Lewiston Journal office realize that you are working for an aw-w-wfully goo-ud ma-a-an?"

"I think we understand it."

"But probably you don't fully realize how transcendentally goo-ud a man he is. Only such a graceless sinner as I am can realize it all. You can't comprehend all his goo-udness, you know. Why, when his constituents from Ja-a-ay Bridge and East Pe-e-eru and those other teeming municipalities of his district come to Washington they reverently follow him about the streets and down Pennsylvania Avenue, not daring to lift their eyes above the symmetrical curves of his classic and Apollo-like calves.

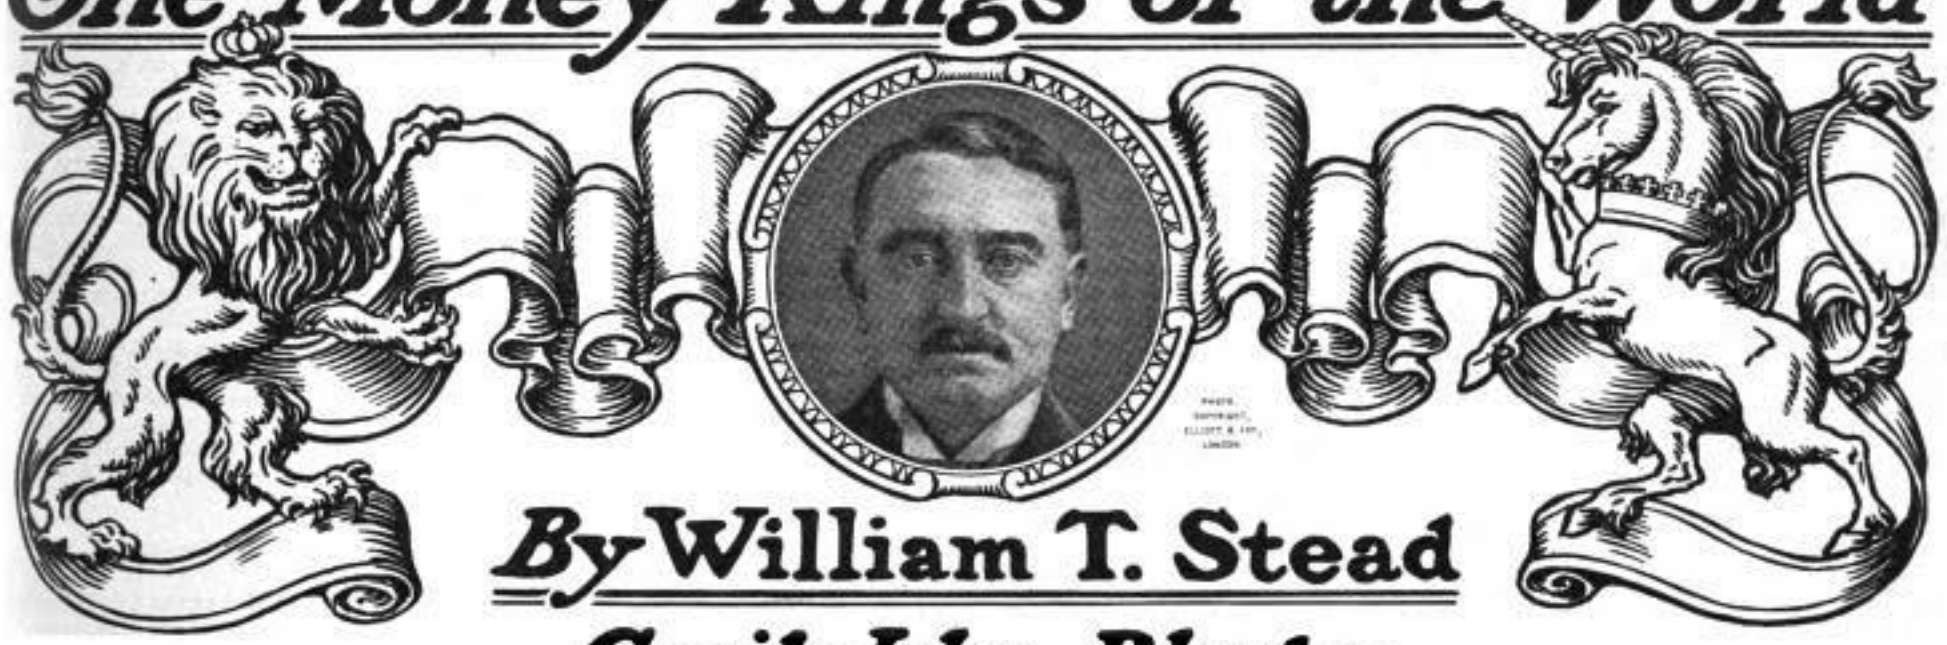
"When you go back to Lewiston will you tell Mr. Dingley for me that I still think he is an aw-w-wfully goo-ud ma-a-an? He always likes to hear that I think so."

"I will deliver the message."

"Tell him that I realize I am only a brand from the burning, a roystering, worthless blade, when compared with such goo-udness as his. Tell him that I know out of my great wisdom that when he dies he will go straight into the Highest Heaven of the Seven Grades. As for me, well, I shall probably be compelled to dicker a while at the gate of the lowest and then the Commission on Immigration may finally let me in. If I do get in I shall apply myself for several æons of eternity in trying to grow to be as goo-ud as Dingley is here on earth. It will be a hard job, but if ever I attain to that sublime height I shall be perfectly content. Now you go right home and tell my friend Dingley just what I have said. It always gratifies him to know that such a lost and wayward creature as I am appreciates his goo-udness."

I told Mr. Dingley.

He wheeled from his little desk in the Journal office and wrinkled his nose with that familiar expression that his associates remember. Then he snorted the ejaculation "Nhn!" He fell to reading his paper. At the end of an absolute quiet of ten minutes, and after I thought that he had entirely forgotten the mischievous message, he whirled again and with fine scorn snapped:



"Reed thinks he can plague me and make me uncomfortable by saying such wretched things as that, but"—the distinguished Congressman crumpled his newspaper and threw it on the floor in a pet—"but he can't."

How the unconscious humor of the situation would have tickled the mighty wag in Portland!

The Money Kings of the World

By William T. Stead

Cecil John Rhodes

Copyright, 1902, by The Curtis Publishing Company

CECIL RHODES, of Africa, was for the last twelve years of his life an intimate personal friend and political confidant of the present writer. Had he died any time between the years 1892 and 1899 I should have come into possession of the whole of his fortune with absolute and unfettered discretion to spend it as I pleased in the furtherance of our ideas. In 1899 Mr. Rhodes altered his will, but as I had been for seven years heir presumptive to his millions, he had given me his confidence more fully than to any other man. The alteration in his will made no change in our friendship, which lasted unbroken, even by the strain of the war, until his death.

To my thinking, and no one had better opportunities of studying his character, Cecil Rhodes was the first millionaire to realize the political potentialities of his millions. He was not a Money King like other Money Kings, sovereign in the realm of finance, and dipping into politics only in order to influence finance. He was a statesman, a political idealist, an Empire-builder first. He became a financier only in order the more effectively to carry out his political aspirations. To him financial speculation was merely a means to an end. No one was more indifferent to dividends, excepting so far as they could be used to carry out his far-reaching designs. He used his millions as sovereigns use soldiers, raising them to achieve a political end, and spending them without ruth or regret to secure the defeat of his opponents.

It is this which differentiates Cecil Rhodes from all his fellows. Not only was he a millionaire with an imagination; his imagination was fired by distinctively political ideals. He made money in order to become politically powerful, and he used his political power to realize the loftiest aspirations of race patriotism. He is the first, and so far the supreme, type of the millionaire consciously sovereign by virtue of his millions in the world of politics.

Mr. Rhodes' New Use for Wealth

It must be admitted that although Mr. Rhodes achieved great things in his comparatively short life, the sum total of his achievement is not such as to encourage the development of political ambition among imaginative millionaires. A single false step taken under the promptings of an overweening confidence in his star brought down upon the Empire a disaster far exceeding in magnitude all the services which he had rendered it. It is true that for the ultimate working out of the retribution which followed the Jameson raid Mr. Rhodes was not personally responsible. But it is not less true that, had he never made the raid, or having made it, had honestly striven to win back the confidence of the Dutch, there would have been no war. Mr. Rhodes added Rhodesia to the Empire, and painted the African map British red up to the Zambesi and beyond. But against these entries to his credit there is a terrible set-off in the three years' war, by which, at a cost of 30,000 lives and £300,000,000, the heart of South Africa has been devastated and a lasting blood feud created between the two white races of that continent, on whose good relations the very existence of British South Africa depends. Humanum est errare, but when Money Kings and emperors make a slip the consequences are appalling.

It is perhaps not without cause that the world has been afforded so terrible an object-lesson as to the consequences of allowing the millionaire to control the political situation. It is useful not merely for those who are to be controlled, but specially useful to the millionaire himself. For there is every reason to believe that Mr. Rhodes was justified in his confident expectation that an increasing number of wealthy men, especially the younger generation who inherit the millions their fathers made, will use their riches for political ends. If so, it is well that, together with the inspiration of his ideals, they should have ever before them the warning of the catastrophe which the impatient and unscrupulous pursuit of those ideals brought down upon South Africa.

Editor's Note—This is the third of Mr. Stead's papers on the great modern financiers. The next will appear in an early number.

The Secret Society of Millionaires

Mr. Rhodes believed that there were many millionaires in the world who would rally round the society which he proposed to found for promoting the reunion of the English-speaking world, and who would eagerly welcome his scheme for devoting their millions to the realization of his vast political ideals. He counted upon being able to command "the accumulated wealth of those whose aspiration is a desire to do something, and a hideous annoyance created by the difficult question daily placed before their minds as to which of their incompetent relations they should leave their wealth to." He maintained that his project would furnish them with "the solution, greatly relieving their minds and turning their ill-gotten or inherited gains to some advantage." So confident was he as to the attractiveness of his ideal that at our very first meeting he said he anticipated the society would before many years were over be able to command a capital of four hundred million dollars. With this he said we ought to be able to do something. As a nucleus for the formation of this fund he had appropriated the whole of his own fortune, which he estimated would amount to thirty million dollars.

He died before he could put his anticipations to the test of experience. But so far as his own fortune was concerned, he devoted it as he promised to the promotion of the great political objects which had fired his imagination when a youth, and to which he was faithful unto death.

It is not generally known that the first idea of this great secret society of millionaires, which was made public to the world after Mr. Rhodes' death, originally reached him from an American source. Those who have read Marion Crawford's An American Politician will remember the important part which is played in it by an American secret society, which was in possession of unlimited funds, and to which many of the most influential leaders of American parties were affiliated. This idea of Marion Crawford's set Rhodes thinking, and from that original germ he appears to have developed his great idea of using the associated wealth for the purpose of directing the politics of the world. He had many lessons in his early manhood of the vast political consequences which sometimes depend upon a comparatively small sum of money. One of Lord Rosmond's stories, which Mr. Rhodes was never weary of telling, described how England lost the Transvaal in 1880 solely because of the economical scruples of a Treasury clerk. Shepstone, who was British resident in the Transvaal, knew the Boers and understood them, and was ready to carry on with them; but Shepstone was a man of liberal ideas, especially in matters of expenditure, and he intimated to the Colonial Office that he should have to give up his post unless his salary was raised by, I think, £150 a year. It was contrary to all rule and precedent that such an increase should be granted to a Colonial official with no longer period of service behind him than Shepstone had to show. The advance was refused. Shepstone resigned, and Sir Owen Lanyon was sent out in his place. Now Sir Owen Lanyon was a bluff soldier with a lordly contempt for Boers, and a high-handed, barrack-room method of dealing with them which in a very short time precipitated the revolt which led to the practical severance of the Transvaal from the British Empire. Of the cost of restoring the Transvaal to the British Empire we need not speak. As Mr. Rhodes used to say, England lost the richest gold-field in the world through the parsimony of a Treasury clerk. One hundred and fifty pounds a year extra would have saved the situation, but that £150 was not forthcoming.

Take another instance. The western border of the Transvaal, although roughly defined on maps, was not guarded by any force of mounted police. In vain the Colonial authorities petitioned Downing Street to provide the sum of £20,000 a year to enable them to police the frontier. The money was not forthcoming. The police were not on the spot, and as a result the adventurous Boers trekked over on to the unoccupied land, and founded Republics which were in due course to be incorporated with the Transvaal. To turn these people out and to free the great north road to the heart of Africa required the dispatch of Sir Charles Warren at the head of a military expedition which cost England no less than £750,000. A stitch in time saves nine; and if Mr. Rhodes had had his secret society in working order he would not have hesitated to have provided the funds which would have obviated the necessity for a costly expedition. Afterward when money came into his possession he used it to subsidize the British Treasury. The most striking instance of this was the action which he took in order to save Nyassaland. The Shire Highlands and the fertile region round Lake Nyassa would long ere this have been snapped up by Germany or some other Power but for the subsidy of £10,000 a year which Mr. Rhodes contributed to the Imperial Exchequer in order to induce them to take over the territory. The money was subsequently paid back, but the grant was made in the nick of time, and had it not been forthcoming one of the most fertile and prosperous districts in tropical Eastern Africa would have been lost to the British Empire.

A Plan to Underpin the Empire

Mr. Rhodes looked forward to carrying out the same method by subsidizing the Empire on a still larger scale. If in his opinion it was indispensable that a British man-of-war should be maintained at a given station, and the Admiralty pleaded that they could not afford the expense, Mr. Rhodes would have solved the difficulty by supplying the money. To use his own phrase, he would have underpinned the Empire. His great society would have been to the British Crown what the Society of Jesus was to the Pope. No parliamentary committee would have controlled its expenditure. It would have been all secret-service money, and could have been used whenever it was needed for the long and tedious formalities by which the best designs are often strangled by official red-tape.

But it is obvious what a wide field is thus opened up. At this moment every one of the departments which has to deal with the foreign and Colonial policy of the Empire is bewailing its inability to do necessary things because neither the Treasury nor the House of Commons will vote the necessary money. Take, for instance, the case of the War Office and its maps. War may break out at any moment in any part of the almost illimitable frontier of the British Empire. Whenever war does break out, it is always discovered that the Intelligence Department of the War Office has no adequate military maps available for the use of its commanders. Even to this day the War Office has no decent map of Cape Colony. To provide it with adequate maps of the different frontiers of the Empire would require a subsidy of £80,000 a year for at least six years. Mr. Rhodes would have done his utmost to rouse the British Government to the need of providing those maps at the expense of the general public; but if the Government were obdurate, the society would have come to the rescue. The work which Mr. Rhodes performed in opening up new territory, in building railways, and in developing colonization, all illustrates the way in which his society would have worked for the attainment of his ideals.

But to all this no exception will be taken, and there is probably no Government in the world that would not be only too glad to have behind it a body of wealthy enthusiasts who would spend their money for attaining ends which the central power recognizes as desirable, but which it cannot find money to pay for. There is another side, however, to Mr. Rhodes' idea of using money in the service of the Empire. In Marion Crawford's novel the triumvirate who dispose of the immense funds of the secret society make no scruple about bribing politicians when it is necessary to engineer bills through local or federal legislatures. There is no proof that Mr. Rhodes ever bought any vote by cash down.

The difference between the American and the British method of employing money in politics is that between those who buy raw materials and those who prefer to buy them when they are worked up as manufactured articles. The English use money in politics in order to defray the cost of registration and electioneering, relying upon the gratitude of those whom they have assisted not to go wrong when the seat in Parliament is taken. Whereas the American in Marion Crawford's story for so much boodle buys up the requisite number of votes, Mr. Rhodes confined himself to contributing to the electoral registration fund of the political party to which he was allied—a form of expenditure which, being open and aboveboard, was recognized as being perfectly legitimate.

Mr. Rhodes, however, was a man who had few scruples, and being supremely convinced of the righteousness of his end was often serenely indifferent to the particular method by which he attained it. His cynical method of talking often led to his being debited with many sins of which he was quite innocent. On the only two occasions on which he used his money to influence political decisions in Imperial politics, his action, although much debated, was in no sense of the nature of a bribe. The first case was his famous donation of £10,000 to Mr. Parnell. Mr. Rhodes, like all colonists, believed in Home Rule, but he recoiled with horror from Mr. Gladstone's conception of Home Rule, which would have converted Ireland into a taxed Republic, compelled to bear the financial burdens of empire without any voice whatever in the control of Imperial policy. When he was asked if he would support the campaign fund of the Irish Nationalists, he replied that he could only do so if he had satisfactory assurances from Mr. Parnell to the effect that after Home Rule Ireland was to have adequate representation in the Imperial Parliament. Mr. Parnell gave the requisite assurances and received £10,000, to the scandal of many of Mr. Rhodes' Imperialist friends who considered Home Rule as a deadly heresy.

His Influence on World Politics

Some years later he made another donation, this time of £5000, to an electioneering fund, in circumstances which, being misunderstood, led to a good deal of scandal. The transaction was perfectly innocent. The electoral organizer of the Liberal party, Mr. Schnadhorst, was a personal friend of Mr. Rhodes, and one day on a visit to his friend in South Africa he asked him how it was that, while he called himself a Liberal, he never subscribed to the campaign fund of the Liberal party. Mr. Rhodes replied that he should willingly do so if he were satisfied that the Liberals on returning to office would not evacuate Egypt. His mind was full of his great Cape to Cairo Railway, and it hurt him horribly to think that, after pushing northwest across two-thirds of the continent, he might find a hostile flag at Cairo. Mr. Schnadhorst assured him that he might put his mind at rest; that there was no fear of the Liberals evacuating Egypt, and on the strength of these assurances Mr. Rhodes subscribed £5000 to the party fund, coupling with it the proviso that if the Liberal leaders should evacuate Egypt the money had to be given to some charity. Mr. Schnadhorst took the money and spent it at once. Afterward Mr. Morley and Mr. Gladstone made allusions to the Egyptian questions in a way which angered Mr. Rhodes, and led him to fear that the Liberal party was, after all, going to evacuate Egypt. He wrote angrily to Mr. Schnadhorst, declaring that if this were the case his money must be handed over to a charity. As Mr. Schnadhorst had already spent the money, and as every one knew that the Liberals would not evacuate Egypt, no charity benefited by Mr. Rhodes' gift.

It was rather curious that the outcry against Mr. Rhodes for his subscription of £5000 was raised chiefly by those who every election draw ten times that amount from the wealthy supporters of vested interests who keep full the exchequer of the Conservative Electoral Association. Mr. Rhodes, however, was never able to carry out to the full his ideas. Although he was six times a millionaire at his death, during his life he seldom had a superfluous sixpence, and his banking account was often overdrawn to the extent of half a million dollars. No man ever acted more faithfully upon the doctrine of the stewardship of money. It was his unhesitating readiness to back his opinions with his own money that made him able to raise such great sums from the public. But nearly all his money was spent in Africa. Had he devoted the money which he wasted in engineering the Jameson raid to founding a great daily newspaper in London he would have done infinitely better service to the Empire. But Africa was near and London was far off, and although Mr. Rhodes through his friends invested a good deal of money in controlling the South African press, he died without realizing his avowed intention of founding an organ in London which would have been devoted to the advocacy of his ideas.

Mr. Rhodes was a portent of things to come. Imagine Mr. Carnegie spending his millions not on libraries, but upon the realization of political ideals! Imagine Mr. Rockefeller as intent upon, let us say, the annexation of Central America as he has been in building up the Standard Oil Trust! Yet who can say that such things are impossible? Building up empires, founding colonies, and making wars have in all ages had more fascination for the rulers of men than endowing universities and founding libraries. If thousands of ordinary men have been found content and even eager to sacrifice their lives for the realization of some political ideal, is it so inconceivable that some of the heirs of our billionaires may aspire to spend their millions in the promotion of political ideals? Mr. W. R. Hearst, for instance, when he comes into the full enjoyment of the Hearst millions, with his three or four newspapers might make himself the most potent citizen in the Republic. When millionaires take to painting the political circus red, it is possible that mankind will sigh for the return of the days when, as Mr. Rhodes used to say, millionaires were mere "safekeys in breeches," too much absorbed in looking after the safety of their investments to have time or strength to make use of their wealth for the common weal.

The Finding of a Lifework

The leading facts in Mr. Rhodes' somewhat meteoric career are too familiar for me to need to do more than merely refer to them here. He was born on July 5, 1853, the fourth son of a country clergyman, and was himself destined for the Church. Educated first at Bishop Stortford Grammar School, he was sent to Oxford, where his health broke down. Threatened with consumption he was ordered to South Africa, where he regained health and took up claims at the then newly-discovered diamond-field of Kimberley. He had small capital, but from the first his ventures were successful. He went into partnership with Mr. Rudd in an ice-making machine, and leaving Mr. Rudd to sell ice at the diamond-fields he returned to Oxford to resume his studies. Every summer he spent at the University, returning each autumn to the diggings. The ice-making machine had been sold after making a handsome profit, more claims were taken up, and the diamond-diggers began to see their way to a great fortune. It was in these early days that Mr. Rhodes, meditating on life and its possibilities in his tent on the veldt, came to the conclusion that there was nothing to which he cared to devote his life so much as to promote the extension and to strengthen the union of the English-speaking race. His mind was made up. His purpose was fixed. He had found his lifework, and from that time till he died he pursued the path he had marked out for himself with undeviating devotion.

Mr. Rhodes was a curious compound of cynical materialism and exalted idealism. The former was known and seen of all men; the latter was revealed only to the chosen few whom he believed would sympathize with his dreams. To realize his ideals he saw it was necessary to make money. He used to say, "You can do nothing with ideas without cash." He applied himself to making money with a zeal and with a success which led many people to believe that his one aim was to amass a fortune. His inner thought, as he unfolded it to me in a memorable conversation, was not visible or even comprehensible to those in the midst of whom he was then living. The governing conception of his life was arrived at by a curious process of reasoning to which Aristotle, Loyola and Darwin all contributed their quota. He began by asking whether there was a God? He was an agnostic. But the universal instinct of mankind, he felt, suggested that there was at least a fifty per cent. chance that there was a God. It was an even chance, he calculated. Then he went on, If there be a God and He cares anything about what I do, the most important thing in the world is for me to find out what He wants me to do and then go and do it. I have described elsewhere (The Last Will and Testament of Cecil John Rhodes) the various stages of his reasoning. I only need here quote his conclusion:

"If there be a God and He cares anything about what I do, I think it is clear that He would like me to do what He is doing Himself. And as He is manifestly fashioning the English-speaking race as the chosen instrument by which He will bring in a state of society based upon Justice, Liberty and Peace, He must obviously wish me to do what I can to give as much scope and power to that race as possible. Hence, if there be a God, I think that what He would like me to do is to paint as much of the map of Africa British red as possible, and to do what I can elsewhere to promote the unity and extend the influence of the English-speaking race."

With this in his mind Mr. Rhodes worked on at the diamond mines until he had acquired a considerable fortune. He did not, however, wait until he was a very rich man before he made a will in which the whole of his property, whatever it might be, was left to two trustees to be used by them for the purpose of extending British rule throughout the world, for the perfecting of a system of emigration from the United Kingdom to all lands where the means of livelihood are attainable by energy inborn and enterprise, the consolidation of the Empire, the restoration of Anglo-Saxon unity destroyed by the schism of the eighteenth century, the representation of the Colonies in Parliament, and "finally the foundation of so great a Power as hereafter to render wars impossible, and to promote the best interests of humanity."

Such was his dream when he was twenty-two, and the vision never left him. Even when the premature attempt to realize it had drenched South Africa with blood, he never ceased to believe that he had discovered the way to universal peace. Such dreams have been dreamed before. The Roman Emperors almost realized them. Dante, Henri Quatre and Napoleon, both the First and the Third, had anticipated him in believing that the road to peace lay through the creation of a Power whose fiat should make war impossible. But it was the first time in the world's history that this ideal fascinated the imagination of a millionaire and compelled him to dedicate all his wealth to its realization.

Where the Money Came From

Mr. Rhodes first made his reputation as the Great Amalgamator of all the competing companies in the diamond-fields into one great monopoly. He anticipated Mr. Pierpont Morgan by several years, and the De Beers Company has for many years past exercised absolute control over the production of diamonds, and has exercised it with a single eye to the profits of its shareholders. No one can pretend that the result of the operations of Mr. Rhodes in amalgamating all the diamond companies was to reduce the cost of diamonds to the general public. On the contrary, his avowed aim was to keep prices up. He succeeded. Before the amalgamation diamonds were falling steadily in price. Since the amalgamation the price has been kept steadily up. It must be admitted, however, that diamonds are probably the only commodity in the world whose price can be kept up not only without injury to the community, but to the positive benefit of the industry itself. If diamonds were as cheap as crystals no one would buy them. We make our profit, said Mr. Rhodes, out of the vanity of the human race. He had no scruple about taxing that vanity, knowing that the more it was taxed the better it was pleased.

The De Beers Consolidated Diamond Company is one of the most prosperous business enterprises in the world. Its capital is $22,500,000; it pays an annual dividend of from twenty-five to thirty per cent. Its formation secured Mr. Rhodes' fortune. He had now the means at his disposal for carrying out his political ideals.

He entered Cape politics. He was elected to the Cape Parliament. He recognized with a sure political instinct that the future of South Africa depended upon the establishment of cordial relations between the British and the Dutch. He became the bosom friend of Mr. Ian Hofmeyr, the leader of the Africander Bond. He joined the Bond himself, and set himself sedulously to wipe out all memories of ill-feeling between the Boer and the Briton.

In those days Mr. Rhodes had scant patience with the Imperial factor as represented by the Colonial Office at Downing Street. One of his first essays in international diplomacy was the conclusion of a friendly arrangement with Doctor Leyds for the pacific settlement of a frontier dispute—a settlement which was summarily set on one side by Sir Charles Warren, who came out with the authority of Downing Street to settle the question. Mr. Rhodes set his heart upon extending the British Empire northward to the Zambesi. Availing himself of the public interest excited in the so-called Land of Ophir by the propaganda of his political opponent, the Rev. John Mackenzie, he succeeded in inducing the British Government to grant him a charter for a new East India Company in South Africa with commission to extend the frontier of the Empire to the Zambesi. Rhodes was then Prime Minister of the Cape Colony, thanks to Mr. Hofmeyr and the Dutch who gave him his majority. He raised nearly twenty million dollars from the British public for the purposes of the chartered company—millions upon which to this day not one red cent has ever been paid as interest. It was believed that the new lands north of the Transvaal were teeming with gold. The Matabele and the Mashonas were occupying territory known to the ancients as the Land of Ophir, the seat of King Solomon's mines. The constantly increasing returns from the gold mines of the Rand influenced the imagination of the public. Mr. Rhodes equipped an expedition which, with astonishing good luck, succeeded in occupying Mashonaland without bloodshed. His star mounted toward the zenith. Lobengula, the savage chief of the Matabele, taking alarm at the arrival of the white men who had evidently come to stay, challenged a conflict in which his impis were shattered, his kraal captured, while he himself lost his life—a campaign which, if it had been directed from London, would have cost the taxpayer millions and have engaged the services of a regular army, was brought to a brilliant close at no cost to the public by the valor and skill of a handful of Colonial adventurers under the command of Doctor Jameson.

The star of Mr. Rhodes culminated. Everything he touched seemed to prosper. In the Transvaal his investments in the gold-fields promised to be only one degree less profitable than his shares in De Beers. Without involving the Imperial Exchequer in any expenditure, he had added to the Empire a region of 750,000 square miles, containing the best colonizable land in Africa. The great man-slaying machine of Lobengula had been smashed, and the capital of a civilized State created on the site of his blood-stained kraal. At home he subscribed £10,000 to the Irish National funds to secure Mr. Parnell's support to the principle of Imperial Unity; he was made a Privy Councilor by the Liberal Ministry, and was lauded to the skies by the Conservatives.

And then — oh! the pity of it and the shame of it all — this glorious promise was destroyed. Overweening confidence born of uninterrupted success led him to believe in the representations of Doctor Jameson that President Kruger could be smashed as easily as King Lobengula. Mr. Rhodes had quarreled with President Kruger, but that was not the essence of the question. In the Transvaal the Rand gold mines had attracted a large non-Dutch population, which resented the conservative rule of the pastoral Boers. Mr. Rhodes feared the newcomers might upset the rule of President Kruger, and found an American Republic much more hostile to the British Empire than the old Boers had ever been. One-half of the Boers had voted against the reëlection of Paul Kruger to the presidency. Negotiations had been proceeding between these anti-Krugerite Boers and the disaffected Uitlanders of Johannesburg. To avert what he believed might be a combination fatal to the maintenance of British Empire in South Africa, Mr. Rhodes decided that it was necessary for him to take a hand in the game. If he could help the Uitlanders to overthrow Paul Kruger he would be able to count upon securing the allegiance of the new Government. It seemed to me sheer lunacy at the time, and I said so, much to Mr. Rhodes' disgust. He persevered in his resolution to force on a revolution in Johannesburg, of which he could take advantage by bringing the High Commissioner on to the scene supported by Doctor Jameson from the outside. The Colonial Office under Mr. Chamberlain was duly informed by trusted emissaries of the design, and after a little demur consented to hand over to Mr. Rhodes both the land needed for a jumping-off place and the armed men with whom Doctor Jameson made his famous raid.

The revolution hung fire at Johannesburg. Not even the stimulus of rifles consigned from the De Beers Company to the leaders of the Reform Committee, nor the subsidies of Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Beit, could nerve the Reformers to the fighting point. Mr. Chamberlain's infatuation in insisting that Doctor Jameson should make his entry under the British flag, and that the next ruler of the Transvaal should be appointed from the Colonial Office, converted what was at first intended to be a bona-fide insurrection to secure a better government for the Republic into a felonious design to annex the Republic to the Empire. The American Reformers jibed violently against the British flag, and Mr. Rhodes did his best to undo Mr. Chamberlain's mistake. But the mischief was done. The revolution hung fire. Doctor Jameson decided to force the hand of the Reformers. He crossed the frontier at the head of a force of 600 men. His action was instantly repudiated by Mr. Chamberlain. He had been pressing the conspirators to hurry up, but he did not realize that Doctor Jameson's move was largely due to his "hurry-up" messages, and he was determined to take no risks. The Boers under General Cronje had no difficulty in defeating and capturing Doctor Jameson and his men before they reached Johannesburg.

Mr. Rhodes realized that Doctor Jameson had not been able to repeat the exploits of Pizarro and Cortez in the Transvaal. "The china is broke," he told Mr. Hofmeyr. He resigned his premiership at the Cape, and hastened to London fully expecting to be sent to jail, and fully resolved that, if he were placed in the dock, he would not stand alone. Rhodesia deprived of its white armed police burst into insurrection. Mr. Rhodes was allowed to return to Buluwayo to combat the forces of disorder which threatened Charterland with destruction.

The rebellion was suppressed, but at a heavy loss of life and treasure. Matters were settling down when the crowning blunder of the whole long series of follies and crimes was perpetrated in London. In order to whitewash Mr. Chamberlain and exonerate the Colonial Office from complicity in the conspiracy against the Transvaal a solemn Parliamentary inquiry by a select committee was ordered into all the circumstances of the raid. As soon as it was evident that a searching investigation would lead to the discovery of the complicity of Mr. Chamberlain, the committee refused to listen to further evidence, hushed up the inquiry, and returned a verdict of acquittal, which excited the derision of the world.* It did worse. It convinced Paul Kruger that he could look for no justice or fair play from the British Government, or even from the British Parliament. That conviction cost the Empire three years' war, the lives of 30,000 British soldiers, and saddled the taxpayers with a little bill of close upon a thousand million dollars.

Mr. Rhodes foresaw this as little as any one. He was convinced that the Boers would never resist an imperious demand for that enfranchisement of the Uitlanders which he admitted would be equivalent to their (the Boers') political extinction. So through the various agencies at his command he and his allies organized a press and platform campaign against the South African Republic. The campaign was very skillfully conducted. Every English newspaper in South Africa but one became the subservient instrument of their design. Every English newspaper correspondent became the willing agent of the conspiracy. Able platform speakers were sent home to inflame public meetings against the Boers by a recital of the wrongs of the Uitlanders and the brutality and stupidity of the Boers. Skillful emissaries were dispatched to the other Colonies to hoodwink Canadians and Australians into believing that the wrongs of British citizens in the Transvaal called aloud for instant redress. At the same time money was used without stint to secure the return of an anti-Dutch majority in the Cape Parliament. There, however, Mr. Rhodes failed. When the elections closed it was found the Dutch were in the majority in the new House. It was this which apparently decided Lord Milner to precipitate the war. If the Dutch majority had time to realize the strength of their position they could have forbidden the war by refusing to allow Cape Colony, their territory, to be used as a base for attacking the Republics. So it came to pass that the pace was forced, and in due time Lord Milner had the satisfaction of goading the Boers into the war which he confidently calculated would result in the annexation of their territory.

Mr. Rhodes took no active share in the tragic dénouement of his one great blunder. He supported Lord Milner loyally, but openly declared that after the war he should be compelled to oppose the Loyalists who wanted to trample on the Dutch, for without the good will of the Dutch you cannot govern South Africa. He never lived to see the end of the war. It continued to rage for two months after he had been laid to rest.

After his death the publication of his will revealed for the first time to the world the true character of the man. The originality and the liberality of the last will and testament of Mr. Rhodes profoundly impressed the public mind. But it is probable he will best be remembered in history as the first millionaire who realized the political responsibilities of vast wealth, and as the pioneer Money King of the Modern World.

*Author's Note — Mr. Chamberlain's colleague in the Cabinet was indiscreet enough publicly to praise the committee because its members had acted as Englishmen always do in responsible positions, for they had refrained from pushing the inquiry to the point where it might have endangered British supremacy in Africa.

THE LOVER

By Theodore Roberts

"NEVER had inland garden seemed
So still, so drugged with dew;
Never had green trees sung so sweet
Beneath the empty blue,

"As when he came, so gay, so sad,
And won the heart of me
With those quick moods of his, like shades
Cloud-blown upon the sea.

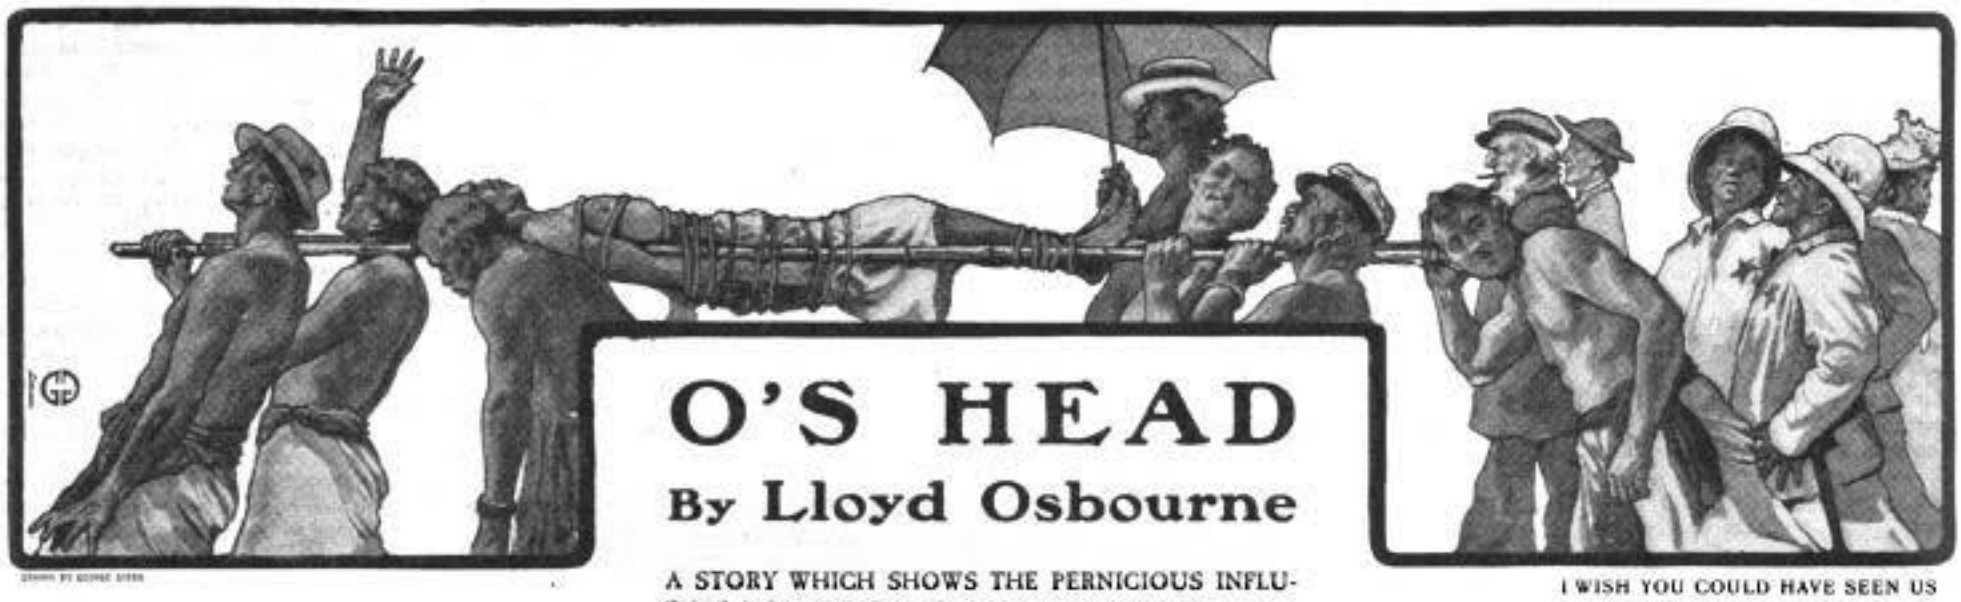
"Such fairy islands he had seen
Between the blue and gray!
His low-voiced ballads dimmed my eyes
And lured my heart away.

"He spoke of gale and anchorage;
Of cities far and fair;
Of roses over crumbling walls
Beyond the clanging square.

"He spoke of comradeship; of men
Red-blooded and clear-eyed,
Who feared no risk of war, or chance,
Or continent, or tide.

"He spoke of brave adventures; dreams;
And of those nameless quests
Which lead men down to death, or home
With stars upon their breasts.

"He spoke of love! Ah, tenderly
He told his dreams of love —
Dreams the sea-winds had brought to him
When stars were white above.



* * * * * * * *

"Never has inland garden seemed
So still, so warm, so sweet,
Since he went through the little gate
And down the glaring street.

"What counted all his ringing vows —
So false, so fine, so brave?
I gave him all my heart! Dear God,
What bitterness he gave!"

Below the blue, beneath the weed,
Where strange fish dart about,
He sleeps, still dreaming of Her lips;
His brave soul clear of doubt.

O'S HEAD

A STORY WHICH SHOWS THE PERNICIOUS INFLUENCE A SCOUNDREL, EVEN WHEN DEAD, CAN CONTINUE TO EXERCISE ON TWO DESERVING LOVERS

SILVER TONGUE loved Rosalie, and Rosalie loved Silver Tongue, and ever since they had first met at the Taufusi Club dance their friends had seen the inevitable finish of their acquaintance. They were invited everywhere together, and the affair had progressed from the first or furtive stage to the secondary or solemn Sunday drive about the Eleele Sa. The third, that of carpenters adding a story to the bakery and dressmakers hard at work in Miss Potter's little establishment, was looming up close in view.

Never was a match in Apia that gave a rosier promise of success. Silver Tongue, so called by the Samoans on account of his beautiful voice (but who in ordinary life answered to the homelier appellation of Oppenstedt), had been making a very good thing out of the Southern Cross Bakery, and was regarded throughout Apia as a man of responsibility and substance. He was a tall, spare German of about forty, who, like the most of us, had followed the sea before Fate had brought him to the islands, there in years gone by to marry a Samoan maid and settle down. The little Samoan had died, leaving behind her nothing but a memory in Silver Tongue's heart, a tangled grave in the foreign cemetery, and a host of relations who lived in tumbledown quarters in the rear of the bakery. In one way and another these hungry mouths must have been a considerable drain on Silver Tongue's resources; and though they feebly responded to his bounty—one by driving a natty cart and delivering hot morning rolls, and another by pilfering firewood for the furnace—the account (if one had been made) was far from even. But to any objection to this Quixotic generosity Silver Tongue had a reply ever ready on his lips. "I lofe dem like my fader," he would say in his deep, fluty voice, and the conversation was seldom carried further. When it was—by some one ill-advised enough to do so—Silver Tongue would flare up, and recall with flashing eyes and a face crimson with indignation the ten-year debt of gratitude he owed his dead wife's aunga.

Indeed, if Silver Tongue had a fault it was a certain moroseness and fierceness of temper, a readiness and even an apparent pleasure in taking offense, that made him somewhat of a solitary in our midst and threw him more than ever on the companionship of his own kanakas; so that at night, when one had occasion to seek him out, he was usually to be found on the mats of his native house, smoking his pipe or playing sweefy with his bulky father-in-law, Papalangi Mativa. I doubt if he had another intimate in Apia besides myself, and though I must confess we often disagreed and once or twice approached the verge of estrangement, I was too much his friend and too mindful of the old days on the Ransom to let such trifles come between us.

I was, besides, Rosalie's friend as well, for old Clyde, her father, had died in my arms at Nonootch and with his last breath had consigned her to my care. This obligation, rendered sacred by an association that extended back to the days of Steinberg and Bully Hayes, when in the Moroa and the Eugenie we had slept under the same mats and had played our part together in the stirring times of Stewart and the great Atuona Plantation—this obligation, I say, I met easily enough so long as Rosalie was a child and safe in the convent at Savalalo. But when she grew to womanhood and went to live with her relations in their shanty near the Firm, I began to experience some anxiety in regard to her. Her relations, to begin with, were not at all the kind of natives I liked. They had been too long the hangers-on of the Firm and had seen too much of a low class of whites to be the proper guardians of a very pretty half-caste of eighteen. They had an ugly name besides—but I won't be censorious—and it may have been all beach talk. But they were certainly a whining, begging lot, the girls bold and the men impudent and saucy, and I never saw Rosalie in their midst but it made me heart-sick for her future. I did the little I could, and let it be pretty well understood about the beach that the man who played fast and loose with her would have to reckon with old Captain Branscombe. And then I got the missionary ladies to take her up, and as I never stinted a bit of money for her dresses and what-not (as though Clyde's daughter wasn't worthy of the best in the land) she made good headway in what little gayeties took place in the town. Of course I went about to keep an eye on her—that is, when they asked me to their parties, which wasn't always; and I remember once making very short work of one fellow, a labor captain from the Westward, who seemed bent on mischief till I took him out in the starlight and showed him the business end of my gun. To tell the truth, I never had a peaceful moment till he up anchor and cleared, for he was a good deal the kind of man I was at thirty, and he hung on in spite of me, keeping half the family in his pay while I kept the other, and he even landed the last night with muffled oars, when instead of finding Rosalie on the beach to fly with him he ran into me, laying for him under an umbrella!

There were many who said I was in love with the girl myself, which, as like as not, was true; for she was one of those tall, queenly women, with a wonderful grace to anything she did, and magnificent dark eyes, and a way of smiling, brilliant, arch and tender, that made even an old stager of sixty remember he still wore a heart under his jumper. Yes, I had a pretty soft spot for Rosalie, though I had sense enough to know that God had never meant her for an old sea-horse like myself. And lacking me—whom the weight of three-score years had put out of the ring (not but what I'm a pretty game old devil yet)—I could see nobody in sight I preferred half so much as Silver Tongue.

So there was the situation till the war of 'ninety-three came along to jumble us all up and knock everything to spillikins. Oppenstedt in love with Rosalie; Rosalie in love with Oppenstedt; Bahn and old Taylor working on the second story of the Southern Cross Bakery; Miss Potter doing double tides at the trousseau, and I, the friend of both, with a six-hundred-dollar piano on the way from Bremen for their wedding present. A fair wind, port in sight, and (say you) everything drawing nicely alow and aloft. So it was till that wretched fight at Vaitele when the Vaimaunga came pouring in at dusk, bearing wounded, chorusing their songs and tossing in the air above them the heads of their dead enemies. It made me feel bad to see it all, for to me these people were children and it seemed horrible they should kill one another, and it made me sicker still to watch the wounded carried into the Mission and stretched out in a row on the blood-stained boards. Though not a drinking man, I braced up at Peter's bar and then went on to pass the time of day with Oppenstedt.

I found him as usual on the mats of the native house, glumly smoking a pipe and talking politics with Papalangi Mativa. His lean, dark, handsome face was overcast, his eyes uneasy, and had I not known him for a brave man I should have thought that he was frightened. He was certainly very curt and short in greeting me and I had a dim perception that my visit was unwelcome.

"This is a black business, Silver Tongue," I said; though to be exact I called him Leoalio—which means the same thing in native.

"Plack!" he exclaimed. "It's horrible! It's disgusting. They have been cutting off beople's heads!"

"Fourteen by one count," I said. "Twenty-two by another."

"Gabtain," said he with a look of extraordinary gravity, "dere's worse nor that!"

"Worse?" I said.

"I have it straight from Papalangi Mativa himself."

"Have what?" I asked.

"Excellency," said Papalangi Mativa, "perhaps it is not high-chief-known to thee that I and mine come from a noble Savai'i stock, and that the son of my mother's sister, a stripling named O, numbered himself amongst the enemy and was to-day killed and his head taken on the field of Vaitele."

"Ane!" I said, which in kanaka is being sympathetic.

"Dat is not all," said Silver Tongue. "Listen, Gaptain!"

"I'm listening," I said.

"The warrior that killed O was To'oto'o, the matai," continued Papalangi Mativa with the air of one announcing the end of the world.

"To'oto'o!" I said in all innocence.

"To'oto'o," cried Silver Tongue; "why, Rosalie's uncle, the faipule, in whose house this very minute the head of my murdered relation lies!"

"'Pon my soul," I exclaimed, "this is really unfortunate."

"Unfordunate!" cried Silver Tongue; "is it with such a word you describe two hearts broken, two lives plasted, the fairest prospect with suddenly crash the curdain led down!"

"I don't know what you're talking about," I said. "It's disagreeable, I admit, but I can't see what difference it can make to you and Rosalie."

"An Oppenstedt," said Silver Tongue, "could never indermarry with the family of a murderer, and least of all with a family that had the head of my dead wife's relation cut off and carried with gapers and cries of joy down the main street of Apia and past my place of peeziness!"

"Do you mean to say it's all off with you and Rosalie?" I demanded.

Silver Tongue nodded grimly. "All off," he said.

"And you're going to break my girl's heart," I cried with what I think under the circumstances was a very justifiable indignation, "because the son of the aunt of your father-in-law has had his head cut off by poor Rosalie's adopted uncle?"

"That's right," said Silver Tongue.

"Old friend," I said, "let me go before I say something I might regret." I got up without waiting for any answer and strode into the street, too consumed with anger to utter another word. I walked along the beach, stopping here and there to discuss the news of the battle with those of my friends I happened to meet, until at last I passed Savalalo and drew near To'oto'o's house at Songi. Rosalie was standing at the gate, and when she saw me she ran up, threw her arms round my neck and kissed me. I had never known her so excited or so gay, and even in the dark I could see that her beautiful eyes were shining.

"Captain," she said, giving me a hug, "nobody will ever say a word against To'oto'o again, or try to belittle him as they used to, just because he's poor and lives on Seu's land, for to-day he fought like a lion and covered himself with glory!"

"Took a head, or something?" I said.

"A hero!" she exclaimed. "They are composing a song in his honor; all Songi is ringing with his name; and he was complimented for his valor by the President and Chief Justice! You must come in and see it at once."

"See what?" I asked.

"The head!" she cried.

I haven't the heart to write how the news was broken to Rosalie, who steadfastly refused to believe the truth until she had heard it from Silver Tongue himself. I had hoped he might relent, with a night to think it over and a letter from myself in the morning pointing out his injustice and folly. Perhaps, now I remember it, that letter was a mistake. It was a trifle warm in spots and I dare say I let a natural warmth get the better of me. Be that as it may, Oppenstedt was deaf to reason and protested with undiminished vehemence that he refused to ally himself with the family of a murderer. Indeed, so ridiculous did he get on the subject that he sent to Sydney for a tombstone (I daren't write headstone, though it was one, about the size of a silk hat) and put it behind the bakery above the spot where O's head was buried in a gin case.

When a girl has gone a certain length she seems less able than a man to withstand a disappointment in love. Silver Tongue simply clenched his teeth, withdrew from the Concordia Club and the Wednesday night bowls at Conrad's and went on baking bread and rolls much as usual. Poor Rosalie drooped like a flower in the sun, and though she had pride enough to act a part and show a becoming spirit before the world, she had received a wound that I sometimes feared might prove mortal. I sent her to Tonga Taboo for a month and she came back no better, her eyes black-ringed and her cheeks hollow, and her smile (always to me the most beautiful smile in the world) with a curious, haunting pathos that I remember so well in the old slaving days amongst the Line women in their chains.

You must not think I tamely acquiesced in this state of affairs or allowed my old friend an undisturbed possession of the kanaka quarters behind the bakery. Late or early I gave him no peace, and plagued him, I dare say, to the very verge of distraction. But I might as well have tried to argue with his bread or soften his brick furnace for any impression I succeeded in making upon him. In his crazy obstinacy he would listen to nothing, and I would find myself, after one of these interviews, in a state of indescribable exasperation and determined never to go near him again.

One night, when I was up at Malifa calling on a dear good friend of mine, Sasa French, a charming and most accomplished young native lady, our talk happened to run for the thousandth time on this vexing matter of Rosalie and Silver Tongue. All of a sudden an idea came into Sasa's pretty head—one of those brilliant, clever, feminine ideas—that seemed to us, in that triumphant moment, to be the means of untangling all our difficulties. Though it was eight o'clock and there was the risk of gossip in my driving Sasa French alone about the Municipality at such an hour, I put her into my buggy, whipped up my horse and set a straight course for Seumanutafa, the high chief of Apia. He laughed a good deal, demurred somewhat and was finally persuaded to squeeze his Herculean dimensions into the trap and start off with us for To'oto'o's house at Songi. Here, after the usual ceremonious exchanges, the womenfolk and children melted away and left us alone with To'oto'o, whose ferretty eyes betrayed no small degree of curiosity and alarm. This man was one of the few Samoans I never liked. He was a gaunt, dangerous, crafty-looking customer of about fifty, and I never had had any use for him since he had stolen my tethering-rope one evening when I was calling on the King. Well, to get on with my story, we talked about the weather and the war and what an ass the Ta'ita'ifono was, and finally got round to the matter in hand.

Seumanutafa began mild, for he was a past master in the art of graduation, and thought to go slow at first. To'oto'o was informed that he had to make ifonga for the death of O and be carried on the morrow by the taulelea to Papalangi Mativa's house behind the bakery. This ifonga, as they call it, is a sort of public humiliation to expiate a fault, and nobody's very keen about doing it unless they have to—for it involves rubbing dirt in your hair and singing small and suffering a sort of social eclipse for a week or two afterward. To'oto'o's face grew several shades darker at the suggestion, and though I promised him twenty dollars out of hand for himself and two kegs of beef and three tins of biscuit by way of peace-offering to Papalangi Mativa, he hemmed and hawed and finally said no.

Then Sasa bore a hand and spoke beautifully of Rosalie and how this unfortunate business of O's head had divided her from Silver Tongue.

"If thou makest peace with his aiga," said Sasa, "lo, what is there left for the white man to say? His bond is that of marriage; theirs, that of blood; and if the last be satisfied what room is there for the former to complain?"

"But to be carried like a pig through the public street," said To'oto'o. "Preferable far would be death itself than that the son of chiefs should be thus degraded, and his name become a mock throughout the Tuamasanga!"

"O To'oto'o," said Seumanutafa, "we know thee for a brave man, and that thou tookst this head in open battle even as David did that of Goliath, and I swear thee thy honor shall remain undimmed for all the seeming appearance of humiliation. Besides, is it not written in the Bible that thou shouldst turn the other cheek to the smiter? Is it not said also that blessed is the peacemaker and that the meek shall inherit the earth?"

"Weighty is my grief and pain," said To'oto'o, "but what Your Highness asks of me is impossible!"

"O To'oto'o," said Seumanutafa, "this house is mine; this land is mine; the plantation i ula is mine also. You live under the shadow of my power and it is meet thou shouldst pay in service for the bounty you have so long enjoyed. First I spoke to thee as one brave man to another; then as a Christian to a fellow-Christian; now I command thee as thy chief and verily thou shalt obey!"

"And I will add to that twenty, making it twenty-five," I said.

"And Rosalie shall marry her Silver Tongue after all," said Sasa.

To'oto'o argued a little more for form's sake and blustered somewhat about the Chief Justice and how he would fight the matter out in the courts; but Seumanutafa's tone grew peremptory and the old fellow finally gave way all round. Then 'ava was brought in, the arrangements made for the morrow, and we at length said tofa on the threshold, well pleased with our night's work.

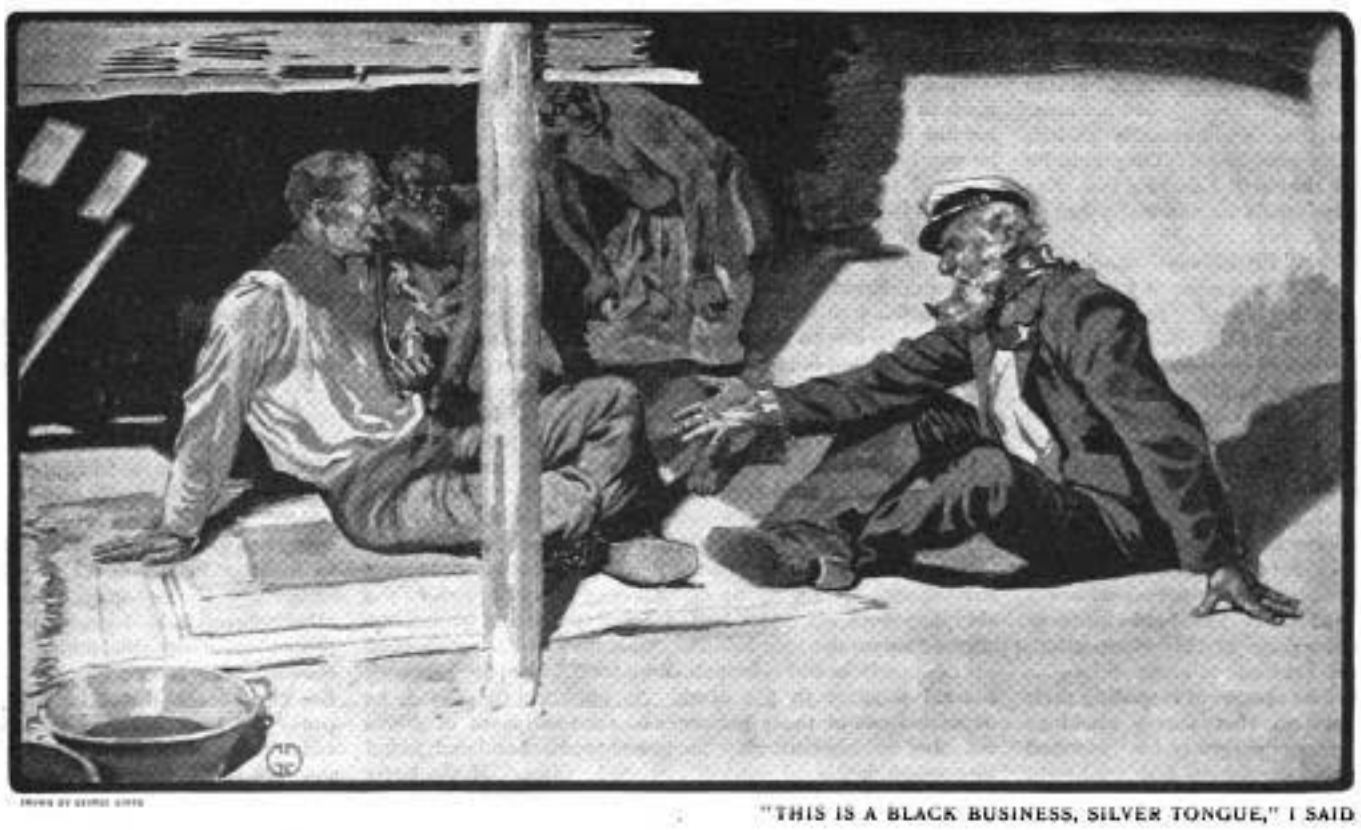
I wish you could have seen us next day going through the town in a little procession headed by To'oto'o lashed to a pole and borne by a crowd of retainers. There was a flavor of the burial of Sir John Moore about the whole business—especially the hush and not a funeral note being heard—we marching with measured tread, the municipal police bringing up the rear, and Seumanutafa in the centre, nearly seven feet high and bearing a white umbrella above his stately head.

Silver Tongue was standing in the front of his shop having an altercation with the Chief Justice about a ham (for he did a little in groceries as well as baked) as we hove in sight and began to file down the lane to Papalangi Mativa's quarters behind the Southern Cross Bakery. I suppose Silver Tongue thought our man was hurt or something, for he came running after us with a bottle of square-face and a packet of first aid to the wounded, elbowing his way excitedly through the crowd to where we had deposited To'oto'o at the feet of Papalangi Mativa. He was the most astonished baker in the South Seas as he saw who lay there in the jumble of beef and biscuit, and for a moment was too stupefied to let out a word.

I don't mean to go into the speech-making part of the performance, for what between Seumanutafa and Papalangi Mativa, and the talking-man Sasa had lent me for the occasion, and a divinity student who happened along, and somebody who said he was Fale Upolu and spoke for the entire Group, and an aged faipule from the Union Islands who seemed to have some kind of a grievance about his father's head, and the Chief Justice who had to butt in with the capitation tax—we were kept there a matter of three hours or more until at last the principals officially made it up, To'oto'o was forgiven, and everything ended happily.

"Now, Silver Tongue," I said as the meeting dispersed, "we'll consider that head affair canceled, and if you'll come over to my house to-night I dare say you'll find Rosalie sitting on the front veranda!"

"And do you for a moment think," he said with a strange, writhen smile, "dat all dis talk and domfoolery will a gruel murder undo and the young man cut off in his brime restore? Weel those lips, so gold in death, stir, think you, in the box where we laid him? Will my dead wife's family be less bereaved because of two kegs of beef and three tins of biscuit, or Rosalie's family less disgraced because her uncle was triced through the streets like a big? No, Gaptain Branscombe, I'm only a poor paker, but I'd count myself a traider to my family were I to dake a murderess for my pride!"



"Rosalie isn't a murderess," I said.

"I meant niece of a murderer," he returned.

I was too speechless with indignation to utter another word. In the course of sixty years on this planet I've seen many kinds of men, and I've learned to detect in some a certain look about the eyes—a curious light and a far-away dreaminess of expression—that seems always the sign or mark of an unflinching obstinacy. I remember that selfsame look on Brand's face as we lay all flattened on the water-tanks of the Moroa, and he blew the main deck off the ship together with three hundred human beings; and I guess the Christian martyrs had it, too, when lions tore them to pieces and bulls kited them on their horns in the Colosseum. Anyway, it was as plain as daylight that I had lost my time and money in bothering about Oppenstedt, and that I might as well give him up as the most incorrigible, stiff-necked, self-opinionated, blunderheaded ass and lunatic this side of Muggin.

I gave him a wide berth after this and took the other side of the street when I saw him coming; while he, for his part, would have cheerfully run a mile for the chance of avoiding me. I had cares of my own, too, about this time, what with the loss of the Daisy Walker and my libel suit with Grevsmuhl, and other things to think about than that of bringing twin souls together. So the days drifted on and months came and went, and it seemed all over for good between Rosalie and Silver Tongue. Then that labor captain turned up again, him I had had trouble with before, a black-eyed, fierce, handsome little fellow, who was hotter than ever after my girl. Rosalie was just in the humor to do something awful, for she was desperately unhappy with spells of wild gayety between, and a recklessness about herself that frightened me more than I can tell. She laughed in my face when I warned her about the labor captain and told me straight out she was only a half-caste and it didn't matter what became of her. And from the way she carried on and got herself talked about from one end of the beach to the other, it began to look as though she meant what she said. Altogether I felt pretty blue about her and savage enough against Silver Tongue to have——! Well, what on earth could I do? What could anybody do? Why had God ever made such a silly ass of a baker?

One day I got a note from Sasa French that took me up to Malifa at a tearing run. Scanlon, the half-caste policeman, was there, and when I had listened to his story I threw my hat in the air and shouted like a boy, and Sasa and I waltzed up and down the veranda to the petrifaction of two missionary ladies who happened to be passing in tow of some gazaber from the Home Society. Sasa and I plumped into a buggy, and with Scanlon on horseback pounding behind us we made all sail for Seumanutafa's. Bidding him follow we then raced off to Mulinu'u where, sure enough, we found a young man named Tautala in one of the houses, who brought out the music-box and very soon satisfied me as to the truth of what Scanlon had said. Then at a slower pace, so that Tautala might keep up with us, we walked to To'oto'o's house and taxed him with the whole business.

"THIS IS A BLACK BUSINESS, SILVER TONGUE," I SAID

At first he made some show of denying it, but what could he say with Scanlon and Tautala risen witness against him? He tried to refuse to come with us (which would have spoiled everything) until Scanlon took a hand in the fray and let his imagination run riot about the law, which, as he was the official representative of it and wore a pewter star on his breast, soon settled To'oto'o's half-hearted objections. If anything else were wanted it was the arrival at this juncture of Seumanutafa at the head of a dozen retainers who added the finishing stroke to the little resistance To'oto'o had left. Then we all started off for the Southern Cross Bakery, and as we walked slowly and naturally attracted a good deal of attention, and as we told every one we met where we were going to and why—we grew and grew until as I looked down the procession I couldn't see the end of it. The Chief Justice was sucked in. Likewise the President. Marquardt, the Chief of Police, joined us; Haggard, the Land Commissioner; some Mormon missionaries; two lay brothers from the school; a lot of passengers from the mail boat, with handkerchiefs stuck into their sweaty collars; Captain Hufnagel on horseback with a small army of Guadalcanaar laborers; half the synod of the Wesleyan Church in white lavalavas and hymn-books; a picnic party that had just returned (not wholly sober) from the Papase'ea; blue-jackets from the Sperber; blue-jackets from the Walleroo; three survivors of the British bark Windsor Castle, burned at sea; a German scientist in Jaeger costume with blue spectacles and a butterfly net; six whole boatloads of an aumoenga party from Manu'a; a lot of political prisoners on parole; two lepers and Charley Taylor!

It was well we had brought Marquardt with us, for he and his police caught the humor of the thing, and on reaching the bakery formed us up in a great hollow square with one side blank for Silver Tongue, who stood and gazed at us transfixed from the shade of his veranda. Then Seumanutafa, Sasa, Scanlon, Tautala, To'oto'o and I broke ranks and marched up to him.

"Old man," I said, "if you were to think a year you'd never guess what brought us here to-day!"

"It's O's head again," he said, grinding his teeth and casting a vitriolic glance at To'oto'o, "and if there was any law or order in this God-forsaken land"—he looked daggers at the Chief Justice as he said this—"that feller would have got short jift for murdering my fader-in-law's aunt's son!"

"He didn't murder him," I said.

Silver Tongue's jaw fell. He looked at us quite overcome. For a minute he couldn't say a word.

"Oh, but he deed," he said at last.

"It was Tautala that killed him," I said, indicating the young man we had brought from Mulinu'u, "and it turns out he sold your relation's head to To'oto'o for seven dollars and a music-box." At this, smiling from ear to ear, Tautala held up the music-box to public view and would have set it going had not something fortunately caught in the works.

"It's a lie!" gasped Silver Tongue. "It's a lie!"

"Scanlon himself was at the battle," I went on, "and he saw the whole thing and was a witness to Tautala getting the seven dollars, and he made To'oto'o pony up four dollars more as the price of his own secrecy."

"Four dollars," ejaculated Scanlon. "That's right, Captain Branscombe. Four dollars!"

"So, if you are angry with anybody," I said, "you ought to be angry with Tautala. All To'oto'o did was to buy a little cheap notoriety for eleven dollars and a music-box."

I never saw a man so stung in all my life as Oppenstedt. The eyes seemed to start from his head, and he glared at To'oto'o as though he could have strangled him. Tautala was quite forgotten in the intensity of his indignation toward Rosalie's uncle. You see he had been hating To'oto'o ferociously for six months and couldn't switch off at a moment's notice on an absolute stranger like Tautala. Besides, his hatred for To'oto'o had become a kind of monomania with him, and now here I was telling him what a fool he had made of himself and proving it with two witnesses and a music-box. No wonder that he was staggered.

"Now, old fellow," I said, "we'll call bygones bygones, and maybe you'll let us see a little more of you than we've been doing lately."

"You mean Rosalie, of gourse," he said, snapping the words like a mad dog.

"Yes, Rosalie," I said.

"Gaptain Branscombe," he said, his face convulsed with passion, "that gossumate liar and hybocrite has made such a thing impossible. Far rader would I lay me in the grave—far rader would I have wild horses on me trample—than that I should indermarry with a family and bossibly betaint my innocent kinder with the plood of so shogging and unprincibled a liar. A man so lost to shame, so beplunged in cowardice and deceit that he couldn't his own heads cut off, but must buy dem of others and faunt himself a hero while honest worth bassed unnoticed and bushed aside."

"It was honest worth that chopped off the head of your father-in-law's aunt's son!" I said.

"Gaptain," he returned, "there are oggasions when in condrast to a liar—to a golossal liar—to one who has made a peeziness of systematic deception—a murderer is a shentlemans!"

"Oh, you villain baker!" cried Sasa, joining in. "You make tougafiti. You never want marry the girl at all. All the time you say something different. Oh, you bad mans, you break girls' hearts—and serve you right somebody cut your head off!"

"Wish they would," I said, out of all patience with the fellow. "First he can't marry Rosalie because her uncle's a murderer. Now he can't marry her because her uncle's a liar. Disprove that, and he'd dig up some fresh objection!"

"I lofe her! I lofe her!" protested Silver Tongue.

"Come, come," I said, "you aren't marrying the girl's adopted uncle."

"A traidor to my family? No, Gaptain, dat is what I can never be," said Silver Tongue.

"Traitor—nothing!" I said.

"Oh, the silly baker," said Sasa.

"He speaks like a delirious person," said Seumanutafa.

"Now about that ham," said the Chief Justice, belligerently coming forward and speaking in rich Swedish accents, "when I send my servant for a ham, Mr. Oppenstedt, I want a good ham—not a great, coarse, fat, stinking lump of dog-meat——"

"Let's go," I said to Sasa; "Captain Morse is holding back the Alameda for a talk, and I know there's an iced bucket of something in the corner of his cabin."

"Wish the dear old captain would land and punch his head off," said Sasa vindictively.

"Whose head?" I asked.

"Silver Tongue's," she returned.

Sasa had always plagued me to get up a moonlight sailing party on the Nukanono, a little fifteen-ton schooner of mine that plied about the Group. From one reason and another the thing had never come off, though we had talked and

BAD BREAKS IN BUSINESS

By M. Martin Kallman

LOOSE BUSINESS METHODS THAT CAUSE HEAVY LOSSES AND EAT UP THE PROFITS

ERRORS are by far the most expensive luxuries in which the business man to-day indulges. All men of large affairs will cheerfully admit this—and in the same breath will add: "But they are human and inevitable; consequently we must stand them with such grace as we can muster." There is a grain of truth in this assertion, but it is only a speck in the bulk of the bushel. Seventy-five per cent. of business mistakes—or, as they are generally called, business "breaks"—are easily avoidable. They can be effectively guarded against—as they will be when the office and accounting departments are made as automatic and as systematically perfect as the shop.

In business as in morals it is the "little foxes" which most persistently and effectively spoil the vines. By the mere failure properly to index a letter the boy who receives only three or four dollars a week often throws the entire routine of a big business house into confusion and entails an expenditure of time, on the part of high-salaried heads of departments, that would more than offset his own wages for an entire month. This is one of the most common and annoying of the little "breaks" that interrupt the smooth running of office affairs—and one that is less the fault of the boy or girl than of the system governing the routine of the office. Especially is this form of error likely to occur in the indexing of office copies of outgoing correspondence duplicated in the old-fashioned "flimsy" letter-press book. Any person who has attempted to index the contents of one of these books of tissue sheets will readily appreciate the force of this observation. And this variety of mistake will continue to occur so long as business men adhere to an obsolete system of recording their correspondence. Any office system that leaves openings for unintentional errors also gives opportunity for "crooked work" on the part of unprincipled employees who are bright enough to see the weakness of the office mechanism with which they are working. This is clearly illustrated by an incident which occurred in the shipping-room of one of the largest wholesale hardware establishments in this country.

Leaks in the Shipping Department

Practically the universal method employed in wholesale shipping-rooms is, briefly, this: All the goods going out to one patron in a single shipment are assembled in a big pile on a long table where they are, for the second time, "called and checked" by the clerk and his assistant before being actually packed in the shipping-case. In most houses the salesman, when not out on the road, is a privileged character in the shipping-room and often exercises a personal supervision over the shipment of his orders.

This common practice prevailed in the hardware establishment to which I refer. The sales of one of the traveling men for this institution suddenly became phenomenally large and he was in high favor with the management until a letter was received from a small country customer asking that he be allowed to exchange a half-dozen fine saws for other goods of which he was in greater need. Naturally, reference to this man's orders was had to determine how recently the saws had been purchased. This developed the fact that the customer in question had not bought any saws of the house within a year, and he was so informed, the suggestion being made that probably he had bought them of some other firm.

Then came the answer that there was no mistake about it; that the traveling salesman for the house had told him that, in appreciation of a large order, he would be presented with a dozen fine saws for which no bill would be rendered. He had received the saws according to the agreement, but wished to exchange half of them for other goods of their value.

Nothing was said to the salesman concerned in the transaction, but his movements were placed under close and secret surveillance. As a result he was one day followed to the shipping-room where he had a score or more of shipments stacked up on the long tables. After they had been checked for the last time the salesman came from the stock-room with several bundles in his arms. As opportunity offered, he deposited one of these packages on each shipment of goods outgoing upon his orders. These were opened and each found to contain goods of several dollars in value. If the letter asking for an exchange of the "prize saws" had not placed him under suspicion, the goods which had not been recorded on his orders or on the corresponding bills would have been tumbled into the packing-cases and his patrons would have been substantial gainers by the transaction. It need scarcely be added that the house at once introduced a system which made this kind of indirect stealing impossible. Of course, the men who received these "prize packages" supposed they were given with the full knowledge and consent of the house.

Again, it often occurs that where two shipments are stacked upon the same table a package accidentally falls from the higher heap upon the lower one after the last checking has been done. Consequently, one shipment is short while the other is the gainer. The customer whose invoice is short promptly reports his loss; but generally the man who has profited by the accident holds his peace and does not return the extra package, well knowing that his chance gain cannot be traced to him.

As the instance already cited will amply indicate, there can be no question that the inadequacy of ordinary "stock records" and of system in the shipping department of commercial houses is one of the most fertile sources of expensive "breaks" to-day existing in the business world. Examples disclosing many other special points of weakness in this department of mercantile houses might be multiplied. It is sufficient, however, to say that, generally speaking, this is probably the most loosely organized of all departments, though it is easily as capable of systemization as any other.

Confusion Caused by Back Orders

Next in rank as a fruitful field of errors comes the order department. Here the chief stumbling-block is the "back order." In filling an order it is found, for example, that two items are not in stock. Under the general practice these are to be sent in the next shipment to that customer, and the order, with the two unchecked items, is placed on the "filing clip" devoted to back orders. If the clerk happens to remember, when this man's next order is received, that he has two items from a former "sheet" that are still unfilled, the customer will not be disappointed. But thousands of times the back order is forgotten, the file on the clip is not consulted, and the patron is alienated by the failure to receive the two items from his previous order. The possibility of this occurrence is easily obviated by a system which is automatic, and sends a signal to the order or shipping clerk apprising him of back orders for each and every customer. That is a signal which at once tells the clerk to consult the back-order file. Careless posting and checking of the order register is responsible for thousands of "breaks" which cause severe loss of business, for there is no kind of a mistake to which the ordinary customer is more sensitive than the overlooking of an order. He will excuse an error in accounting, for that does not play havoc with his own trade and can be adjusted while he is serving the patrons with the goods about which the "break" has occurred; but when he fails to receive merchandise for which a patron is waiting, and which his competitor is able promptly to supply, he is in a mood to end his relationship with the wholesale house which occasions his difficulty.

It would seem almost impossible that an actual and accidental loss of currency, checks, drafts, or other form of remittance should occur in a well-regulated commercial house; but scores of such "breaks" occur, and sometimes entail great hardship upon innocent persons. One of the most curious and interesting episodes that I have ever known admirably illustrates this possibility.

Every credit man has a number of accounts which he subjects to the closest scrutiny. This makes it necessary that he shall have immediate knowledge of all remittances made by customers who are on the "anxious list." In the house to which I refer the remittances were first sent to the cashier, who posted them and then sent to the credit man to enable him to make his daily deductions and keep in touch with collections, after which they were returned to the cashier.

On this occasion the cashier sent a score of remittance letters, with checks attached, to the credit man, who glanced them through, and, an hour later, sent them back by his own messenger boy. Shortly afterward the credit man left his desk and was just passing out of the little "wicket" in the railing that partitioned his department from the remainder of the office when he was met by an old friend who was a large patron of the house. He paused for a long conversation with this caller and then walked back to his desk.

That night the credit man died very suddenly. And that night the cashier found that he was precisely $300 short in his cash. In vain he struggled with his books but could find no error. Others went over his books but with no better results. Finally he charged himself with the amount of the shortage, but even this did not wholly clear him of liability of being under the suspicion that he had executed a clever ruse to draw an advance of $300 on his salary. He was a sensitive man and the occurrence caused him not a little mental suffering.

About three months after the episode a new employee chanced to take from the coat closet the light office coat which the dead credit man had worn. Curiosity prompted him to feel in the pockets of the garment and he drew out a crumpled check from a country customer for $300. It was immediately taken, with the coat, to the cashier, whose delight was unconcealed.

Of course the explanation of the matter was then simple. The credit man had not, as the cashier supposed, returned this check with the others, but had held it for further investigation. Then he had started with it in his hand, intending personally to turn it in at the cashier's window. But on his way he was met by his friend, and in the course of their interesting conversation had unthinkingly thrust it into his pocket and forgotten it completely. That night he had died. Possibly some feeling of superstition had caused his associates to avoid the coat which he had so long worn at his desk. In any event, it had hung undisturbed in its accustomed place until the new employee had encountered and examined it, to the relief and delight of the cashier. Very likely the customer who sent the check may have wondered why his bank balance was not diminished by the amount of his remittance; but so long as its receipt had been acknowledged by the wholesale house he evidently did not feel called upon to make any inquiries.

The Office Pet a Costly One

Though it is clearly impossible automatically to guard against those "breaks" in business which are purely errors of individual judgment, there are various mistakes apparently of this nature that are amenable to certain sound rules of procedure which operate in a precautionary way as effectively as do the more mechanical devices of a thorough office system. In this class of errors one of the most common and costly is a refusal on the part of those in authority to investigate the work of relatives, special friends or "office pets" who are under their supervision.

Not long ago the head of a very large establishment, doing an immense shipping business, employed an expert to make a thorough examination of the affairs of the house. The investigation progressed smoothly until the department of express "pre-pays" was reached. This was in charge of the adopted son of the president of the corporation. Repeatedly the young man gave the excuse that the books of this department were home where he had taken them for the purpose of doing night work. Finally the expert reported to the president this obstacle to a complete examination of the affairs of the company.

"Oh, that's all right," replied the official; "I suppose the boy feels a little sensitive because of his relation to me. I'll be responsible for his department without the formality of an investigation."

Finally, however, the expert persuaded the head of the business to give him an order on the various express companies that would allow him to check up the amount of prepaid express charges. Then he compared these with the shipping vouchers and speedily discovered discrepancies amounting to many thousands of dollars. That night the adopted son disappeared in disgrace and forfeited his relationship to the man who trusted him implicitly and would some day have left him a large fortune.

And in this connection it should be said, with all possible emphasis, that the generally accepted theory of implicitly trusting employees who have enjoyed long tenure of service is, unfortunately, at variance with the facts revealed by experience. The records of commercial investigation show that very few men venture to steal from their employers during the first six months of their service, whereas the greater amount of embezzlements and defalcations are the work of men who have continuously held their positions of trust for many years, gaining the complete confidence of their employers, mastering every detail of office routine, learning the mental habits of their associates and acquiring a certain standing and authority that smothers suspicion and insures them against investigation. Not that they deliberately set out to lay this basis for rascality. Generally their departure from the path of honesty comes under pressure of some peculiar temptation which is aggravated by the fact that these phases of their environment seem to promise them immunity from detection.

Again it should be remembered that prosperity, like charity, covers a multitude of sins. When a business house is making large profits it is far less likely to discover leaks either from accidental errors or from peculations than when it has difficulty in "making both ends meet." In the latter case it becomes necessary to keep a vigilant watch upon every resource. Quite recently it was discovered that an employee in one of the largest mercantile houses of this country had, in comparatively a few years, stolen the sensational sum of one million dollars; but the establishment had made so large a volume of profits that even this princely fortune was not missed, the detection of its loss having been an accident.

Allowing any employee to monopolize information of special value should be classed among the most serious of business errors. Very often the credit man is an example in this line. Once a man in this position refused to have his department examined or systemized by an expert who had been called in to serve the house. His attitude was reported to the head of the establishment, who replied:

"Why, that man has been with us for twenty-seven years. He is our encyclopædia and knows our trade by heart. We couldn't do business without him, and if he's got his back up I guess we'll have to surrender."

At last, however, the credit man was practically forced to take a vacation, during which his department was closely examined. Though nothing reflecting upon his honesty was discovered, it was shown that he was carrying "under his hat" and as a personal monopoly the information which belonged to the records of the house, and which the house had borne the expense of acquiring. On this showing the head of the establishment finally confessed: "He has been with us about twenty-seven years too long." Consequently the credit man's vacation was made indefinite, and the information he monopolized is now made of record and is a part of the assets of the house.

The Value of Office Analysis

Another illustration of the results of allowing an employee to monopolize information comes to my recollection in connection with a large wholesale drug house. In this business, as in several others, prices on a large variety of goods are subject to daily fluctuation. Therefore "pricers" are employed to each day figure the prices to be charged for certain commodities, in accordance with the law of supply and demand and other significant considerations. This is not the simple task which it might seem, for a certain ingredient of a compounded drug may suddenly become scarce while another will depreciate in value.

One day the chief pricer of a large house left on a vacation. When he returned at the end of two weeks he carefully examined the prices made by his assistant. The figures, which he showed with considerable pride to the head of the house, demonstrated that through his absence for twelve days the house had lost $1500, because the prices had not been figured from all the data that should have been taken into consideration by the pricers. It did not occur to him that by the same token he convicted himself of a failure so to systemize his work and record vital data that another might take up his work without serious loss to the establishment. Judged on his own figures, for the one week, this loss would in a year have amounted to about $35,000.

Another serious "break" in business is the failure systematically to keep vigilant watch upon the comparative amounts of trade done by a customer during different periods. When a customer who is in the habit, for example, of ordering five bags of coffee orders only one, there is but one conclusion to be drawn from the viewpoint of the house: he is dividing his coffee trade with another firm. Certainly the only safe thing for the house to do is to draw this inference. Under a thorough system this deviation from the habit of the customer would be instantly noticed, and he would be written a letter politely inquiring if anything unsatisfactory in the previous treatment he had received from the establishment was responsible for the falling-off in the amount of his order.

When the management of a large commercial house is not alive to the fact that the office end of the business should be a positive trade-producing factor, he is in one of the business errors that will cut deeply into his profits if he is not in the enjoyment of a monopoly. It is a poor office that is not a close second to the salesmen's department as an actual trade-getting factor.

Often some decidedly fantastic complications are brought about in the order department, owing to a lack of proper method. In a very large wholesale house a telegram from a distant customer was received which read: "Duplicate our order No. 865." A few days later a letter from the same customer again instructed the duplication of the order bearing that number. While this second order was being filled the buyer from the firm in question arrived in the city, went to the wholesale house, and among other purchases duplicated the items in "order 865."

Several days later the distant customer was heard from with emphasis, frantically asking why the house had shipped three times the amount of each kind of merchandise that had been ordered. Of course the explanation of the matter was very simple. The letter was intended as a confirmation of the telegram, not as a new order. Then the house of the

CHAPTER XVI

ON A CERTAIN Monday, about the middle of May, Jadwin sat at Gretry's desk (long since given over to his use), in the office on the ground floor of the Board of Trade, swinging nervously back and forth in the swivel chair, drumming his fingers upon the arms, and glancing continually at the clock that hung against the opposite wall. It was about eleven in the morning. The Board of Trade vibrated with the vast trepidation of the Pit, that for two hours had spun and sucked, and guttered and disgorged just overhead. The waiting-room of the office was more than usually crowded. Parasites of every description polished the walls with shoulder and elbow. Millionaires and beggars jostled one another about the doorway. The vice-president of a bank watched the door of the private office covertly; the traffic manager of a railroad exchanged yarns with a group of reporters while awaiting his turn.

As Gretry, the great man's lieutenant, hurried through the anteroom, conversation suddenly ceased, and half a dozen of the more impatient sprang forward. But the broker pushed his way through the crowd, excusing himself as best he might, and entering the office, closed the door behind him.

At the clash of the lock Jadwin started half-way up from his chair, then, recognizing the broker, sank back with a quick breath.

"Why don't you knock, or something, Sam?" he exclaimed. "Might as well kill a man as scare him to death. Well, how goes it?"

"All right. I've fixed the warehouse crowd—and we just about own the editorial and news sheets of these papers." He threw a memorandum down upon the desk. "I'm off now. Got an appointment with the Northwestern crowd in ten minutes. Has Hargus or Scannel shown up yet?"

"Hargus is always out in your customers' room," answered Jadwin. "I can get him whenever I want him. But Scannel has not shown up yet. I thought when we put up the price again Friday we'd bring him in. I thought you'd figured out that he couldn't stand that rise."

"No more he can't," answered Gretry. "He'll be in to see you to-morrow or next day."

"To-morrow or next day won't do," answered Jadwin. "I want to put the knife into him to-day. You go up there on the floor and put the price up another cent. That will bring him, or I'll miss my guess."

Gretry nodded. "All right," he said; "it's your game. Shall I see you at lunch?"

"Lunch! I can't eat. But I'll drop around and hear what the Northwestern people had to say to you."

A few moments after Gretry had gone Jadwin heard the ticker on the other side of the room begin to chatter furiously; and at the same time he could fancy that the distant thunder of the Pit grew suddenly more violent, taking on a sharper, shriller note. He looked at the tape. The one-cent rise had been effected.

"You will hold out, will you, you brute?" muttered Jadwin. "See how you like that now." He took out his watch. "You'll be running in to me in just about ten minutes' time."

He turned about, and calling a clerk, gave orders to have Hargus found.

When the old fellow appeared Jadwin jumped up and gave him his hand as he came slowly forward.

His rusty top hat was in his hand; from the breast-pocket of his faded and dirty frock coat a bundle of ancient newspapers protruded. His shoestring tie straggled over his frayed shirt front, while at his wrist one of his crumpled cuffs, detached from the sleeve, showed the bare, thin wrist and encumbered the fingers in which he held the unlit stump of a fetid cigar.

MR. SCANNEL

Evidently bewildered as to the cause of this summons, he looked up perplexed at Jadwin as he came up out of his dim, red-lidded eyes.

"Sit down, Hargus. Glad to see you," called Jadwin.

"Hey?"

The voice was faint and a little querulous.

"I say, sit down. Have a chair. I want to have a talk with you. You ran a corner in wheat once yourself."

"Oh! . . . Wheat."

"Yes, your corner. You remember?"

"Yes. Oh, that was long ago. In seventy-eight it was—the September option. And the Board made wheat in the cars 'regular.'"

His voice trailed off into silence, and he looked vaguely about on the floor of the room, sucking in his cheeks, and passing the edge of one large, bony hand across his lips.

"Well, you lost all your money that time, I believe. Scannel, your partner, sold out on you."

"Hey? It was in seventy-eight. . . . The secretary of the Board announced our suspension at ten in the morning. If the Board had not voted to make wheat in the cars 'regular'——"

He went on and on, in an impassive monotone, repeating, word for word, the same phrases he had used for so long that they had lost all significance.

"Well," broke in Jadwin at last, "it was Scannel, your partner, did for you. Scannel, I say. You know, Dave Scannel."

The old man looked at him confusedly. Then, as the name forced itself upon the atrophied brain there flashed for one instant into the pale, blurred eye a light, a glint, a brief, quick spark of an old, long-forgotten fire. It gleamed there an instant, and the next sank again.

Plaintively, querulously he repeated:

"It was in seventy-eight. . . . I lost three hundred thousand dollars."

"How's your little niece getting on?" at last demanded Jadwin.

"My little niece—you mean Lizzie? . . . Well and happy, well and happy. I—I got"—he drew a thick bundle of dirty papers from his pocket, envelopes, newspapers, circulars, and the like—"I—I—I got, I got her picture here somewheres."

"Yes, yes, I know, I know," cried Jadwin. "I've seen it. You showed it to me yesterday, you remember."

"I—I got it here somewheres . . . somewheres," persisted the old man, fumbling and peering, and as he spoke the clerk from the doorway announced:

"Mr. Scannel."

This last was a large, thick man, red-faced, with white, short whiskers of an almost wiry texture. He had a small, gimletlike eye, enormous, hairy ears, wore a "sack" suit, a highly polished top hat, and entered the office with a great flourish of manner and a defiant trumpeting: "Well, how do, Captain?"

Jadwin nodded, glancing up under his scowl.

"Hello!" he said.

The other subsided into a chair, and returned scowl for scowl.

"Oh, well," he muttered, "if that's your style."

He had observed Hargus sitting by the other side of the desk, still fumbling and mumbling in his dirty memoranda, but he gave no sign of recognition. There was a moment's silence, then in a voice from which all the first bluffness was studiously excluded Scannel said:

"Well, you've rung the bell on me. I'm a sucker. I know it. I'm one of the few hundred other fools that you've managed to catch out shooting snipe. Now, what I want to know is, how much is it going to cost me to get out of your corner? What's the figure? What do you say?"

"I got a good deal to say," remarked Jadwin, scowling again.

But Hargus had at last thrust a photograph into his hands.

"There it is," he said. "That's it. That's Lizzie."

Jadwin took the picture without looking at it, and as he continued to speak, held it in his fingers, and occasionally tapped it upon the desk.

"I know. I know, Hargus," he answered. "I got a good deal to say, Mr. David Scannel. Do you see this old man here?"

"Oh, cut it out!" growled the other.

"It's Hargus. You know him very well. You used to know him better. You and he together tried to swing a great big deal in September wheat once upon a time. Hargus! I say, Hargus!"

The old man looked up.

"Here's the man we were talking about—Scannel, you remember. Remember Dave Scannel, who was your partner in seventy-eight? Look at him. This is him now. He's a rich man now. Remember Scannel?"

—HE DREW A THICK BUNDLE OF DIRTY PAPERS FROM HIS POCKET

Hargus, his bleared old eyes blinking and watering, looked across the desk at the other.

"Oh, what's the game?" exclaimed Scannel. "I ain't here on exhibition, I guess. I——"

But he was interrupted by a sharp, quick gasp that all at once issued from Hargus' trembling lips. The old man said no word, but he leaned far forward in his chair, his eyes fixed upon Scannel, his breath coming short, his fingers dancing against his chin.

"Yes, that's him, Hargus," said Jadwin. "You and he had a big deal on your hands a long time ago," he continued, turning suddenly upon Scannel, a pulse in his temple beginning to beat. "A big deal, and you sold him out——"

"It's a lie!" cried the other.

Jadwin beat his fist upon the arm of his chair. His voice was almost a shout as he answered:

"You—sold—him—out. I know you. I know the kind of bug you are. You ruined him to save your own dirty hide, and all his life since poor old Hargus has been living off the charity of the boys down here, pinched and hungry and neglected, and getting on, God knows how; yes, and supporting his little niece, too, while you, you have been loafing about your clubs, and sprawling on your steam yachts—on the money you stole from him."

Scannel squared himself in his chair, his little eyes twinkling.

"Look here," he cried furiously, "I don't take that kind of talk from the best man that ever wore shoe-leather. Cut it out, understand? Cut it out."

Jadwin's lower jaw set with a menacing click; aggressive, masterful, he leaned forward.

"You interrupt me again," he declared, "and you'll go out of that door a bankrupt. You listen to me and take my orders. That's what you're here to-day for. If you think you can get your wheat somewheres else, suppose you try."

Scannel sullenly settled himself in his place. He did not answer. Hargus, his eye wandering again, looked distressfully from one to the other. Then, after a moment, Jadwin, after shuffling among the papers of his desk, fixed a certain memorandum with his glance. All at once, whirling about and facing the other, he said quickly:

"You are short to our firm two million bushels at a dollar a bushel."

"Nothing of the sort," cried the other. "It's a million and a half."

Jadwin could not forbear a twinkle of grim humor as he saw how easily Scannel had fallen into the trap.

"You're short a million and a half, then," he repeated. "I'll let you have six hundred thousand at a dollar fifty."

"A dollar and a half! Why, it's ruin, man! Oh, well"—Scannel spread out his hands nonchalantly—"I shall simply go into bankruptcy—just as you said."

"Oh, no, you won't," replied Jadwin, pushing back and crossing his legs. "I've had your financial standing computed very carefully, Mr. Scannel. You've got the ready money. I know what you can stand without busting to the fraction of a cent."

"Why, it's ridiculous. That handful of wheat will cost me three hundred thousand dollars."

"Pre-cisely."

And then all at once Scannel surrendered. Stony, imperturbable, he drew his check-book from his pocket.

"Make it payable to bearer," said Jadwin.

The other complied, and Jadwin took the check and looked it over carefully.

"Now," he said, "watch here, Dave Scannel. You see this check? And now," he added, thrusting it into Hargus' hands, "you see where it goes? There's the principal of your debt paid off."

"The principal?"

"You haven't forgotten the interest, have you? I won't compound it, because that might bust you. But six per cent. interest on three hundred thousand since 1878 comes to—let's see—three hundred and sixty thousand dollars. And you still owe me nine hundred thousand bushels of wheat." He ciphered a moment on a sheet of notepaper. "If I charge you a dollar and forty a bushel for that wheat it will come to that sum exactly. . . . Yes, that's correct. I'll let you have the balance of that wheat at a dollar forty. Make the check payable to bearer as before. . . . . Thank you."

He touched his call-bell.

"Kinzie," he said to the clerk who answered it, "after the close of the market to-day send delivery slips for a million and a half wheat to Mr. Scannel. His account with us has been settled."

Jadwin turned to the old man, reaching out the second check to him.

"Here you are, Hargus. Put it away carefully. You see what it is, don't you? Buy your Lizzie a little gold watch with a hundred of it, and tell her it's from Curtis Jadwin, with his compliments. . . . What, going, Scannel? Well, good-by to you, sir, and hey!" he called after him, "please don't slam the door as you go out."

But he dodged with a defensive gesture as the pane of glass almost leaped from its casing as Scannel stormed across the threshold.

Jadwin turned to Hargus with a solemn wink.

"He did slam it, after all, didn't he?"

The old fellow, however, sat fingering the two checks in silence. Then he looked up at Jadwin, scared and trembling.

"I—I don't know," he murmured feebly. "I am a very old man. This—this is a great deal of money, sir. I—I can't say; I—I don't know. I'm an old man . . . an old man."

"You won't lose 'em, now?"

"No, no. I'll deposit them at once in the Illinois Trust. I shall ask—I should like——"

"I'll send a clerk with you."

"Yes, yes, that is about what—what I—what I was about to suggest. But I must say, Mr. Jadwin——"

He began to stammer his thanks. But Jadwin cut him off. Rising, he guided Hargus to the door, one hand on his shoulder, and at the entrance to the outer office called a clerk.

"Take Mr. Hargus over to the Illinois Trust, Kinzie, and introduce him. He wants to open an account."

The old man started off with the clerk, but before Jadwin had reseated himself at his desk was back again. He was suddenly all excitement as if a great idea had abruptly taken possession of him. Stealthy, furtive, he glanced continually over his shoulder as he spoke, talking in whispers, a trembling hand shielding his lips.

"You—you are in—you are in control now," he said. "You could give—hey? You could give me—just a little—just one word. A word would be enough, hey?—hey? Just a little tip. I could make fifty dollars by noon."

"Why, man, I've just given you about half a million."

"Half a million? I don't know. But"—he plucked Jadwin tremulously by the sleeve—"just a word," he begged. "Hey, just yes or no,"

"Haven't you enough with those two checks?"

"Those checks? Oh, I know, I know, I know. I'll salt 'em down. Yes, in the Illinois Trust. I won't touch 'em—not those. But just a little tip now, hey?"

"Not a word. Not a word. Take him along, Kinzie."

One week after this Jadwin sold, through his agents in Paris, a tremendous line of "cash" wheat at a dollar and sixty cents per bushel. By now the foreign demand was a thing almost insensate. There was no question as to the price. It was, "Give us the wheat, at whatever cost, at whatever figure, at whatever expense; only that it be rushed to our markets with all the swiftness of steam and steel." At home, upon the Chicago Board of Trade, Jadwin was as completely master of the market as of his own right hand. Everything stopped when he raised a finger; everything leaped to life with the fury of obsession when he nodded his head. His wealth increased with such stupefying rapidity that at no time was he able even to approximate the gains that accrued to him because of his corner. It was more than twenty million, and less than fifty million. That was all he knew. Nor were the everlasting hills more secure than he from the attack of any human enemy. Out of the ranks of the conquered there issued not so much as a whisper of hostility. Within his own sphere no Czar, no satrap, no Caesar ever wielded power more resistless.

"Sam," said Curtis Jadwin at length to the broker—"Sam, nothing in the world can stop me now. They think I've been doing something big, don't they, with this corner. Why, I've only just begun. This is just a feeler. Now I'm going to let 'em know just how big a gun C. J. really is. I'm going to swing this deal right over into July. I'm going to buy in my July shorts."

The two men were in Gretry's office, as usual, and as Jadwin spoke the broker glanced up incredulously.

"Now you are for sure crazy."

Jadwin jumped to his feet.

"Crazy!" he vociferated. "Crazy! What do you mean, Sam? Crazy! Sam, what—— Look here now, don't use that word to me. I—it don't suit. What I've done isn't exactly the work of—of—takes brains, let me tell you. And look here, look here, I say, I'm going to swing this deal right over into July. Think I'm going to let go now, when I've just begun to get a real grip on things? A pretty fool I'd look like to get out now—even if I could. Get out? How are we going to unload our big line of wheat without breaking the price on us? No, sir; not much. This market is going up to two dollars." He smote a knee with his clenched fist, his face going abruptly crimson. "I say two dollars," he cried. "Two dollars, do you hear? It will go there; you'll see—you'll see."

"Reports on the new crop will begin to come in in June." Gretry's warning was almost a cry. "The price of wheat is so high now that God knows how many farmers will plant it this spring. You may have to take care of a record harvest."

"I know better," retorted Jadwin. "I'm watching this thing. You can't tell me anything about it. I've got it all figured out—your 'new crop.'"

"Well, then, you're the Lord Almighty Himself."

"I don't like that kind of joke—I don't like that kind of joke. It's blasphemous," exclaimed Jadwin. "Go get it off on Crookes. He'd appreciate it; but I don't. But this new crop now—look here."

And for upward of two hours Jadwin argued and figured, and showed to Gretry endless tables of statistics to prove that he was right.

But at the end Gretry shook his head. Calmly and deliberately he spoke his mind.

"J., listen to me; you've done a big thing. I know it, and I know, too, that there've been lots of times in the last year or so when I've been wrong and you've been right. But now, J., so help me God, we've reached our limit. Wheat is worth a dollar and a half to-day, and not one cent more. Every eighth over that figure is inflation. If you run it up to two dollars——"

"It will go there of itself, I tell you."

"——if you run it up to two dollars it will be that top-heavy that the littlest kick in the world will knock it over. Be satisfied now with what you got. J., it's common-sense. Close out your long line of May, and then stop. Suppose the price does break a little, you'd still make your pile. But swing this deal over into July, and it's ruin, ruin. I may have been mistaken before, but I know I'm right now. And do you realize, J., that yesterday morning in the Pit there were some short sales? There's some of them dared to go short of wheat against you—even at the very top of your corner—and there was more selling this morning. You've always got to buy, you know. If they all began to sell to you at once they'd bust you. It's only because you've got 'em so scared—I believe—that keeps 'em from it. But it looks to me as though this selling proved that they were picking up heart. They think they can get the wheat from the farmers when the harvesting begins. And I tell you, J., you've put the price of wheat so high that the wheat areas are extending all over the country."

"You're scared," cried Jadwin. "That's the trouble with you, Sam. You've been scared from the start. Can't you see, man, can't you see that this market is a regular tornado?"

"I see that the farmers all over the country are planting wheat as they've never planted it before. Great Scott, J., you're fighting against the earth itself."

"Well, we'll fight it, then. I'll stop those hayseeds. What do I own all these newspapers and trade journals for? We'll begin sending out reports to-morrow that'll discourage any big wheat planting."

"And then, too," went on Gretry, "here's another point. Do you know, you ought to be in bed this very minute. You haven't got any nerves left at all. You acknowledge yourself that you don't sleep any more. And, good Lord, the moment any one of us contradicts you, or opposes you, you go off the handle to beat the Dutch. I know it's a strain, old man, but you want to keep yourself in hand if you go on with this thing. If you should break down now—well, I don't like to think of what would happen. You ought to see a doctor."

"Oh-h, fiddlesticks," exclaimed Jadwin; "I'm all right. I don't need a doctor; haven't time to see one, anyhow. Don't you bother about me. I'm all right."

Was he? That same night, the first he had spent under his own roof for four days, Jadwin lay awake till the clocks struck four, asking himself the same question. No, he was not all right. Something was very wrong with him, and whatever it might be, it was growing worse. The sensation of the iron clamp about his head was almost permanent by now, and just the walk between his room at the Grand Pacific and Gretry's office left him panting and exhausted. Then had come vertigo and strange, inexplicable qualms, as if he were in an elevator that sank under him with terrifying rapidity.

Going to and fro in La Salle Street, where the roar of the Pit dinned forever in his ears, he could forget these strange symptoms. It was the night he dreaded—the long hours he must spend alone. The instant the strain was relaxed, the beat as of hoofs, or as the rush of ungovernable torrents, began in his brain. Always the beat dropped to the same cadence, always the pulse spelled out the same words:

"Wheat-wheat-wheat, wheat-wheat-wheat."

And of late, during the long and still watches of the night, while he stared at the ceiling, or counted the hours that must pass before his next dose of bromide of potassium, a new turn had been given to the screw.

This was a sensation the like of which he found it difficult to describe. But it seemed to be a slow, tense crisping of

The Forces that Keep Us Well

FOUR men have delivered the Huxley lecture which is designed to present each year the most notable discovery or advance in medicine: Sir Michael Foster, Professor Virchow, Lord Lister and Dr. William H. Welch. Doctor Welch is president of the board of directors of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research; he is at the head of a great medical school, and he is the leading pathologist of America and probably of the world. In his lecture, which has just been published, he says, "The first place in experimental medicine to-day is occupied by the problem of immunity." His elaborate demonstrations, showing how within the blood and body are wonderful bacteria fighting hostile invaders, and foreshadowing the marvelous results that must follow larger knowledge, led to the sensational report that he had found a universal antitoxin, a report discussed in hundreds of newspapers, but which was unjustified by the lecture and promptly dismissed as too ridiculous for notice by Doctor Welch.

But the wonderful facts emphasized were that protective agents exist in the human being and that they are fighting all the time for his health and well-being. The problem of medicine to-day is to find out more about them, and there are hundreds of the ablest investigators in both hemispheres who are diligently following and developing the facts. It is all too intricate and too fine for the layman fully to understand, but any intelligence can grasp the statement that in every person are active forces ceaselessly combating his enemies, and that his health depends upon how well he has preserved these good forces by right living. Running through every moment of life there is the constant presence of responsibility and accountability.

It used to be thought that a young man should sow his wild oats and then settle down. The new medicine teaches us that if he ventures upon this period of irregular living he absolutely destroys some of the forces of immunity within him. He is thus made more subject to infection, contagion and diseases of all kinds. The careless person takes these risks as well as the reckless one. It is as though a general should weaken his army by unnecessary and unworthy battles. When the critical times come he would not have his proper strength either for aggression or defense.

Very curious is the parallel between the moral and mental life and the physical existence. The mind that lasts and which is able in the later years to show wonderful resources is the mind that has not wasted the finer forces that battle against the hostile invaders, be they in the form of low thoughts or unworthy employments. In the spiritual life the contest is ever in progress, and the strength of the resistance in the mature years is measured by the powers that have been saved.

So in a very positive way we see that not only in experimental medicine but in the whole range of living the first place is occupied by the problem of immunity. It is by the study of the facts and the clear recognition of the value of the forces within us that we build within ourselves the possibilities of safety and success. We cannot in the later years call back the good agents we destroyed in youth. No medicine or expiation can restore the lost immunities. The only way to have them to buttress and protect the later years is to keep them through all the years. It seems a mighty intricacy when we study the details, but the lesson is so plain that he who runs may read.

Our Grown-up Navy

WHEN the Constitution captured the Guerrière on August 19, 1812, she was fifteen years old. Eighteen years later a proposition to dismantle her aroused the patriotic indignation of Holmes. The new cruiser Philadelphia, whose keel was laid fourteen years ago, has just passed into an inglorious second childhood as a training ship. It was no uncommon thing in the days of wooden sailing craft for a warship to remain in active service for half a century or more. A steel cruiser is decrepit before it is of age.

The retirement of the Philadelphia is notable as marking the end of a cycle in the history of the New Navy. It is not quite twenty years ago, on March 3, 1883, to be exact, that the passage of the law authorizing the construction of the original "White Squadron," the Chicago, Boston and Atlanta, began the modernization of our fleet. Almost every year after that more vessels were provided for. As the new steel ships came in the old wooden ones dropped out. Gradually the character of our navy was transformed. From a wooden fleet with a sprinkling of steel it became a steel fleet with a sprinkling of wood, and finally the wooden vessels disappeared from the active list altogether. Smoothbore muzzle-loaders gave way to breech-loading rifles. Rapid-fire guns and smokeless powder followed, and at last the navy that had been the butt of every skipper of a South American gunboat led the world in the quality of its ships and equipment.

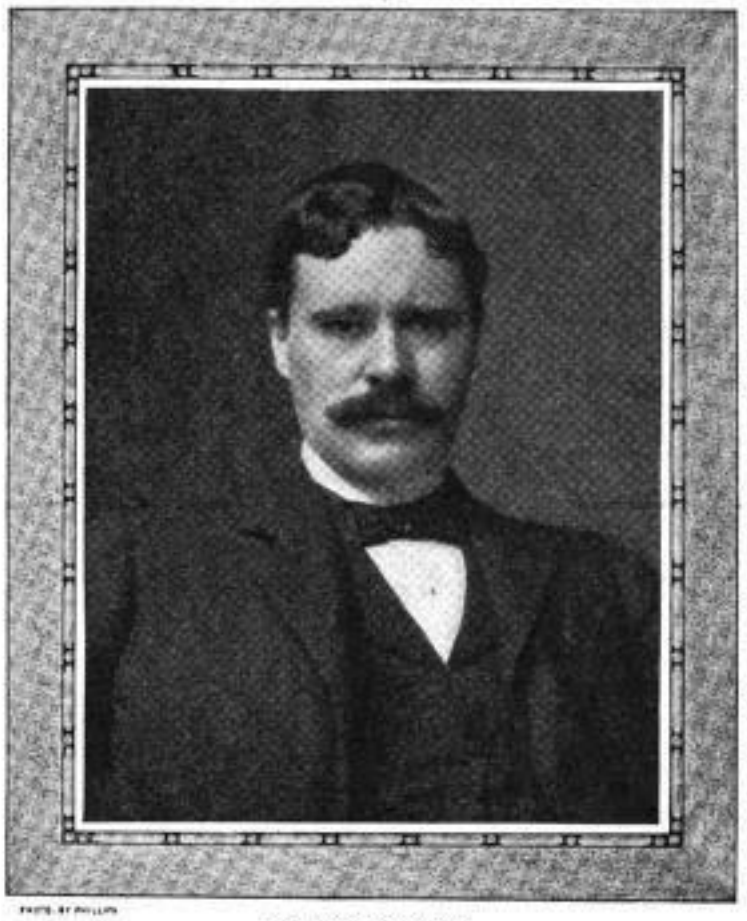
Meanwhile the sharp line of distinction between the "New Navy" and the old one remained. The Charleston was wrecked, the Vesuvius was condemned as unsuited to her purpose, and the Columbia was made a receiving ship to save the expense of keeping her in active service, but none of the ships authorized since 1883 was retired for age. Now, for the first time, the New Navy begins to be depleted by the withdrawal of superannuated vessels. From this time the annual additions to our fleet will no longer be clear gains to our fighting strength—they will be balanced to some extent by the loss of ships struck off the active list. The condemnation of the Philadelphia may be taken as the formal announcement that the New Navy has arrived at maturity.

Fortunately it will be a number of years yet before the losses from superannuation become serious. The Philadelphia's case is exceptional. Vessels four or five years older than she is are still in good condition. A modern warship ought normally to be useful for twenty years. Besides, the ships we built in the experimental years of our naval construction were mostly of small power. We did not begin to lay down first-class battleships until a dozen years ago. The Oregon and her sisters ought still to be in good fighting trim until 1910. By that time our navy may be expected to have reached a state of equilibrium. The item, "Increase of the Navy," in the annual appropriation bill, will then be a misnomer, for unless we have reason to make a special effort the navy will not be increasing. We shall merely be replacing old ships with new ones.

The Return of the Native

STATISTICS are easily available which show the immigration during the past year of Europeans into America, but figures are not so readily come by which give, if one may venture for the moment upon a paradoxical phrasing, the immigration of Americans into America. It may not be perceptible as yet at home, but to those who watch their national life from across the Atlantic it is evident that the ebb-tide has set in, and that slowly but surely the homeward drift has begun. Here and there one learns that household goods are being put into packing-cases, and that exiles who have supported their expatriation with composure for years are now "going back to see what it's like." Broadly speaking, it is perhaps not very important to America whether they return or not, but that they do is significant. Was it not Mr. Howells who wrote of the "good Americans" who go back every ten years or so to see whether it has grown any cheaper to live at home? No one embarks now with that idea. The cost of living in New York, as described by startling articles in the American press which are widely copied abroad, seems appalling. No one is going back to save money, perhaps not even with any great hope of making it. But the American-born inhabitant of Europe feels the itch of curiosity; across the water things are happening which he must see.

It has been for years the conventional thing to reproach the man who lived abroad with getting out of touch with America. Often he bore this reproach with equanimity. Nowadays he feels that he is getting out of touch, not merely with America, but with the world. It is doubtful whether any one who has been continuously in America during the past five years can realize completely the amazing way in which the world's centre of gravity has shifted. Five years ago the American abroad who offered as his opinion that America was the greatest country on earth said it with the air of delivering a challenge. Now, if indeed he manages to get it before his foreign friend, he has only the appearance of uttering the commonest of aphorisms. America, perhaps even prematurely, realized her position; the world now confirms her view. The foreigner is guilty of no disloyalty to his own country; he understands to the full the many advantages which it has over the newer power in the West, but he recognizes also the inexorable march of Fate, and sees that boundless natural resources and the vigor of young life must in time make America the centre of affairs. And the feeling of the returning exile is not on the whole one that would offend the foreigner's sensibilities. He does not take it to be a particular, private and personal virtue of his own that his country is now what it is. But he thanks fortune for the operation of great natural laws which have increased the value of his share in its national life. It would be mere prudence to go home to claim this.



We shall always have colonies abroad. In the first place no one knows how many commercial enterprises we may be managing in Europe. And a certain number of people will always continue to live abroad for pleasure. Europe has certain permanent and inalienable attractions, extremely various in character. We shall never have in America the Champs Élysées, the Théâtre Français, and possibly never ducks as they cook them at the Tour d'Argent. We shall never have Dutch canals and windmills. We shall never have Westminster Abbey, Kentish lanes lined with hawthorn hedges, nor dukes. So there will always be a thousand reasons, good and bad, for life abroad. But, in spite of them, the ebb-tide has set in toward the West.

OWEN WISTER—By David Graham Phillips

WHERE THE AUTHOR OF THE VIRGINIAN FOUND HIS CHARACTERS. SOMETHING OF HIS BELIEF IN HIS ART, AND HOW IT GREW OUT OF HIM

MR. OWEN WISTER

AT THE very first glance Owen Wister, author—or, rather, creator—of The Virginian, recalls Wordsworth's portrait of the open-air man:

"There was a hardness in his cheek,
There was a hardness in his eye,
As if the man had fixed his face
In many a solitary place
Against the wind and open sky."

An admirably complete portrait, swift and simple after the manner of Wordsworth at his greatest. And it fits Owen Wister's smooth, firm skin, positive features and keen, restless, brown eyes as if it had been painted from him.

"Your book proves that you have had extraordinarily intimate experience of the far West for an Eastern man." Mr. Wister is a Philadelphian of Philadelphians and Harvard was his college.

"I've spent a great deal of my life there in the past twenty years," was his reply.

At once you understand the open-air look of his face and figure; and you know why in The Virginian he saturates your imagination with those vast solitudes of the Rocky Mountains and their plateaus—that wonderful atmosphere, so clear, so clean of the stains of civilization, clean even of the stains of the dust of leaf and flower, that the eye must learn all over again the science of distances and proportions and the lungs the science of breathing; those gaudy, splendid colorings of sky and plain, of mountain and cañon wall; the strange thoughts they breed in the mind of man, the strange passions they breed in his heart.

And these solitudes have set their indelible mark on the physical, moral and mental being of the man; and he in turn has set his indelible mark upon them. And thus they have lifted each the other into sudden popularity.

He is of about the medium height. He dresses in the careful-careless fashion that makes a man look equally at home in London, Paris and New York. He concedes to the taste of a passing generation a small, close-cropped mustache. He is obviously a man of the triple education—books, men and Nature. He has the manners of the select few who belong to the ancient, exclusive and most aristocratic society of the well-acquainted with the human race. Any man can be well mannered according to the standards of a particular nation or section, city or clique. It takes the rare man to acquire the manners that are approved everywhere and by all kinds of human beings, and that put all at their ease. He is still below the age at which a man grows uncomfortable when he hears some one, especially a young and pretty woman, inquiring, "How old is he?" His hair is black and covers thickly every part of his scalp.

But all these characteristics you brush aside quickly that you may look more closely at his really significant characteristics—those of Wordsworth's man of the solitudes, those he owes not to heredity or early training, or to Harvard or the cities he has visited, or to his associations with men and the books and other works of men anywhere, but to our great mother, Nature. His finisher, his determining guide has been Nature—she whom we are so feverishly trying to expel from the earth, once altogether hers, now claimed by us in the name of civilized progress.

He is slender and strong, agile with the strength of the savage and the wild animal—real strength, strength of sinew. It is not that lumpy, vitality-wasting, evanescent strength which gathers in swollen, unsightly muscles through the use of dumb-bells, horizontal bars and the like, and is transformed into masses of unhealthful fat if the "exercise" is not kept up. He has the acute eyes and ears of the wilderness. Nature has thoroughly taught him her invaluable lesson of concentrated attention. And, unlike the inattentive city dwellers who are distracted from childhood by the multitude of clamorous sensations, he sees and hears all in detail. Thus the resulting impressions upon his brain are vivid and accurate. You often hear people complain that they have thoughts too big for words. That means simply the clouded, muddy impressions which come from the slovenly reports of untrained, inattentive senses. Mr. Wister will never have that complaint; his thoughts are concise and communicable with clearness because his senses attend to business.

His voice is low, notably agreeable, almost too gentle—it might mislead those who associate bluster with strength, bellowing and rasping with force. He is reserved with strangers, hides his real self behind that "hardness" of cheek and eye, behind the commonplaces of polite conversation. He waits watchfully, "sizing up the proposition" in human nature which faces him. But when he decides that the "proposition" is well disposed, appreciative and reasonably discreet he talks fluently and with the frankness that conceals nothing—the frankness of honesty and courage.

The Schooling of the Solitudes

There again you note the handiwork of his schoolmistress of the solitudes. It is a mistake to fancy that men of vigorous mental life are ever silent by nature. They may be driven to silence and to Lacedæmonian speech by the uncongeniality or hopeless mental inferiority or dangerous indiscreetness of those about them. They may have cultivated the habit of silence with all because they have proved in bitterness that most cynical, most melancholy and, in some respects, most important of the truths of life—"You must never forget that any man, even your best friend, may some day be your enemy." But no really superior and unsoured man will or can deny himself the pleasure of exchanging facts and fancies with another whom he finds trustworthy and responsive. And the men of the solitudes are all at least touched with greatness; for in the solitudes individuality spreads and grows and sends the head high and the roots deep—and what is greatness but individuality?

The solitudes give a man—gave this man—the opportunity to think. In that rare air the weeds of shallow thought and speech faint and die, while the sturdy plants of original ideas, original modes of speech spring up and flourish luxuriant. Like all men of the solitudes Mr. Wister knows how to be silent without being empty, knows how and when to pour out his whole mind, knows—without consciousness of knowing—that frankness and simplicity are the prime qualities of speech. To diplomatists of the old school and to other little crafty folk who fret over appearances and impressions, speech may be the art of concealing thought; but not to the open, unafraid man who has "fixed his face in many a solitary place against the wind and open sky."

It was at a luncheon at the Bellevue in Philadelphia that these impressions of Mr. Wister were gathered or confirmed, and a few questions put to him. For example:

"And where did you find your character of the Virginian?"

To those who have read the book, perhaps the foregoing description of Mr. Wister may suggest that he unconsciously looked within himself for very many of the characteristics of that large, fine American gentleman, son of the solitude, brother to the mountains and to all untamed creatures. And in a sense Mr. Wister did look within himself. There is an unfailing family resemblance among the children of the solitudes. Also, there never yet was a work of art of any kind that did not have in warp and woof the personality of its creator. In portrait, statue, cartoon, for instance—in a Velasquez or a Michaelangelo, a Rodin or a Sargent, a Leech or a Teniel—you will find, if you look patiently, the face of the man who made it, as well as the face of its subject. And in that sense the Virginian suggests Mr. Wister. But in the larger sense he is as unlike Mr. Wister as James C. Carter is unlike Sargent who painted him so well, or as Balzac is unlike Rodin. Not Mr. Wister, nor any other man sophisticated by city life, could be that primeval personality—the personality portrayed in the Virginian's letter to the mother of the girl he loved. That letter, it may be ventured in passing, is the climax of Mr. Wister's observation of human nature and also of his present power of expressing his observations.

So, when Mr. Wister was asked, "Where did you find your character of the Virginian?" the asker expected the answer to be that the Virginian was some comrade of the solitudes whose life in the great essentials back of events had followed the course described in the novel. But Mr. Wister said:

Who the Virginian in Real Life Is

"He wasn't anybody in particular. He was a development from the life out there as I saw it. He has characteristics of half-a-dozen men—nothing from any one definite enough to be identifiable. I'm getting many letters from acquaintances, saying, 'Didn't you mean so and so?' or 'Wasn't he the man who was foreman of this ranch or that in a certain year?'"

There has been presented in New York recently a "morality play"—one of those quaint, highly dramatic, profoundly sincere tragedies of death and the beyond that were written in an age when things spiritual were fearfully things tangible to the people of Christendom. This particular play is called "Everyman," and sets forth how "Mr. Everyman" received Death's summons instantly to appear before the Most High for judgment. The point here pertinent is the aptness of the title—"Everyman." And a book or a play or any other work designed to appeal to "every man" must have "Mr. Everyman" as its central personality or it will fall on unheeding minds and hearts. A moment's reflection on this book of Mr. Wister's and on its prompt popularity should have resulted in anticipating Mr. Wister's statement as to the origin of his hero.

Not from some one man or from several men did Mr. Wister draw his Virginian, but from old, original, aboriginal even, Mr. Everyman, yesterday a cave-dweller and to-day a passenger in an electric car, and to-morrow no doubt the owner of a flying machine, yet always the same old, young, high, humble, rich, poor, educated, ignorant, wise, foolish Mr. Everyman.

And that's why Mr. Everyman is reading The Virginian.

There have been successful books that did not treat of Mr. Everyman, his thoughts and deeds; but their success was accidental. There never has been a book with Mr. Everyman as its subject—the real Mr. Everyman in any of his phases, quiet or stormy, heroic or villainous—that did not achieve success, often in spite of a style and a clumsiness of treatment that set culture to shuddering. And when a man of Mr. Wister's education and talents has such an opportunity as Mr. Wister had in his twenty years on and off among the solitudes, and uses that opportunity as Mr. Wister has used his in The Virginian—his success can be limited only by the extent of the population that understands the vocabulary he employs.

At this luncheon the question of dialect naturally arose. "You use dialect sparingly in your book. Yet the temptation to use it in quantity must have been strong."

"I do not believe much in dialect," replied Mr. Wister. "It should be indicated—a word here and there, as characteristic and illuminating as possible. At least, so I think. Probably Scott is responsible for the outbreak of dialect—Scott and Burns. One likes them in spite of their dialect, or perhaps the better way to put it would be that they use dialect so well that it ceases to have the misleading and confusing effect of so much of the dialect written nowadays."

Not the least—one might say, almost the greatest—merit of Mr. Wister's book is this same repression in the use of dialect. And in that repression you find another clew to his character. Shallow persons, vainglorious of a little knowledge, usually not of an important kind, love to dwell on the surface characteristics of their fellow-beings—the length or twist of a nose, the fact that the ears are not close against the head, the misuse of oyster fork and fish fork, slips in grammar or pronunciation. The surface manners are a part of the man, and so are his surface peculiarities of feature, but they are only a minor part; and to dwell upon them is to hide the real man. To emphasize dialect is one of the extremely cheap forms of this shallow-sighted effort to show off knowledge. As if every one of us did not speak a dialect! As if any one habitually spoke by the dictionary!

"Yes, I am fond of Scott," said Mr. Wister, in reply to a question. "No year goes by that I don't read several of his novels—Old Mortality, Kenilworth, The Talisman or certain others. I know Scott is out of fashion just now—like Dickens. But I admire Dickens, too—regard him as greater than Thackeray, as one of the world's very great writers."

There Mr. Wister and Swinburne are in accord. It is interesting to note the swift emergence of the Dickens-lovers, driven to cover a few years ago by snob and man of culture combining in adulation of Thackeray's admiring cynicisms on manners and on those fashionable puppets who live and move and have their being in manners alone.

How did the subject of music drift into that conversation at the Bellevue? No matter. Some one said that Wagner's music was so vastly superior in majesty, force and eloquence to any other composer's that he seemed a Mount Everest rising from a rolling prairie dotted with mounds here and there.

"I think," said Mr. Wister, "that you must divide composers into two classes—those who write symphonies, those who write operas. And I'd entirely agree with you as to Wagner among writers of opera."

"That is a distinction which would hardly be made by one who loves music without technical knowledge of it. You are a musician?"

"A little," replied Mr. Wister. "I play and ——" He hesitated, as he always did during that conversation when he caught himself talking of himself.

"And ——" What? Mr. Wister changed the subject, but it can be said that he does understand music thoroughly, has written good music, and plays well. And his sympathy with all the arts is not only the natural sympathy of the artist for whatever is artistic, but it is also an educated sympathy—educated in France where the very farm laborers talk art and think on things artistic.

Possibly—probably—it was in France that Mr. Wister learned the art of repression. If you have read The Virginian you will understand just what is here meant. Repression in dialect has already been noted. But there are two more remarkable illustrations of this fine instinct of his, this subtle sense of what to leave unsaid.

The first is in the method of indicating "lurid language" without using it, except at precisely the proper moment. Mr. Wister was writing of men who are peculiarly profane, who use the terrific expressions as we might say "d—n" or "gad" or "great Scott"—and with no more intention of blasphemy. It would have been impossible to present an honest picture of that life without impressing the profanity of speech upon the reader—as well have left out the broncos or the omnibus roller-towel.

"That was one of the very hard problems I had to try to solve," said Mr. Wister. "I don't know how well I succeeded."

So well that neither the publishers of the book nor the publishers of disconnected chapters in magazines have received a single criticism on the language used.

The other illustration of repression is in the description of the ferocious cruelty of "Balaam" to his horses, to the pony Pedro which he bought of "Shorty." Mr. Wister tells the story of that pony with the power and eloquence of simplicity. The scene is enacted before your eyes. As he tells, you begin to have a sense of impending tragedy. You feel quickening within you that deepest and maddest of all human passions—the hatred of injustice to the helpless. Then—but let us quote the book:

> Balaam made no answer but mounted Pedro; and the failing pony walked mechanically forward while the Virginian, puzzled, stood looking after him. Balaam seemed without purpose of going anywhere, and stopped in a moment. Suddenly he was at work at something. This sight was odd and new to look at. For a few seconds it had no meaning to the Virginian as he watched. Then his mind grasped the horror, too late. Even with his cry of execration and the tiger spring that he gave to stop Balaam, the monstrosity was wrought. Pedro sank motionless, his head rolling flat on the earth. The man had struggled to his feet before the Virginian reached the spot, and the horse then lifted his head and turned it piteously round.
> Then vengeance like a blast struck Balaam. The Virginian hurled him to the ground——

What had Balaam done to the horse? What was the sight "odd and new to look at"? What was the "monstrosity" that had been wrought? Why did the horse turn its head "piteously" toward the Virginian? You do not know. As you read you forget to be curious. You are mad with the horror of the hinted torture and you cry to the Virginian, "Stamp the man into the earth for his infamy!" And when the Virginian does it, you love him because he has once more shown himself to be "Mr. Everyman" who hates cruelty and punishes the cruel.

"What did Balaam do to the pony?"—this the question to Mr. Wister at the lunch at the Bellevue—or rather, after the lunch.

Mr. Wister explained—it was frightful. It was an act that made you peer with a heart full of loathing into the viperous depths of the soul of the beast in man—the beast that, once in control, uses man's reason only to refine upon cruelty and to make it excruciating. "You see, I couldn't put in that," said Mr. Wister. "I did write it, but after thinking and talking it over I decided that it must be left out of the book."

"But, although the fact is more shocking, more sickening, your hint of it raises a more tremendous feeling in the mind. Things hinted are mightier than things told."

"That's exactly it," answered Mr. Wister. "The reader gets the impression, doesn't he? And he is spared the sickening physical shock which the plain fact would give him."

The Greeks with their famous artist instinct permitted no murders on the stage—murder was related by a messenger. They reasoned that tragedy should appeal to the imagination, not to the senses; that the tragedy-writer's art lay in so rousing the imagination of the audience that it was stirred to the depths by the recital of the murder, yet was not sickened and revolted as it must have been had it actually seen the murder. It had been fanned by the awful breath of the hateful wings of the spirit of murder and the angel of death; it had had the moral lesson without the immoral, the demoralizing spectacle.

Mr. Wister, in that notable episode, has followed the Greek injunction, has followed it in a way that gives one an insight not only into his methods of work but also into the man himself.

"Another novel of the far West?"

"Oh, yes. But first I shall write a story round a New England superstition. Would you believe that within sound of the whistle of the New York, New Haven and Hartford locomotives there are people, many people, who believe in vampires?"

"Not really vampires—persons in human form who suck the blood of their fellow-beings?"

"Yes, the real, old-fashioned, Arabian Nights vampires. I think it should make an interesting novel."

"And then you will write the Western story?"

"Yes—of a somewhat earlier day than The Virginian. It will be a broader story, too—taking in the whole of pioneer life—Indians, hunters, first settlers, cowboys, desperadoes and all."

That is interesting news. For the essence of America thus far is the pioneer. We are all, even to the Eastern seaboard, but tenants of the house he built; the immediate heirs of what he conquered from the wilderness, from the Indian, from the outcasts of his own race flung frontierward, and there his worst enemies. And the pioneer is the true American under the veneer—why else does this Virginian seem to be "Mr. Everyman" to Americans north, south, east and west? Why else do we so strongly admire his education to manhood, the same as that superb elemental education which Xenophon says was given to the Persian youth—"to ride, to shoot and to speak the truth." To ride—that is, courage, strength, physical grace; to shoot—that is, the clear eye, the steady nerve, the accurate, the measuring brain; then that powerful climax, to speak the truth—that is, the whole of manhood, the topmost peak of moral courage.

Mr. Wister can tell a thrilling story—and to be interesting is the first requisite for him who seeks public attention. But he has done, will do again, far more than that. In him there is the potentiality of books greater than The Virginian and preaching, without seeming to do so, the same gospel. No new gospel is this that burns in Mr. Wister's books and shines in his eyes and gives form to his mind and character, but the grand old gospel of true Americanism—not fighting, though ample capacity for fighting should justice reluctantly demand it; not braggadocio and shrieking for strenuosity, but manhood, broad and simple and sincere.

in mercantile and professional life owe something of their success to personal appearance. The leisure class owes still more to the same cause. The few genuine geniuses succeed in spite of it. Personal appearance is largely a matter of dress. Dress is largely a matter of the Cravat. This was understood by some as far back as the days of Beau Brummel, but it is only the later section of the present generation of men who have fully grasped it. The well-groomed man of to-day, even when he must economize on other articles of apparel, buys ten Cravats where his daddy bought one. There is a 36-page text book called

"THE CRAVAT"

It tells of the What, Where, When and How of a Man's Cravat—Its Names and Shapes, Its Tying, Its Care, Its Selection, Its Various Forms for Special Occasions and Functions, Its Color Scheme, Its Adjuncts: Pins, Fasteners, etc., Its Don'ts, in fact.

It is profusely and sumptuously illustrated by one of the foremost artists of America. That's Aunt Ann. Doesn't she look upset? Well I would too if I got a note like the following:

Dear Ann:

I'm sorry Mary's left, but I'm more sorry to see your hands becoming rough and red: that's a sure sign you are using cleansers which ruin your clothes as well as your hands. Cleansers that injure the hands will injure everything they come in contact with. Why in the world don't you use BORAX? It makes washing quick and easy. It makes clothes whiter than anything else you can use. It preserves colors and is above all absolutely harmless, keeping the hands soft and white and preserving clothes. If you doubt this ask your physician. He recommends it for washing out baby's mouth. It saves time, saves soap and saves wear on clothes.

Ask your grocer for "20 Mule Team Borax"

There are substitutes adulterated with soda

If BORAX were better understood, it would be constantly used in every household as a helpful economy. You can learn more about it from the quaint booklet, "Borax—Come In." Sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp. Address Department E, Pacific Coast Borax Company, Chicago.

arranged it all time and time again. Now that I had re-masted her and overhauled her copper and painted her inside and out, the subject had bobbed up again; and as I couldn't make any objection, and as the moon for the first time in seven years had happened to be full at the same moment when the vessel happened to be free, Sasa informed me (in the autocratic manner of lovely woman dealing with an old softy of a retired sea-horse) that the invitations were out, the music engaged, and that my part was to plank down fifty dollars, keep my mouth shut and do what I was told.

I perceived from the beginning that there was something queer about the trip, for Sasa, usually so communicative, could scarcely be induced to speak of it at all; and then when she did it was with such a parade of mystery and reserve that I felt myself completely baffled. However, like the jossers in the poem, it wasn't for me to reason why, and I obediently ran about the beach, did what I was bidden and discreetly asked no questions. I confess, though, that on the day itself my curiosity began to reach the breaking point; when I was told, with gentle impressiveness, that I was to remain in my house till the minute of nine forty-five, pull off quietly to the Nukanono, board her by the forechains and crouch there in the bow till I was told to get up!

It was a glorious moonlight night as I got into Joe's boat and saw the Nukanono across the bay, her loosened sails flapping in the first faint breath of the land breeze and her booms sparkling from end to end with Chinese lanterns. The water was like black glass, the outer reefs for once were silent, and the downpouring air from the mountains was fragrant with mosoi, and so warm and scented against the cheek that I doubt not but what you could have smelled Upolu ninety miles to leeward. As we drew nearer, the sound of girls' laughter, the tuning of musical instruments, the hum and talk and gayety of a large company floated over to us from the schooner's deck, wonderfully mellowed by the intervening water and (as it seemed to me) softened into a sort of harmony with the night itself.

However, I did not allow these reflections to put me off my duty or make me forgetful of the strict commands I had previously received from Sasa. I came up softly under the bow of the Nukanono, dismissed Joe in a whisper and climbed silently to my appointed station. I had not been there a minute when I felt Sasa's hand on my shoulder and heard her say softly in my ear, "Malie," which in Samoan means good or well done. Then she slipped away and I heard her with sweet imperiousness ordering about the crew and bidding them slip the moorings. We had hardly got steerageway when I heard a commotion aft, a choking, angry voice that sounded through the hubbub like Silver Tongue's, a quick, fierce, violent struggle, and then suddenly the companion hatch went shut with a bang. Even as it did so the forehatch followed with a crash and everybody began to cheer. From below there rose the sound of thumping, smothered Teutonic protests, and a long, poignant and unmistakably feminine wail.

"All finish, Captain," said Sasa, coming up to me cheerfully.

"Would you mind telling me what it's all about?" I asked.

"Just a little tongafiti to bring loving hearts together," said Sasa. "They threw Silver Tongue down the after hatchway, while me and the girls we pushed Rosalie down the forehold. There they are all alone in the dark with five hours to make it up!"

I could not help laughing at Sasa's plan, especially when under my feet I began to hear more frenzied thumping and more feminine wails. Then I recollected there wasn't five feet of headroom below, and that the place, even with the hatches off, was hot enough to boil water in.

"They'll die down there, Sasa," I said.

"No fear," said Sasa. "Rosalie is half Samoa, and as for Silver Tongue—if he get roast like his own bread nobody care a banana."

"But Sasa——!" I protested.

"Now you go flirt with some my girls," she said, "and don't bother your old head about nothings!"

"But my dear girl——" I protested.

"They'll do very nicely, thank you," said Sasa, interrupting me, "and if they're hungry isn't there ham sandwich? And if they're thirsty isn't there claret punch in a milk can?

And as for lights—true lovers don't want no lights!"

"Well, Sasa," I said, "I dare say it's a bright idea and that you deserve the greatest credit for arranging it all—but for the Lord's sake, let me off the ship before you remove the hatches."

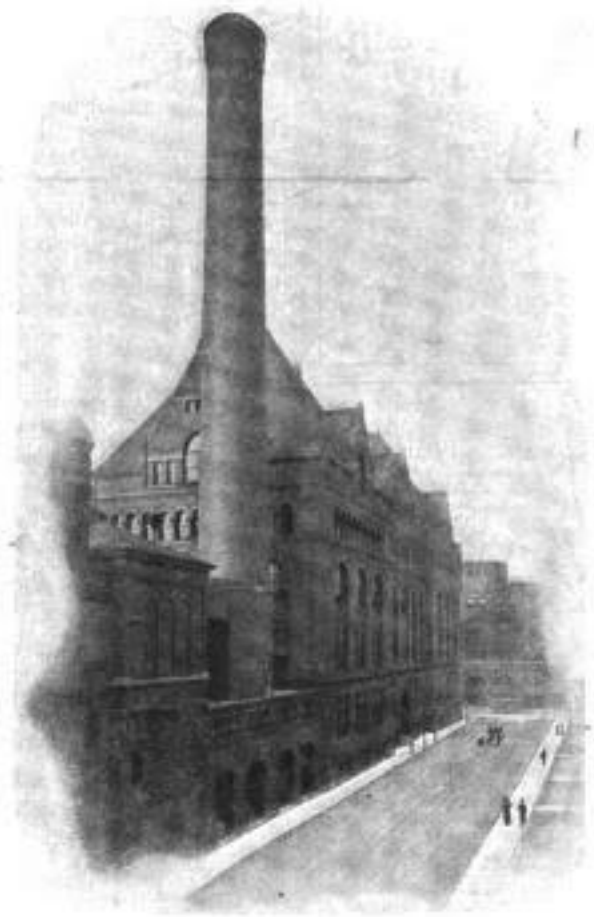
"Oh, no," said Sasa, "everybody stay and see the fun!"

Fun, indeed, I thought, as I heard a terrific pounding below and an uproar that would have been creditable to a sinking liner. The deck shook with sledge-hammer blows and a lot of glasses tumbled off one of our improvised tables. Then we heard what was obviously a revengeful wrecking of the whole ship's interior—the smashing of crockery and lamps, a tramping and a kicking and a throwing down of everything that was loose or could be wrenched off, together with a hollow, reverberatory boom of German profan——! No, I won't be unjust, and one really couldn't hear good. Sasa stamped on the deck with her little foot and cried out: "Be quiet, you silly baker!" But the silly baker only roused himself to a renewed ferocity, and instead of calming down went off again like twenty-five bunches of firecrackers under a barrel. And large firecrackers, too.

Off and on he must have kept this up for more than an hour, then at length he subsided, finding, I suppose, that one German baker, however infuriated, was unable to make an impression on a three-inch deck. By the end of the second hour we had forgotten all about him, for heeling over in the pleasant breeze and what with singing and telling stories and flirting in the moonlight we were all too happy and too busy to take thought of the stifling lovers below our feet. Occasionally I had a haunting sense of a day of reckoning, but I held my peace and forebore to disquiet my pretty hostess, who was the life and soul of the whole party aboard, and whose silvery laughter chimed in so sweetly with the tropic night and the rippling gurgle of water along our keel.

It was past three o'clock when we picked up the Mission light and ran back to our moorings off the Firm. Then the question arose as to who would uncage our love-birds and bear the first brunt of Silver Tongue's explosion. I confess I was very little eager for the job, and felt a peculiar sinking in the region of my watch-pocket as we unlocked the after-hatch and rolled it softly back, Sasa, with a bull's-eye lantern penetrating the gloom with a dazzling circle of light. It fell on the figures of Rosalie and Silver Tongue seated on a settee and locked in each other's arms. Rosalie was asleep, with her graceful head lying on Silver Tongue's breast and her long lashes still wet with tears. The baker, his face crimson with heat and streaked with rivulets of perspiration, looked up at us grimly through a sort of mist. I waited for him to spring to his feet and throw himself like a lion on my shrinking form; but instead of doing so he pressed his arms closer round Rosalie and smiled—yes, by Jove—smiled—and, if you'll take the word of a retired master-mariner, winked—with a peculiar, tender and calfish expression that in anybody else would have been called skittish.

"How goes it, old man?" I said.



"Gaptain," he returned in the tone of a clarionet tootling a love-passage in grand opera, "me and Rosalie invites you all to the Bublic Hall to-morrow night to dance at our wedding!"

A South Seas' Central

THE telephone, apparently, is as yet only in its infancy, so far as the development of its usefulness to mankind is concerned. Even the most remote parts of the earth and the most inaccessible localities are being brought into touch with the rest of the world by the help of this wonderful instrument. A traveler who visited the monastery of St. Bernard recently was almost shocked to discover that the establishment is equipped with telephones, which place it in communication with civilization even in the depth of winter.

The islands of the Hawaiian group, which are separated from each other by long distances over water, are now connected together by long-distance telephones. It seems likely that before very long—thanks to the invention of Professor Pupin, which appears to remove the limit on telephoning—the archipelagoes of Polynesia will be similarly joined, and it will be practicable to talk from Fiji to Samoa, or from Tonga to the Gilberts. No portion of the habitable globe, it may be supposed, will be isolated in any true sense, or cut off from the interchange of intelligence.

Advertising Writing as a Money Making Business

And How It Is Taught

By GEORGE H. POWELL

SKILL ACQUIRED BY MAIL INSTRUCTION IN DEMAND AT INCOMES RANGING FROM $100.00 TO $500.00 A MONTH

SAMUEL MOSSER, Reading, Pa. — J. M. KEMPER, Dayton, O. — MISS E. ANNA ROE, Monroeville, O. — HERBERT G. VEASEY, Bradford, Mass. — C. W. GREENE, Buffalo, N. Y.

IT HAS been suggested that I tell the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST something about the inducements offered in the field of advertising writing to young men and women who are willing to prepare themselves for the work. This space, however, is too limited to enter into much detail, and a few facts must suffice.

In the first place, we must consider that modern advertising dates back only about a dozen or fifteen years, previous to which time a catchy advertisement was practically unknown. In those earlier days the great department store used a column ad., where to-day a page is found necessary. And as the advertising expenditures have doubled and quadrupled, the volume of business has more than kept pace with this ever-increasing outlay.

A dozen years ago a mere handful of men occupied recognized positions as advertising managers, while to-day there are probably three or four hundred, and yet it is a very small army—much too small, and altogether out of proportion to the wonderful increase of the advertising appropriations. The demand for good ad.-writers cannot be met, and this condition must of necessity exist for years to come. In fact, like all comparatively new arts, the art of ad.-writing lacks skilled workers. A young man or woman possessed of a common-school education can, under proper instruction, added to reasonable diligence, finally be sure of a fine weekly salary. Those who draw from $4,000.00 to $15,000.00 annually are the picked workers, and yet positions at these high salaries are steadily multiplying. There will always be this "something better" to strive for.

Carter Ink Ad. by Samuel Mosser, Reading, Pa.

To show how utterly out of proportion are the present salaries paid advertising writers and managers, a comparison will be of interest. With over 200,000 miles of steam railway in the United States, employing 1,000,000 men, the combined earnings for 1901 were $1,500,000,000, while salaries reached the enormous sum of $600,000,000. Now the total amount spent for advertising in the same year was nearly half the earnings of the railways, but the salaries paid advertising men and women were so small as a whole that comparison is useless, since it does not amount to one per cent.!

Conservative authorities agree with me that nearly one-half of the money spent for advertising is wasted, for want of proper attention and service, while nearly seventy per cent. of all the new advertisers drop out of the race for the same cause! Is it any wonder, then, that high salaries await bright people who have been trained to attract attention and create business?

I established my school at the urgent suggestion of notable advertising men who saw the need of really expert instruction. There were other ad.-schools in existence; but, like all new things, only limited results were produced. Fulton built the first and original steamboat, but it is hardly to be compared with the 1902 ocean greyhound. To-day the Powell System is recognized by all authorities as the standard and best.

The chief fault of the early ad.-schools lies in lack of understanding as to limitations, and instead of loading up students with superfluous news and detail about matters really foreign to the duties of the ad.-writer, the concentrated efforts ought to be along the line of the actual writing of ads. In this way, largely, is the Powell System superior to all others. Take the synonym question as another example: I supply a work of nearly 600 pages, instead of dabbling in three or four so-called "lessons" that are of no practical value. The Powell System proper—by which I mean the actual correspondence instruction itself—consists of lessons on all lines of ad.-writing, and following the student's work comes my personal criticisms, corrections, etc. No books are used in this main branch, because it is not practical or beneficial. Printers' Ink, the well-known journal of advertising, in commenting recently on a large book, or so-called "encyclopedia" offered by an ad.-school, truly said:

"Students from the rural districts will find ——'s Publicity the nicest book for drying and pressing flowers that ever happened. It is a great thing in itself. It is a greater thing to accomplish a distribution of the edition."

The Powell System differs from book instruction in that I personally supervise and direct each student's advertising education as he or she requires, and no form letters for criticisms are ever used. What books I do furnish are for a supplementary purpose.

On this page I reproduce several specimens of fine ad. work by my students, who are taught originality to such a high degree that they become prize winners and valued employees in the shortest possible time.

My instruction system is so superior to all others that I always court investigation by giving full addresses to all testimonials I publish. The more skeptical you are the better I am pleased, because I have bushels of proof to finally convince you. Suppose you write those students, whose portraits appear above? Or, if you are a hard-headed business man and wonder whether I am really an expert, you may be interested in the testimony of the Secretary of the Severne Wine Co., Himrod, N.Y., who says that my instruction and advice increased his business about four-fold, by actual test. I will gladly send you his letter, together with my complete and instructive Prospectus and full explanatory matter, if you will only write me. My address is George H. Powell, 172 Temple Court, New York.

customer had failed to notify its buyer in the market that a sudden demand for goods which were on his "buying list" had made it necessary for them to be ordered by wire. The buyer had made several stops on his way to the city and was in ignorance of the fact that these goods had already been bought. Had this whole transaction been properly made the buyer in the market would have been advised by wire that the order had been telegraphed to the house; the letter to the house would have read: "Confirming our telegram of November 10," etc.; then the buyer would have found a similar letter of confirmation from his own house awaiting him at the wholesale house.

If any illustration is needed to emphasize the point that some businesses are capable of being ruined by "breaks," let me cite the history of a young man, in an Eastern State, who originated a crayon portrait business. Substantially his advertisements offered to teach the art of making these portraits for a small sum—say five dollars. This covered the necessary tools of the craft and also one finished portrait and a solar print, the latter to be finished by the pupil. Students showing proficiency in the process were furnished with other photographs, and the corresponding solar prints which were to be finished in crayon. Almost immediately the business suddenly leaped into large proportions and the mail came literally in dray loads.

Just as it seemed certain that the business would bring its originator a very large fortune the "break" upon which it was destined to suffer shipwreck appeared. It was of a most curious and unexpected nature. Most of the photographs were of deceased relatives and friends of the patrons of the business and many of them were the only likenesses in existence of the persons in question. Consequently they could not, if lost or destroyed, be in any manner replaced, and they had an associational value to their owners which could not be covered by any monetary consideration.

Very soon the manager of the business discovered that scores of these priceless photographs were being accidentally lost or destroyed while in the care of the "finishers." As the latter were scattered over the entire country, all efforts to secure from them a satisfactory account of these missing mementos were futile.

The owners of these invaluable portraits then appealed to the United States Post Office authorities. Hundreds of these complaints were forwarded to Washington and the Post Office Department promptly sent special agents to make a thorough investigation. They found a large room literally filled with great stacks of remittance letters. After a searching investigation it was officially determined that the business was honestly conducted, but that its continuance would not be feasible unless some method could be devised by which the "breaks" resulting in the loss and accidental destruction of the priceless photographs might be effectually guarded against.

As the proprietor of the business was not equal to this task he at once gave up an enterprise which promised to make him very wealthy, facetiously declaring that he had been "ruined by the babies of the country." This was almost literally true, as most of the missing photographs were unreclaimable because they had been destroyed or lost by small children in the homes to which they had been sent as models for the finishing of the enlarged portraits.

A "break" which must prove very expensive in any large establishment is an ineffective method of assembling and posting mail matter. This leakage is so common that it is entitled to be classed as practically universal. One item in this leakage is the sending of several separate letters to the same person or firm at the same time. Often a big wholesale house will have ten different items of correspondence from as many departments going to a customer by the same post. One or two stamps instead of ten will carry them when all the items are assembled in one envelope. By the organization of an efficient "private post office" a large institution can save from $5000 to $20,000 a year in postage expense. Of course, the latter figure is large, but in the case of a great mail-order house this is easily possible.

These examples will serve to indicate that the head of any house can spend a part of his time to very great advantage in a careful search for "breaks" and errors that are due to defects in the methods which govern the routine discharge of business.

French Court Memoirs

MARIE JEANNE DU BARRY

FROM Henry of Navarre to and through the reign of Du Barry (whose personal memoirs occupy four of the volumes) this set of books covers the back-stairs-and-kitchen-gossip side of French Court history, much as Guizot covers its outward manifestations. And where so much was set afoot with secret and obscure design, where so little was open and above-board, where boudoir councils dictated treaties and the wounded vanity of favorites instigated campaigns, where a low-born woman's caprice could send forth the torch to lay waste the half of Europe, it is impossible to comprehend the curious events of history without knowing the intimate details of those underlying causes.

This is the house the young man saved and paid for in five years.

A Young Man Was Married 5 Years Ago

He had a moderate salary. He and his wife started simply and saved. But they didn't skimp. They gave little dinners and heard the best lectures. In five years they had saved enough to pay for the house at the head of this page.

Another Young Man Was Married, Too

This couple put by $7 a week, and the house at the bottom of this page is now theirs,—entirely paid for. A third young man's income was $16 per week. He and his wife saved $8 of it, and bought and paid for the house at the bottom of this page.

How these and 97 others did it, step by step, dollar by dollar, is all told in the great series, "How We Saved For a Home,"—100 articles by 100 people who saved for and now own their own homes on an every tiniest nerve in his body. It would begin as he lay in bed—counting interminably to get himself to sleep—between his knees and ankles, and thence slowly spread to every part of him, creeping upward, from loin to shoulder, in a gradual wave of torture that was not pain, yet infinitely worse. A dry, pringling aura as of billions of minute electric shocks crept upward over his flesh, till it reached his head, where it seemed to culminate in a white flash, which he felt rather than saw.

His body felt strange and unfamiliar to him. It seemed to have no weight, and at times his hands would appear to swell swiftly to the size of mammoth boxing-gloves, so that he must rub them together to feel that they were his own.

He put off consulting a doctor from day to day, alleging that he had not the time. But the real reason, though he never admitted it, was the fear that the doctor might tell him what he guessed to be the truth.

Were his wits leaving him? The horror of the question smote through him like the drive of a javelin. What was to happen? What nameless calamity impended?

"Wheat-wheat-wheat, wheat-wheat-wheat."

His watch under his pillow took up the refrain. How to grasp the morrow's business, how control the sluice-gates of that torrent he had unchained, with this unspeakable crumbling and disintegrating of his faculties going on?

Jaded, feeble, he rose to meet another day. He drove downtown, trying not to hear the beat of his horses' hoofs. Dizzy, stupefied, he gained Gretry's office, and alone with his terrors sat in the chair before his desk, waiting, waiting.

Then far away the great gong struck. Just over his head, penetrating wood and iron, he heard the mighty throe of the Pit once more moving, the sullen thunder of the Niagara. And then, once again, the limp and raveled fibres of being grew tight with a wrench. Under the stimulus of the roar of the maelstrom, the flagging, wavering brain righted itself once more, and—how, he himself could not say—the business of the day was dispatched, the battle was once more urged. Often he acted upon what he knew to be blind, unreasoned instinct. Judgment, clear reasoning, at times, he felt, forsook him. Decisions that involved what seemed to be the very stronghold of his situation, had to be taken without a moment's warning. He decided for or against without knowing why. Under his feet fissures opened. He must take the leap without seeing the other edge. Somehow he always landed upon his feet; somehow his great, cumbersome Engine, lurching, swaying, in spite of loosened joints, always kept the track.

Luck, his golden goddess, the genius of glittering wings, was with him yet. Sorely tried, flouted even, she yet remained faithful, lending a helping hand to lost and wandering judgment.

A Time for All Things

FRANK A. VANDERLIP, whose recent speeches on financial conditions are attracting much attention, says that among the secrets of his success are precepts, both economical and ethical, which he imbibed from the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gage.

When Mr. Vanderlip was Assistant Secretary the exactions of that office made him seek Sunday recreation. He tried golfing as a diversion and exercise. The links was near Cleveland Park, not far from the suburban home of his chief. Proudly in his knickerbocker golf suit of bright and striking pattern Mr. Vanderlip stalked across the fields to pay his respects to Mr. Gage.

The sentiments provoked in the mind of that venerable financier by his colleague's gay and unaccustomed attire were gravely concealed, but when, after a pleasant exchange of courtesies, the Assistant Secretary rose to go, Mr. Gage extending his hand, said:

"Mr. Vanderlip, but for the fact that I know you thoroughly as a Christian gentleman, and have the most implicit faith in your ideals of citizenship, I should be tempted to believe that you had been induced to engage in a game of sport on the Sabbath day."

On all his subsequent Sundays in Washington Mr. Vanderlip's garb was soberly conventional.

Our Experience with Mahin is Typical—

When we first suggested to the president of the Mahin Advertising Company that we could inaugurate methods which would increase the efficiency of his organization, at the same time reducing expense, he suggested that we were "bluffing"—challenged us to go into his office and point out SOME ONE THING that could be improved.

We did it! Showed him a defective system of reports, very first thing.

Then he decided to overhaul his bookkeeping system himself, with the assistance of his own staff, one member of which had been keeping agency books for twelve years.

The more Mr. Mahin planned and figured, the more he wondered what WE could do.

He knew it would cost money, but he decided to call us in.

We had no ready-made system to introduce

We spent a lot of time at Mahin's studying, discussing, making everybody in the place think and study.

In the end, we made a lot of plain, simple shortcuts in his system. We applied old fundamental principles in new ways.

We CONVINCED HIM ABSOLUTELY that our knowledge of the science of accounts could be practically applied to seemingly perfect organizations.

Perhaps there's a lesson here for YOU.

Can you see it?

We showed the Mahin people that we could increase efficiency and diminish expense.

May we not show YOU?

The Golden State Limited

If you wait until you have "time" to go to California, you will never go—NEVER. The thing to do is to pack your trunk and GO. Forget household cares, dismiss business from your mind and GO. Go now—THIS month.

Why should you go? Because California is the most beautiful portion of this great country of ours; because, by going there, you will escape the hardships and discomforts of February and March, the most trying months of the year at home; because a month in California will do you more good than all the medicine in Christendom.

California

is the place of all others for the invalid, the pleasure-seeker—for every man and woman who is "out of sorts" and needs rest. The air, the sunshine, the semi-tropical vegetation, the mountains, the blue sea and the still bluer sky—these are California's aids to health.

California is easily reached if you take the Rock Island and Southern Pacific systems by way of El Paso. At El Paso you can stop off and visit quaint and picturesque Mexico.

The train to take is the Golden State Limited, which leaves Chicago and Kansas City daily and runs through to Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and San Francisco without change. No other train to Southern California offers as good service. No other train makes faster time—only 68 hours Chicago to Los Angeles. Less than four days from the Atlantic Coast. Through cars to Santa Barbara and San Francisco.

Living is not expensive in California. As a matter of fact, it costs less than in almost any other part of the country.

$10.00 SECURES A HOME SITE LIKE THIS

This is not a lot on an isolated farm, but

A Valuable Home Site in a Thoroughly Developed Suburban Town on which Over $900,000.00 has Already Been Spent

Being composed originally of two large estates, one of them being the old homestead site of the late Thomas Smith, President of the Bank of North America, Philadelphia, and it was only after his death that this remarkable property could be obtained at any price, and then had to be purchased in its entirety, with its winding drives, shady nooks, old shade, etc., laying high and commanding the finest views of any point around the City of Philadelphia.

This offer is made to large and small investors, with the sole purpose of releasing capital, which will be used in the further development and improvement of this wonderful property.

The house shown in the above illustration is one of the many erected this year, and is typical of the hundreds of homes NOW ERECTED at Glenside—THE ARISTOCRATIC SUBURB OF PHILADELPHIA. The 300 lots we are offering The Saturday Evening Post readers are similar to this. They are right in the heart of the most attractive and the most successful suburb of Philadelphia, ABSOLUTELY WITHOUT AN EQUAL IN THE UNITED STATES AS TO MAGNITUDE OR QUALITY OF IMPROVEMENTS (MADE, NOT PROMISED).

No other property has increased in value so rapidly during the past year. No other property has anything like the prospect of increased value during the coming year.

Glenside Home Sites as a Saving Fund

No matter in what section of the United States you live, this is a splendid opportunity to save money and to make an investment that, in our opinion, will increase in value every month you hold it. It requires no great outlay to begin. $10.00 secures the ground. Small payments can be made on the balance. Ten per cent. discount for cash in 30 days. This form of saving is safer than putting money in the bank, because you have the ground with a guaranteed title as security, and it will pay better interest than any other substantial and conservative investment of a similar nature.

Glenside is a thriving town now—93 trains connect it with Philadelphia daily; being a terminus, it has a great advantage of express service (no change of cars)—The Philadelphia and Reading Railway running the entire length of the property, two stations on the property and three others within five minutes' walk. Two trolley lines now under construction to run through the property. Hundreds of houses and stores are already built, but the town is in its infancy. Values are increasing weekly.

Only 90 Minutes to New York—Station Short Walk

Recommended by Financial Magnates of National Fame

The Land Title & Trust Company, of Philadelphia, Penna., one of the largest institutions of its kind in the country, located at the corner of Broad and Chestnut Streets, will gladly answer any questions in regard to Glenside or its owner. It is endorsed by P. A. B. Widener, the great Traction magnate, who knows the section thoroughly, because he has a palatial home within a short distance from Glenside. Wm. L. Elkins, the famous financier, has also consented to reply to any prospective investor who desires his opinion as to the value of Glenside home sites as investments. Either of these gentlemen will answer any inquiry as to the financial ability and standing of the owner of Glenside, also his willingness to perform every obligation made.

These are Our Terms

We will, upon application, reserve a home site in Glenside costing any sum desired. In the three hundred lots we offer there are sites ranging from $200 to $1700. There are also a few lots at higher prices.

We will then place the intending investor in a position to learn the entire history of Glenside, its present standing and its future possibilities. This information will be conveyed in such a way that absolute confidence can be placed on its reliability.

If you can come to Glenside we will pay a proportionate amount of your expenses, according to the size of your investment. On the larger size lots we will pay the entire cost of transportation from any point in the United States.

After you have thoroughly investigated the property and decided to purchase, we will give you

A Security Unprecedented in the History of Real Estate

With the deed of sale we will include an ironclad Guarantee that the Property Will Increase in Value 25 per cent. within a Year from purchase, based upon prices at which the ground is then selling. If it fails to do this

We will Refund Your Money at the End of 12 Months with 6 Per Cent. Interest Added

This Guarantee is made possible by the fact that the property advanced 25 per cent. during the past year, and is in position to make a still greater advance during the coming twelve months.

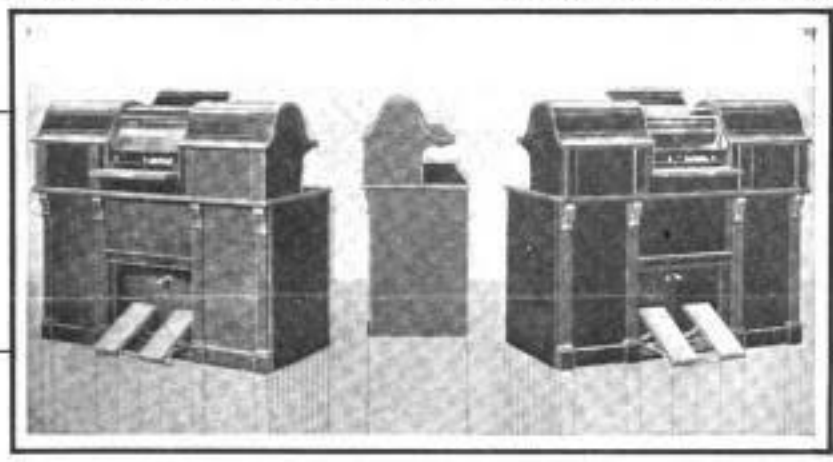
THE PIANOLA

The most gifted pianist the world has ever known has but a small fraction of the repertoire of the Pianola. The Pianola is the universal means of playing the piano. Universal, because there is no one in all the world, having the use of hands and feet, who could not learn to use it with but little effort.

To operate it is simplicity itself. Adjustable to any piano, the Pianola stands before it when in use, and plays the keys with tiny, felt-tipped fingers. The striking of the notes of the selection, in proper time and place, is no concern of the player. This is correctly done by perforated rolls of paper music.



The player's only task is to decide how slow or how fast the notes shall sound, how loud or how soft he wants them, also he uses the sustaining pedal. Three little levers serve to impart the player's wishes to the piano. Should the air be familiar, the player's taste will dictate the expression. But if it is strange or difficult, a very simple set of markings on the moving music-roll direct the proper movement of the levers. Simple it is, but in its simplicity it is musically artistic. Paderewski, Hofmann, and other great artists find pleasure in the Pianola and use it because they can so perfectly control the elements which go to make up "expression."

"Music in the House," a brochure illustrating the Pianola, will be sent upon request. The cost of the Pianola is $250. Purchasable by monthly payments.

I

TWO hours after Surrey's letter came his sister Gwen rode over to Beauvais House eager to tell Evelyn the news of his luck in America. It was almost five o'clock in the beautiful autumn afternoon, and she found Evelyn at tea on the porch that looks out upon the Italian garden.

"It's settled," she said. "They're to be married on the fifth of November—only two months! And George says she is sweet and lovely—not at all like the Americans we know. And her dot is a million and a half—he calls it seven and a half, but he means in their money, which sounds bigger, but counts smaller than ours. She'll get twice that when her father dies—and he's nearly seventy and not strong. And I I'm so glad and so sorry that I don't know whether to laugh or cry."

"What's her name? You told me, but I forget." Evelyn's hand was trembling just a little as she gave Gwendoline a cup of tea. She spoke slowly in the clear, monotonous but agreeable English tone. Her voice, always calm, seemed stagnant.

"Dowie—Helen Dowie. He sent me a proof of a photograph they had taken together." Gwendoline took a letter from the bosom of her shirtwaist, drew from it the proof, and handed it to Evelyn. She took it, lowered her head so that Gwen could not see her face. She looked long and intently, and, if Gwen could have seen, she would have wondered how eyes could be so full of tears without shedding a single one. "Quite aristocratic," she said at last, giving it back. "How much style those American girls have."

"But don't you think her rather pert looking?" asked Gwen discontentedly. "She looks ill-tempered, too. I'm sure we sha'n't get on. Mother and I are making ready to go to Houghton Abbey at once. We'd have a jolly uncomfortable time of it, I wager, if she were to catch us at the Hall."

Evelyn was looking into her tea and stirring it absently.

"It seems a shame to have an American nobody come in," continued Gwen, "and throw us out neck and crop from a house where we've always lived. Now, if it were an English girl of our own class—you, Evelyn—we shouldn't mind—at least, not so much, or in the same way."

Evelyn paled and her lips contracted slightly.

"But it's of no use to think of that. We need her money—everything is in tatters at the Hall, and poor George is down to the last seventy pounds." Gwen laughed. "Do you remember what a time there was getting the five hundred for his expenses out of Aunt Betty? We've got to cable him another five hundred—he can't begin on her money the very minute he's married, can he, now?"

"Arthur must go over," said Evelyn suddenly with conviction. "We're worse off than you are. Old Bagley was down yesterday. He and Arthur were shut in together for two hours, and Arthur's been off his feed—horribly—ever since."

Gwen, two years younger than Evelyn, could not conceal her feelings so well. She winced, and a look of terror came into her big, blue eyes.

"We can't hold on another year," continued Evelyn. "And it's quite impossible for Arthur to take Miss Cadbrough. She's too hideous, and too hideously, hopelessly middle-class. She could never, never learn not to speak to ladies and gentlemen as if she were a servant."

Evelyn pretended not to notice Gwen's unhappiness. She glanced in at the great drawing-room with splendid furniture and ceiling wonderfully carved by a seventeenth century Italian. Then her eyes wandered away to the left, to the majestic wing showing there, then on to the brilliant gardens, the fountains and statuary. Her expression became bitter. "And we've been undisturbed for nine centuries!" she exclaimed.

Gwen, in spite of her inward tumult, remembered that this boast was rather "tall," that the Beauvais family had in fact been changed radically several times, and only the name had been undisturbed. Her mind paused with a certain satisfaction upon these little genealogical discrepancies because, though she was the sister and the daughter of a duke, she was the granddaughter of a brewer who had begun life as an apprentice.

"George wishes Arthur to go over to the wedding," she said reluctantly, after a silence.

A servant appeared—his gaudy livery was almost shabby, but his manners were most dignified and his hair was impressively—or ridiculously, if you please—plastered and streaked with powder. "His Lordship says he will have tea in his study, Your Ladyship."

"Please tell him that Lady Gwendoline Ridley is here," said Evelyn.

A few minutes later a strongly built, fairish young man of perhaps six and thirty came lounging out upon the porch. He had pleasing but far from handsome features—a chin that was too long and hung weakly instead of strongly forward; uncertain blue eyes with a network of the wrinkles of dissipation at the corners. A large, stringless monocle was wedged, apparently permanently, into the angle of his right eye-socket. He was dressed in shabby, soiled flannels, and he looked as seedy as his clothes. He shook hands with Gwen. "Thanks. No tea. I'm taking whisky," he said to Evelyn. And he seated himself sprawlingly. The servant brought his whisky and a note for Evelyn.

"Is the messenger waiting?" she asked, when she had read it.

"Yes, Your Ladyship." She left her brother and Gwen alone.

"George is marrying the heiress," Gwen began.

"So he wrote me," replied Frothingham sullenly.

"Evelyn says you must go and do likewise."

He scowled. "But I'd rather stay here and marry you."

"Don't be silly," said Gwen with a shrug of her athletic young shoulders. "You've got nothing. I've got nothing. So—you must do your duty."

"Duty go hang!" said Frothingham fretfully. "Sometimes, do you know, Gwen, I come jolly near envying those beggars that live in cottages, and keep shops, and all that."

"Now you're sloppy, Arthur. You know you don't envy them; no more do I."

"Did Eve tell you old Bagley was down?"

"Yes. Ghastly—wasn't it?"

Frothingham sighed. "I shouldn't be so cut up if I'd had the fun of spending it."

"You did spend a lot of it." She was thinking what a great figure the young Earl had cut in her early girlhood days; she had always listened greedily when her brother with admiring envy, or Evelyn with sisterly pride, talked of his exploits on the turf and, let us say elsewhere, to shorten a long story.

"Only a few thousand that weren't worth the keeping," said Frothingham, a faint gleam of satisfaction appearing in the eye that was shielded by the monocle—he liked to remember his "career," and he liked the women to remind him of it in this flattering way. "All I really got was the bill for the governor's larks, and his governor's, and his governor's governor's. It's what I call rotten unfair—jolly rotten unfair. The fiddling for them—the bill for me."

"Buck up, Artie," said Gwen, stroking him gently with her riding-whip. "See how Georgie has faced it. And perhaps you won't draw such a bad one, either. She can't be worse than Cadbrough."

"But I want you, Gwen. I'm used to you, you know—and that's everything in a wife. I hate surprises, and these American beggars are full of 'em."

Evelyn came back. "Go away somewhere, both of you," she said. "Charley Sidney's just driving up. I wish to talk to him about the States."

Gwen paled and flushed; Frothingham grunted and scowled. They rose, made a short cut across the garden and were hidden by the left wing of the house. Almost immediately the servant announced "Mr. Sidney," and stood deferentially aside for a tall, thin American, elaborately Anglicized in look and dress, and, as it soon appeared, in accent. He had a narrow, vain face, browned and wrinkled by hard riding in hard weather in those early morning hours that should be spent in bed if one has lingered in the billiard-room with the drinks and smokes until past midnight.

"Ah, Lady Evelyn!" He shook hands with her and bowed and smirked. "I'm positively perishing for tea."

"You mean whisky?"

"Ah, yes—to be sure. I see there is whisky."

Evelyn's manner, which had been frank and equal before her friend and her brother, had frozen for Sidney into a shy stiffness not without a faint suggestion of the superior addressing the inferior. She had known Sidney for the ten years he had lived within two miles of Beauvais House, but—well, he wasn't "one of us" exactly; he had a way of bowing and of pronouncing titles that discouraged equality. The conversation dragged in dreary, rural fashion through gossip of people, dogs and horses, until she said:

"Have you heard the news of Surrey?"

"No—is His Grace coming home?"

"He's marrying—a Miss Dowie, of New York. Do you know her?"

"I've heard of her. You know, I've not been there longer than a week at a time for fifteen years." Sidney put on his extreme imitation-English air. "I loathe the place. They don't know how to treat a gentleman. And the lower classes!" He lifted his eyebrows and shook his head. He was at his most energetic when, in running down his native land to his English acquaintances, he reached the American "lower classes."

Evelyn concealed the satire which longed to express itself in her face. She despised Sidney and all the Anglicized Americans; and, behind their backs, she and her friends derided them—perhaps to repay themselves for the humiliation of accepting hospitalities and even more concrete favors from "those American bounders." The story among Sidney's upper-class English tolerators was that his father had kept a low public house in New York or San Francisco, or "somewhere over there"—they were as ignorant of the geography of the United States as they were of the geography of Patagonia.

"So he's to marry Dowie's daughter?" continued Sidney. "He was brakeman on a railway thirty years ago."

"How you Americans do jump about," said Evelyn, forgetting that Sidney prided himself on no longer being an American. "He must be clever."

"A clever rascal, probably," replied Sidney spitefully. "Over here he'd have been put into jail for what they honor him for over there."

"We've many of the same sort, no doubt," said Evelyn, thinking it tactful to hold aloof when a son was abusing his mother.

"Yes, but usually they're gentlemen and do things in a gentlemanly way."

"Mr. Dowie is rich?"

"Just now he is—they say." Sidney had the rich man's weakness for denying, or at least casting a doubt upon, the riches of other rich men. He knew that his was the finest and most valuable wealth in the world, and he would have liked to believe that it was the only wealth in the world. "I trust the Duke has looked sharp to the settlements."

"Why?" asked Evelyn, preparing to make mental notes.

"He may never get anything but what's settled on him and her now. Dowie is more or less of a speculator and may go broke. But that's not the only danger in marrying an American heiress. You see, Lady Evelyn, over there they have the vulgarest possible notions of rank and titles. And often, if there isn't a cash settlement when they 'buy the title,' as they describe it, they refuse to give up anything. Many of their rich men have the craze for founding colleges and asylums and libraries. They reason that they've got the title in the family, therefore it isn't necessary to pay for it; and so they leave all their money to build themselves a monument. Dishonorable, isn't it? But they stop at nothing."

"Then," said Evelyn, "an American heiress isn't an heiress so long as her father is alive?"

"Exactly. It's misleading to call her an heiress. She simply has hopes."

"I hope Surrey knows this."

"If he doesn't it's his own fault. I cautioned His Grace before he sailed."

"That reminds me, Mr. Sidney. Arthur may be going over to the wedding. Could you——"

"I'd be delighted," interrupted Sidney. "Anything I could do for Lord Frothingham it would be a pleasure to do. I can give him some useful letters, I think. Will he travel?"

"Possibly—I don't know. He has no plans as yet."

"I shall give him—if he will do me the honor of accepting them—only a few letters. The wisest plan is a proper introduction to the very best people. Then all doors will be open to him."

"The Americans are hospitable to every one, are they not?"

"Not to younger sons any more. And not to unaccredited foreigners. They've had their fingers jolly well burned. I knew of one case—a girl—quite a ladylike person, though of a new family from the interior. She married a French valet masquerading as a duke."

"MY NAME IS LONGVIEW"

"Poor creature," said Evelyn, smiling with amused contempt.

"Yes, and another girl married, or thought she married—a German royal prince. And when she got to Germany she found that she'd bought a place as mere morganatic wife, with no standing at all."

"Fancy! What a facer!"

"And she never got her money back—not a penny," continued Sidney. "But, like you, I don't sympathize with these upstart people who try to thrust themselves out of their proper station. The old families over there—and there are a few gentlefolk, Lady Evelyn, though they're almost lost in the crowd of noisy upstarts—never have such humiliating experiences in their international marriages."

"Naturally not," said Evelyn.

"But, as I was about to say, a foreigner with a genuine title, the head of a house of gentle people, is received with open arms. Lord Frothingham would be overwhelmed with hospitalities. My friends would see to that."

After a few minutes, without any impoliteness on Evelyn's part, Sidney began to feel that it was time for him to go. As he disappeared Gwen and Arthur came strolling back.

"What a noisome creature Sidney is," said Evelyn. "But he'll be of use to you, Arthur."

"Did he talk about the old families of America and the gentle birth?" asked Gwen. Her eyes were curiously bright and her manner and tone were agitated.

"All that again."

"He's an ass—a regular tomtit," growled Frothingham.

"I should think he'd learn," said Evelyn, "that we don't take him and his countrymen up because they're well born—we know they aren't."

"If those that are sensible enough to fly from that beastly country are like Sidney," said Gwen, "what a rowdy lot there must be at home." She spoke so nervously that Evelyn, abstracted though she was, glanced at her and noticed how pale and peaked she was. When she had ridden away Evelyn looked at her brother severely—she was only twenty-three, but she managed him, taking the place of both their parents who were long dead.

"You've been making love to Gwen," she exclaimed reproachfully. "You should be ashamed of yourself."

Frothingham removed his monocle, wiped it carefully in a brilliant plaid silk handkerchief, and slowly fitted it in place. Then he sent a mocking, cynical gleam through it at his sister. "You forget," he drawled, "that I caught you and Georgie kissing each other and crying over each other the day he went off to the States."

Evelyn flushed. "How does that excuse you?" she demanded, undismayed.

He was silent for a moment, then with tears in his eyes and a break in his habitual cynical drawl, "I can't go, Eve, I can't give her up."

Evelyn's heart ached, but she did not show it. She simply asked in her usual tone of almost icy calm, "Where's the oof to come from?"

He collapsed helplessly into a chair. There was no alternative—he must go; he must marry money. He owed it to his family and position; also, he wanted it himself—what is a "gentleman" without money? And—why, if he did not bestir himself he might actually have to go to work! And "what the devil could I work at? I might go out to service—I'd shine as a gentleman's gentleman—or I might do something as a billiard marker——"

With such dangers and degradations imminent, to think of love was sheer madness. Frothingham sighed and stared miserably through his monocle at the peacocks squawking their nerve-jarring predictions of rain.

II

ON THE second day out, in the morning, Frothingham was at the rail, his back to the sea, his glassed gaze roaming aimlessly up and down the row of passengers stretched at full length in steamer chairs. He became conscious of the manœuvrings of a little man in a little gray cap and little gray suit, with little gray side-whiskers that stood out like fins on either side of his little gray face. Each time this little person passed it was with a nervous smile at Frothingham and a nervous wiping of the lips with the tip of his tongue. When he saw that Frothingham, or rather, Frothingham's monocle, was noting him, he halted in front of him, too painfully self-conscious to see that the Englishman's look was about as cordial as that of a bald-headed man watching the circlings of a bluebottle fly.

"The Earl of Frothingham, is it not?" said he in a thin, small voice, his American overlaid with the most un-English of English accents.

Frothingham moved his head without relaxing from his stolid, vacant look.

"My name is Longview. I had the honor of meeting you at the hunt at Market Harboro two years ago—my daughter and I."

Frothingham stared vaguely into space, little Longview looking up at him with an expression of ludicrously painful anxiety. "Oh, yes," he drawled finally. And he extended his hand with condescending graciousness. "I remember. I'm glad to see you."

Longview expelled a big breath of relief. He was used to being forgotten, was not unused to remaining forgotten. "You may recall," he hastened on, eager to clinch himself in an earl's memory, "we had your cousin, Lord Ramsay's place, Cedric Hall, that year."

Frothingham remembered perfectly—the rich, Anglicized American who fed his neighbors well, was generous in lending mounts and traps, and was, altogether, a useful and not unamusing nuisance. Rich, but—how rich?

"And your daughter?" said Frothingham—he recalled her indistinctly as young, very hoydenish and very daring on horseback.

"She is with me," said Longview, delighted to be convinced that he was remembered and remembered distinctly—and by a Gordon-Beauvais! "It would give me great pleasure to present you."

As they went down the deck the little man peered at every one with a nervous little smile—"as if he were saying, 'Don't kick me, please. I mean well,'" thought Frothingham. In fact, back of the peering and the smile was the desire that all should see that he had captured the Earl. They entered the library and advanced toward a young woman swathed in a huge blue cape, her eyes idly upon a book.

"Honoria, my dear," said Longview, as nervous as if he were speaking to the young woman without having been introduced to her, "you remember Lord Frothingham?"

Honoria slowly raised her eyelids from a pair of melancholy, indifferent gray eyes and slightly inclined her head. The men seated themselves on either side of her, Longview rattled on in his almost hysterical way for a few minutes, then fluttered away. Honoria and Frothingham sat silent, she looking at her book, he looking at her.

"You are going home?" he said when he saw that she would not "lead," no matter how long the silence might continue.

"No," she replied. "We are English—at least, my father is."

"And you?"

She just moved her shoulders and there was the faintest sneer at the corner of her decidedly pretty mouth. "I don't know—what does it matter about a woman? I've lived in England and France since I was five, except a year and a half in America. Father detests the country and the people. He was naturalized in England last year. I believe he decided that his social position, won through his being an American, was sufficiently established to make it safe for him to change."

Frothingham smiled. As he was used to the freest and frankest criticisms of parents and other near relatives by fellow-countrymen of his own class, it did not impress him as unfilial that a daughter should thus deride a father. Honoria became silent and apparently oblivious of his presence.

"I've never been to America," he said, hoping to resurrect the dead conversation. "I'm looking forward to it with much pleasure. We have many Americans in our neighborhood—such jolly people."

"I know few Americans." Honoria looked disdainful. "And they are like us, the most of them—expatriated. They say their country is a good place to make money in but a horrible place to live—crude and ill-mannered, full of vulgar people that push in everywhere, and the servants fancying they're ladies and gentlemen."

"I hope it's no worse to live in than England," said Frothingham. "You know we're always flying to the Continent to escape the climate and the dullness. And our middle classes are very uppish nowadays, don't you think?"

"I detest England." Honoria put the first emphasis into her voice, but it was slight.

"Beastly hole, except for a few weeks in the spring, isn't it? If it wasn't for the hunting it would be deserted."

He saw her cold, regular features light up. "I love hunting," she said. "It's the one thing that can make me forget myself and everything except just being alive and well." Then her face shadowed and chilled, and she looked at her book so significantly that Frothingham was forced to rise and leave.

At luncheon the man in the chair next him — Barney, who had told him in the first half-hour of their acquaintance all about his big dry-goods shop in Chicago — said: "I saw you talking to Longview on deck. Is he a friend of yours?"

"An acquaintance," replied Frothingham — he rather liked Barney because he was shrewd and humorous, and treated him in an offhand fashion that was refreshing and amusing in a "tradesman."

"He's a low-down snob," said Barney, encouraged by Frothingham's disclaimer. "One of those fellows that think their own country ain't good enough for them. I was glad when he got himself naturalized over in your country. You're welcome to him. What kind of people does he herd with in England?"

"We like him very well, I believe. He seems to be an agreeable fellow."

"I suppose he kowtows and blows himself, and so they let him hang on to the tail-board — he ain't heavy and don't take up much room. His grandfather stole with both hands and put it in real estate. Then his father made quite a bunch in the early railroad days. And now this fellow's posing as an aristocrat. If he wasn't rich who'd notice him?"

"Then he's rich?" inquired Frothingham.

"Yes and no," replied Barney, his rich man's jealousy visibly roused. "There was a big family of them. He's got maybe a couple of millions or three. That ain't much in these days. You heard about his knockout?"

"Has he lost part of his money?"

"I thought everybody knew that story — it was in all the papers. No, it wasn't money — worse than that, from his point of view. His daughter — she's with him on the ship — fell in love with the second son of some marquis or other. But he didn't have anything, and I believe you titled people ain't allowed to work. Longview was red-headed — wouldn't give his daughter a cent unless she married a big title. And then the young man's older brother died."

"Was it the Marquis of Dullingford?"

"Yes, that was it. And right on top of it his elder brother's two sons were drowned, and he came into the title and estates. And what does he do but up and marry an English girl that he'd been struck on all the time, but couldn't marry because he was so poor. Longview nearly went crazy at missing the chance. And his daughter — it must have made her mighty sour to find out that the fellow had been only pretending to be in love with her, and was really out for her cash and didn't care a rap about her. A low pup, wasn't he?"

Frothingham began to detest Barney — "an impudent, malicious beggar," he thought. He gave him his monocle's coldest stare.

"No," went on Barney, unchilled, "Longview's not so rich. I could buy him twice over, and not take a cent of it out of my business. But I want to see any scamp, foreign or domestic, hanging round my daughter for her money. She'll get nary a red till I shuffle off. And she'll get mighty little then if she don't marry to suit me. That's our way."

Frothingham changed his mind about dropping his acquaintance with Barney. He had begun to modify the low view of him so soon as he heard that he had a daughter, and "could buy Longview twice over," and leave the big business — "seventy stores under one roof" — intact. "Miss Barney may be worth looking at," he reflected. "And her papa might relent about settlements. I suspect he isn't above loving a lord — he's too good an American for that."

What Barney had told him gave him the key to Honoria. He felt genuine sympathy for her — their sorrows were similar. "Poor creature," he thought. "No wonder she's so down in the mouth." After luncheon he met her father on deck and did not repel his advances. "But," he said to himself, "it don't do to be too friendly with these beggars. It's like shaking hands with your tailor. He don't think you've pulled him up, but that you've let yourself down."

To the "beggar" he said:

"I looked all round the dining-room, but I didn't see you and your daughter."

Longview smiled proudly. "We have our meals in our sitting-room," he replied. "We dislike being stared at and mixed in with a crowd of eating people. We like privacy. We'd be glad to have you join us."

Frothingham's first impulse was to accept. It would cost him nothing — probably he'd get his wine and mineral water and cigars free. And he'd have a fine chance at Honoria. But her face came before his mind. He decided that he would do well to wait until he could learn whether she was really part of the inviting "we."

Although he was not welcomed, but merely tolerated, he seated himself on the extension of a vacant chair beside her and talked — hunting, which, as she had shown him, was her weakness. She was soon interested, and she unbent toward him so far that, when her father came and renewed his invitation, she joined in it. Just as Frothingham accepted he saw Barney half-a-dozen chairs away glowering at Longview. "I'll offend Barney, no doubt," he said to himself. "But I'll risk it. I must play the cards I have in my hand."

Barney came into the smoke-room late in the evening as he was sitting there, having a final whisky and water before going to bed. "Won't you have a high ball or something?" he asked, making room for Barney's broad form.

"No, I never touch liquor. Don't allow it in my house. It's no good — no business man ought to touch it."

"I suppose not," replied Frothingham, feeling that here was new evidence of the essentially degrading nature of business.

"I missed you at dinner," Barney went on.

"The Longviews invited me to feed with them," replied Frothingham carelessly. "They're served in their sitting-room. Sorry to leave you, but the service is much better."

Barney's maxillary muscles expanded and contracted with anger. He half snorted, half laughed. "You might know," he said, "that that shark-faced snob would invent a new way of making himself ridiculous. So, the general dining-room ain't good enough for him, eh? He is a swell, ain't he? I should think he and his — no, leave the young lady out of it — I should think he'd be ashamed to fish for you so openly." Barney's tone softened apologetically, greatly to Frothingham's surprise, as he added: "I don't blame you, Mr. Frothingham. I understand how it is with you titled people in your country. I don't blame anybody for walking round on human necks if their owners'll allow it. But we feel differently about all those kind of things."

Frothingham smiled conciliatingly. "Oh, I say, now! I don't see anything to make a row over. The beggar's got a right to eat where he pleases, hasn't he?"

"Of course he has, and to stick his tongue out at all the rest of us, as he does it. You don't understand. It ain't what he does. It's why he does it. We Americans can't stand those kind of airs."

"It seems very mysterious to me," confessed Frothingham. "I admit I don't understand your country."

"Oh, you're all right," reassured Barney, slapping Frothingham's leg cordially. "I never thought I'd like one of you titled fellows. I despised you all for a useless set of nobodies and nincompoops. And whenever my womenfolks got to talking about that kind of thing I always sat on 'em, and sat hard — I'm a hard sitter when I want to be. But I like you, young man. You're more an American than an Englishman, just as Longview's more English than American — he ain't American, at all. You talk like an American. You behave like an American. And when you've been in America long enough to wear your clothes out, and get some that fit you, you'll look like an American."

"Thanks," said Frothingham dryly.

"You don't like it?" Barney laughed good-humoredly. "Well, I don't blame you. You're judging America by Longview and me. That ain't fair. I'm a rough one — never had a chance — first thing I remember is carrying the swill buckets out to feed the hogs before sunup when I still wore slips. But I mean right. And I've got a son and a daughter that are a real gentleman and a real lady, and don't you forget it."

"Oh, you're all right," said Frothingham, slapping Barney on the leg — Frothingham was a sentimental dog where his pocket and his pleasure were not concerned, and he liked Barney's look as he spoke of himself and the hogs, and his children.

"You don't want to go back to that little old island of yours," continued Barney, "without seeing Chicago. There's a town! And I'll give you the time of your life. I want you to meet my family."

"I hope I shall," said Frothingham. He was smiling to himself — evidently Barney wasn't above a weakness for a lord. "It was a good stroke any way you look at it, my going with the Longviews," he reflected. "It's made Barney jealous and he thinks more of me than ever."

He divided his time unevenly between the Longviews and Barney. He wished to introduce Barney to them, but Longview hysterically refused. "It's all right for you, Frothingham," he explained. "But we can't afford to do it. How'd you like to be introduced to middle-class English?"

"Oh, I shouldn't mind. I'd just forget 'em the next time we met. The brutes'd expect it and wouldn't think of annoying me."

"Precisely — precisely," said Longview. "But our — that is — the American middle-classes are different. They don't understand differences of social position, or pretend not to. If this Barney person were presented to us, he probably wouldn't take the cut when we met again, but would come straight up to us. You've no idea how impudent they are."

"But why do you call him middle-class? Ain't he rich?" asked Frothingham.

Longview looked at him tragically. "Birth and breeding count with us just as — I mean count in America just as in England."

"Gad, they don't count in England any more, except against one. But we can't get it out of our heads that you Americans go in for equality and all that sort of thing."

"Not at all. Not at all," Longview protested. "The lines are the more closely drawn because there are no official lines."

"But what's the matter with Barney? He seems right enough. I've got uncles that are worse. Gad, there's one of 'em I could get rich on if I could cage him and exhibit him."

"My dear Frothingham, this Barney keeps a retail shop. Even in New York they draw the line at retail shops."

"It's very mysterious." Frothingham shook his head. "I fear I shall never learn. Why don't they put it all in a book, as we do? Then we could take it at the university instead of Greek."

He looked at Honoria. She was giving her plate a scornful smile. Her father looked at her also, and reddened as he noted her expression, and shifted the conversation abruptly to the day's run. Frothingham was becoming interested in Honoria now that he had assured himself of her eligibility. She was not beautiful, not especially distinguished looking. But she had an utter lack of interest in him, as well as in the rest of her surroundings, that piqued him. Then, too, her small figure was graceful and strong; and when her face did light up it showed strength of character, and either what she said or the way she said it created a vivid impression of personality. He soon felt that she liked him. Her manner toward him was friendlier even than her manner toward her father, her lack of respect for whom was scantily concealed.

"I'VE NEVER BEEN TO AMERICA," HE SAID

The Unknown Morgan

BY ONE WHO KNOWS HIM

IT WAS one of the crucial days in the birth of the Steel Trust. Mr. Morgan's anteroom was filling with a distinguished company. Large properties were to be consolidated, and their multi-millionaire controllers were coming in to be placated, reassured, satisfied. A corporation of unprecedented magnitude was to be chartered, and the best lawyers were coming in to submit their plans for rejection or partial approval. Nearly a billion and a half of stocks and bonds were to be floated, and the most skillful bankers in New York were coming in to make suggestions or to receive instructions.

As the moments passed the anteroom filled, every man in it except Mr. Morgan's agitated messenger representing something important in this commercial world of ours. These great men were shifting impatiently, were talking sullenly or angrily in low tones, were acting as if they were "cooling their heels" in the anteroom of a king and did not in the least fancy being thus lowered from the estate and consideration to which they felt entitled. And they were busy men, too, with no time to waste. Yet their time was wasting, and although their glances, concentrated under frowning brows upon the door of Mr. Morgan's private office, seemed potent enough to hurl it from its hinges, it remained closed.

The messenger had been asked so many times by such important persons, "How long will Mr. Morgan be engaged?" that his stereotyped "I don't know, sir," had become hysterical. He seemed in danger of a breakdown, like an actor who repeats the same part too often. Also he looked as if he had a foreboding of an impending calamity; as if he felt that, when the door did finally open, something would appear which would cause a cataclysm of wrath. When he was not saying "I don't know, sir," or was not looking appealingly at Mr. Morgan's motionless door, he was glancing from face to face through the distinguished company with a pleading expression which might be saying, "Gentlemen, I hope you won't take it out on me when you find who's been making Mr. Morgan keep you waiting."

Who was it—that was what the distinguished waiters were demanding one of another with heads as hot as their heels were cool. What potentate of finance? What king among the plutocrats? For mighty indeed must be he who could thus thrust and hold that barrier between such as they and Mr. Morgan.

The seconds crawled; the minutes snailed it; the half-hours lingered like years. And still the door remained closed; and still the crowded anteroom remained crowded; and tempers rose, boiled over in loud mutterings; and wonder grew.

The Woman Who Kept Morgan Waiting

At last, after two hours and eleven minutes and a half—to be as exact as possible, for none of the waiters happened to have a split-second watch—the door of the great Morgan reluctantly opened. In the doorway appeared—a woman!

Young? Pretty? Titled, perhaps—possibly a princess? Vastly rich?

The distinguished company stared at her, each throne, principality and power of finance with a different expression of profound, dumfounded amazement upon his face.

She was an old woman, a faded woman, a study in feebleness of body and mind. She was shabbily dressed. She was not only unattractive but she showed that she never had been attractive. Behind her, bowing and smiling upon her with a gentle courtesy that was almost deferential, came Mr. Morgan. He glanced around the crowded anteroom, then back to his honored visitor—for two hours with Morgan at his office is not a call but a visit, and a good long one.

She was moving out when she suddenly remembered something she had forgotten to say to him. She faced him again. She talked for ten minutes more, questioning and cross-questioning him. He listened as if there were nothing to which he attached so much importance as to what fell from those withered lips in that monotonous voice. And he answered as if Heaven had created him for the especial purpose of enlightening her.

Who was she? A poor old woman who had about $20,000 on deposit with him—all she had in the world. It had been about $2000, and, by investing it as Morgan can invest, he had multiplied it by ten. Then he had written her the good news in a formal way through the regular channels. And she had come down partly to thank him, chiefly to put him on the witness stand and satisfy herself that he was not gambling with her fortune, was not going to lose it in mad speculations and leave her penniless. And it had taken him those two hours and more to reassure her, to quiet her sick, troubled old mind, haunted by the spectre of want, to convince her that her all was safe and that he was behaving himself conservatively in managing it. And in all that time not by look or word or gesture had he shown her what she was doing—that she was wasting time than which there was none more valuable to more people anywhere on earth at that part of that day.

She shook a forefinger encased in worn black kid warningly at him. "Now, you must be careful!" she said.

"I'll be very careful, ma'am," he replied, as if he were pledging himself to guard a vast empire.

She was gone. His face changed as his eyes wheeled, fierce as the muzzles of thirteen-inch guns, from face to face of his stupefied waiters. They were just gathering themselves together to be angry. They cleared the anger from their faces instantly. When the lightnings begin to flash in Morgan's eyes, few indeed are the men he deals with in two continents who do not straightway cast about for some way to placate him.

Why did this doddering old woman receive, albeit wholly unconsciously and as a matter of course, such marks of favor as none of those with whom Morgan traffics in millions would dare demand? What did he owe her? Almost nothing; nothing at all that most men, even most sensitive men, would regard as a debt. It would be cruel to explain, because then many might recognize the personality of the old woman which has here been carefully veiled. It is enough to say that it was not even so great an obligation as a kindly man might feel to his nurse.

There are some people—among them several who are worth more millions than there are weeks in the year—who will tell you that of the curt, intolerant, discourteous men in the world Mr. Morgan is easily first. There are others—fortunately for Mr. Morgan, they don't all of them haunt his office—who will tell you that Mr. Morgan is a good-natured, easy-going fellow, fond of listening, never in a hurry, and tremendously polite unless one tries to thank him for doing a favor. Both sets of Mr. Morgan's acquaintances are right and both are wrong—as is usually the case in estimates of a man got from those who know him personally. Which side of him is the real Morgan? Like all large men, he is large enough to have many sides—let him who is small enough to have only one boast it, if he likes.

Often in the spring and fall Mr. Morgan leaves his office abruptly, several hours before his usual time, and disappears mysteriously. Some of his clerks wink and all of them wonder. And his partners and the great men of "the Street" who need his advice frown and wish "J. P. M." would appreciate what it means to them to have him go off with loose ends of big enterprises hanging every which way.

When Morgan Leaves the Office

It would be a very daring—it might be a very mean—thing to do, to follow Mr. Morgan. But let us venture it. His cab takes him to the pier off which his yacht Corsair waits for him. He enters a launch and is steamed swiftly to the yacht. He goes aboard and the Corsair at once sets out—up the East River toward the Sound.

It steams steadily for an hour, then puts in at the landing of a summer house—the house of a young married couple who are very near relatives of Mr. Morgan. The great man, who has been traveling alone, disembarks alone and goes up to the house.

Only the servants welcome him—the young woman and her husband happen to be away. Mr. Morgan goes into the house and up the stairs, up to a bedroom. He enters and sends out a nice-looking young woman who is there and then closes, perhaps locks, the door. He seems to be alone in the room.

No, he is not alone. In a little bed lies a baby, a near relative of Mr. Morgan's, as near as a grandchild. He wakes the baby up—and the baby at first doesn't fancy being rudely recalled from the very pleasant Land of Nod to the as yet, for it, not at all pleasant land of colic and sticking pins, of poking fingers and "say goo-goo" maniacs. But once its big eyes are opened and it clearly sees who has recalled it, it is delighted. For it recognizes the grandest, most sympathetic, most resourceful, most patient playmate it has discovered on earth thus far. And with wild gurgles of joy and wavings of rosy fists it makes for his mustache, his hair, his necktie, his dignity. Further into this adventure of a money-king it would be impertinent to intrude. Suffice it to say that Mr. Morgan drops sixty odd years off his life for the space of about an hour, then returns his exhausted playmate to its nurse and its nap, leaves the house as straightly as he entered it, is steamed back to New York and finishes the day.

Mr. Morgan is a good judge of stocks, of railroads, of individuals, of properties of all kinds. He is a good judge of paintings and china and sundry antiquities in tapestry, furniture and manuscripts. He is a good judge of men, no worse judge of women than the average man—perhaps a little better judge of them than the average woman. But to find his judgment at its best you must explore his views on babies. You wouldn't think it to look in his eyes or at his huge brow or cowcatcher-like jaw when he is at the reins recovering control of a runaway stock market; but any baby who is well acquainted with him or any mother who has seen him with her baby will tell you so. And it may not be amiss here to set down an opinion: No strong bad man ever played an hour, or half an hour, or more than a Napoleon's four or five minutes, with a baby. Weak bad men may have done it, but no strong one. The masculine heart that can harbor malignance or deliberately planned design of evil or of reckless selfishness cannot wash itself clean enough to fit its owner for an hour as playmate of a baby.

The Sporty Financier Who Sang Hymns

Not long ago a man was invited to spend a few days on the Corsair. She was lying off a New England harbor when he joined her. He had been indulging in splendid speculations as to the kind of sumptuous reveling time he would have provided for him. When he went aboard and inquired for his host one of the men said: "You'll find him in the galley." To the galley he went, and there was the presiding genius of international finance—clad in chef's white cap and apron and false sleeves—manufacturing a kind of pancake he just then thought well of—no man has the digestion long to think well of any kind of pancake or, for that matter, of pancakes in general. And after dinner they gathered about a big organ which Mr. Morgan has had built into the wall of the saloon, and sang—hymns! Mr. Morgan likes to sing hymns for two reasons. One is that he likes to sing, and hymns are good, easy, sonorous singing. The other reason recalls a story of Charles II. Some one asked the King who "never said a foolish thing, and never did a wise one," what was his religion. "I," he replied, "am of the religion of all sensible men." "And what religion is it?" "That," replied Charles, "all sensible men agree not to tell." But it may be proper to say that not even Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Sage is more religious than Mr. Morgan.

In one respect Mr. Morgan is a miser: he is a greedy, grasping, fierce miser of his business time. No man lives who has lifted himself so much as a hair's breadth above his fellows that has not come to sympathize with any downpour of wrath upon time-wasters. And when a man rises to Mr. Morgan's height in affairs, when he has an important interest clamoring for every second of his time, for every grain of his brain-power, the time-waster becomes the chief plague of his life.

Mr. Morgan is of course never at leisure. There was a King once—was it Dionysius?—who, when some one said to him, "When shall you be at leisure?" answered, "Heaven forbid that that calamity should ever befall me." Mr. Morgan has been in no danger of the calamity of leisure since 1897, nor will he be again so long as there shall be life enough in him to respond to the pleadings of unemployed capital, clamoring to be advised what to do to keep itself from the decay of inactivity. He may betake himself to special express trains—bundles of telegrams will be flung upon it whenever it stops to change engines. He may fly to Europe—are there no cables, are there no millions of capital searching for employment there? The telephone will drag him from his privacy of the home, the Marconigraph will whisper into his privacy of the high seas. And Mr. Morgan's brain can't make more than sixty seconds out of a minute or more than sixty minutes out of an hour. Hence the heaviness of the time-waster's offense.

Except such time-wasters as her described at the beginning of this article, those sent upon him for his sins and to give him opportunity to plant and grow the virtue of the "man in the land of Uz whose name was Job," the worst of his time-wasters are among those associated with him in his enterprises, especially the dull rich men. They waste his time and file away his brain-power with complaints and with compliments, by acting without him when they should not, by not acting without him when they should, by executing his orders at the wrong time, by not executing his orders at the right time, and finally, and colossally, by excuses for failure.

In a recent number of Blackwood's there is an interesting, shrewd, eulogistic estimate of Kitchener, in the course of which it is said that he is absolutely brutal in his refusal ever in any circumstances to accept any excuse whatsoever for failure. In general, as any one who reads biography will note, men of large achievement have been alike in this respect. But there is a difference between the comparatively small large-men like Kitchener and the large large-men like Morgan. Both become as a consuming fire in the presence of an excuse for failure—they know that if one begins to tolerate excuses his day is done, his time will be forever thereafter taken up with listening to them. But while the leader of the Kitchener class wipes out the excuse-maker, the leader of the Morgan type consumes only the excuse-maker's weakness for self-excuse and braces the excuse-maker himself to doing better. Thus, the one kind of leader is always cursed with a new plague of excuse-makers; the other kind of leader trains his men, holds on to them, builds them up into useful agents.

That is why, although Mr. Morgan is a "difficult man to get on with," "almost impossible," he is not altogether impossible; is, on the contrary, less and less impossible to each man with increasing length of service. They call it "getting used to Morgan"—what an interesting collection could be made of the phrases men invent to save or to soothe their vanity! The truth, of course, is that they grow under Morgan's not gentle but most invigorating licking-into-shape.

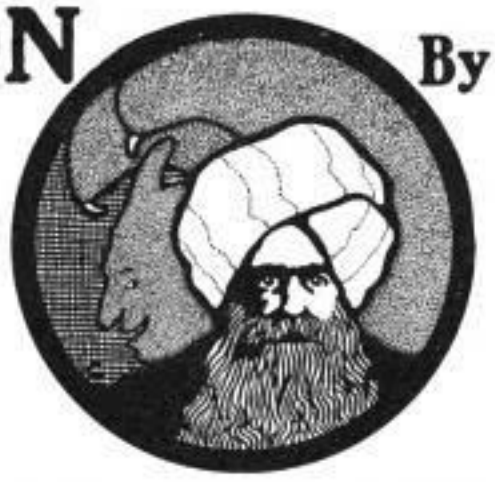
Mr. Morgan's most striking characteristic is his supreme independence of all men whatsoever.

There are two reasons for this almost unprecedented independence:

First, he makes enemies only among the most timid, least vindictive of the human species.

Many men are deferentially called—usually by the shallow—masters of millions. Mr. Morgan is not so much a master of millions as he is a Master of Millionaires, master of those so-called masters of millions who are so often the cringing slaves of their millions. Some of them have excellent financial brains; others have only millions inherited or millions accidental before which they stand or squat, agape and dazed. But, whether able and rich or rich only, almost all are timid—pitifully, incurably timid; the richer, the timider.

Mr. Morgan deals in the main with the millions of incapable men and with the surplus millions of clever men who are too busy taking in money at the sources of their wealth to attend personally to the investment and direction of their surplus. He has succeeded in winning the blind confidence of the one class, the intelligent confidence of the other. Both are alike dependent upon him.



The second reason for Mr. Morgan's independence of foe or friend or fate is that he does not care for money.

You rarely see estimates of his fortune, and they are always careless, languid guesses. You never hear his name spoken when the conversation turns on mere millions. Morgan's personality looms titanic beside his pygmy fortune—and would it not loom as large were his fortune many times as great as it is?

It is believed that he has recently made up his mind to put by no more money, but to spend all he makes—to spend it upon art collections and hospitals and other educational and philanthropic enterprises, public or semi-public. Certain it is that he had been disdainfully careless of his own money-making opportunities. It has been said of the Romans in their day of glory that they were great not by reason of what they had but by reason of what they gave; that it was their pride to remain poor yet to be the masters of kings, the donors of kingdoms. Some such spirit seems to possess Mr. Morgan. He might have had millions on millions—as many as he cared to bear away. You remember the fable of the lion and the rest of the animals—how they went hunting together and brought down a stag; how, when the time for division came, the lion advanced, laid a paw upon the stag and said: "I divide this stag into three parts. The first is mine as my share of the prey. The second is mine as King of Beasts. As for the third, let him take it who dares!"

Mr. Morgan might have assumed such a rôle—with excellent chances for a large measure of success. But with a largeness that bespeaks superior intellect and inferior appetites, and that rebukes the crawling covetousness of wealth for wealth's sake, he disdainfully left the bulk of the quarry to his fellow-huntsmen, reserving only enough to maintain for him wholesome and necessary security, respect and dread. They are obtainable in only one way in the company he keeps; no poor man, however able, could have them there. He has put by powder and shell to charge his big guns should others cease to bring him ammunition or conspire to dethrone him.

LORD CURZON By Sydney Brooks

THE RECORD OF THREE YEARS OF TIRELESS, DISTINCTIVE AND BRILLIANT WORK

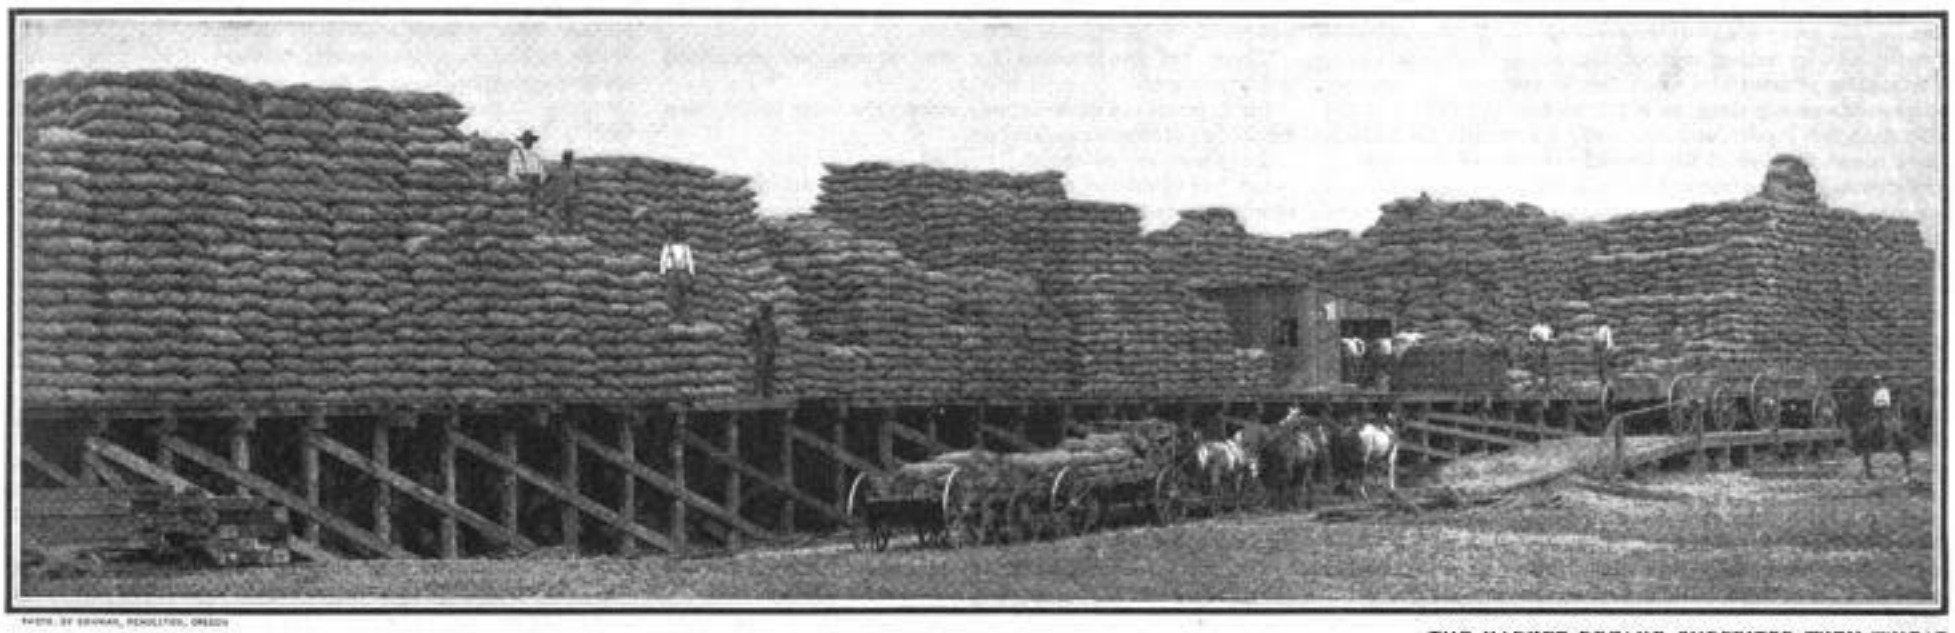
THE recent Grand Durbar at Delhi, in which all England was keenly interested, was something more than a great Imperial pageant. It was intended to symbolize, and it did symbolize, the accession of King Edward VII as Emperor of India. That was an event which touched the Oriental imagination to a degree we hardly realize. All Indians of whatever race or creed hold true to the cardinal virtue of the East—loyalty to the hand that gives them salt; and loyalty with them takes inevitably a personal form and fastens on a personal object. But the Grand Durbar did not mean all that it might. The Emperor was not there; neither was the Heir Apparent. Lord Curzon did all he could to persuade King Edward to be crowned in person, but His Majesty felt obliged to decline, not because he was unwilling to go or feared the physical strain, but simply because of the immense dislocation of public business that would be caused by his absence for so long a time. The Prince of Wales was kept at home by the condition of his wife's health, and though no doubt the Duke of Connaught represented the King, as the London papers put it, "with all the charm and dignity that belong by nature to the English royal family," still the fact that the Duke is not in direct succession to the throne robs the Coronation ceremony of much of its picturesqueness and most of its inner meaning. Even so, the Grand Durbar had its significance and its uses. Among other things it marked the crowning point of Lord Curzon's Viceroyalty.

Lord Curzon, it is agreed on all hands, has made an excellent Viceroy of India—indeed, so excellent that it is now almost difficult to understand the ominous head-shakings that greeted his appointment in the fall of 1899. At that time people in England thought and spoke of Lord Curzon as a sort of brilliant schoolboy. Something of precocious immaturity seemed to hang round his manner and deliverances in the House of Commons. He had taken, as every one knew, an immensity of trouble to fit himself for public life; had traveled widely and intelligently, especially in the East; knew everybody worth knowing, had seen everything, "written most of the books and abstracted the rest," as a perverse opponent once remarked in the heat of debate. As the son of a peer, born in the purple and looking upon office as a birthright, he might have advanced to a high position by simply letting it be known that he expected promotion. But that was not Lord Curzon's way. From the time he went up to Balliol he devoured Blue Books as though they were novels, and set himself to collecting data and compiling statistics with an industry that might be called a passion. Omniscience with him was not so much a foible as a deliberate plan of life.

Possibly it was the cold-bloodedness of his knowledge and a too "superior" manner of imparting it that made people a little skeptical. Mr. Curzon used to sweep away all criticism with the exasperating dogmatism of the man who had been there and ought to know. The youthful minister seemed to have a kindly contempt for all people who had traveled less than he had, interviewed fewer princes and potentates, or were not so well primed as he with local knowledge. Now and then it almost appeared from his speeches as though Mr. Curzon thought himself personally responsible for the peace of Europe. The papers chaffed him unmercifully, and altogether it was difficult to take him quite seriously or do justice to the accuracy of mind and knowledge that lay beneath his airy mannerisms. There was a great deal of interest felt in his appointment to the Viceroyalty as well as not a little mistrust. Mr. Curzon up to that time had not impressed England as precisely the man to be intrusted with the government of 300,000,000 people, especially at a crisis when war, plague and famine had put a hard strain on their loyalty to the British Raj. With some his youth—he is still only forty-three—counted adversely.

But now, after three years' trial, it seems that Lord Salisbury knew his man. Lord Curzon, the Viceroy of India, is a distinct improvement on Mr. Curzon, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. His policy, so far from being rash and provocative, has shown an inclination toward the safer and more conservative ideals of Lord Laurence. He has not dealt in innovation, or set himself and his tourist impressions above the advice of the departmental chiefs, or antagonized Russia, or, in fact, done any of the things that people feared he might do. It is true he has at times trod rather heavily on officialdom's toes, but it was mainly in order to rouse officialdom to a new activity.

For the rest, the tendency of Lord Curzon's actions, so far, has been to restore the administrative spirit and more tactful methods of the sixties. At the same time he has shown himself a bold, practical and imaginative ruler. He piloted India through a severe famine with a coolness and discretion and a respect for native customs that saved England from many of the overzealous blunders of '97. He has organized a new frontier province, and largely modified the Forward Policy that he used to defend with so much earnestness and wealth of local color in the House of Commons. He has effected, too, many administrative reforms. He found India half-strangled in statistics, the Secretariat calling for more and more reports, the Civil Service threatening to decline into a grandiose information bureau. He at once cut down by nearly half the number of reports that the Collectors are required to send in to Simla. He encouraged them to trust more to themselves, to mix as freely as they used to do with the natives, and to rule less by mechanical system than by the force of personal ascendency. In a word, he has made an effort to revive the old patriarchal régime, and to include sympathy and popularity among the objects at which government should aim. On all such subjects as the absenteeism and dissipated lives of the native princes, and the condition of the Eurasians, he has spoken with a level-headed directness and vigor very far removed from the amiable nothings of the average Viceroy. He may, in fact, be called the first Viceroy, just as Mr. Chamberlain is the first Colonial Secretary, with a policy of his own.



Besides all this Lord Curzon has immensely furthered the work of irrigation, has remodeled the educational system, has done much to revive the old native industries and especially—this at Lady Curzon's request—the old native arts, has largely freed the peasantry of the Punjab from debt, has reduced the cable charges between India and England, and forwarded in all ways the conversion of the country to a gold standard. This is the record of three years of tireless, distinctive and brilliant work. Lord Curzon is not afraid to rule, even, when necessary, as an autocrat. He has shown a fine imaginative sense of the Oriental nature in at least two of its manifold aspects—its desire for strong, direct leadership and its instinct for the ceremonial side of government. His tours through the provinces were the longest and most imposing that any Viceroy has ever made; and he made the Grand Durbar at Delhi a splendid and inspiring pageant, the fame and magnificence of which will be talked over for generations in every village of India. His term of office has still another two years to run. When he returns to England and to home politics it will be to sit in the House of Lords and to find himself a far more esteemed and powerful man than when he sailed three years ago. Politicians who look ahead already see in him not only a Foreign Secretary but a Prime Minister.

A MEASURE OF WHEAT

THE MARKET BECAME SURFEITED WITH WHEAT

By Edgar L. Hampton

"NO, SIR," said old man Keating in conclusion; "there are just two fellows my girl can't marry with my consent: that's a preacher and a school-teacher. I know it's pretty hard on you, Richard, but wheat's my business—not love. You remember that smart young Andrews that held revival meetings in the schoolhouse down by the Yamhill last winter? Well, he wanted Helen the worst way, though I've always thought he wanted my twelve hundred acres of wheat land worse. They were in college together down at the Willamette, you know. But he was a preacher, and that let him out. You're a school-teacher, and as far as I can see that lets you out—though upon my word I'm sorry. Now, if there was any excuse——" he hesitated, trying in his rough way to be kind; "but there ain't," he added, and tightening the reins over the back of his high-headed roadster, he put one foot on the buggy step and looked at the petitioner over his shoulder.

The young man turned away with a bitter, half-defeated look on his face, but at a second thought recalled himself to say: "I want you to understand, Mr. Keating, that I haven't asked you for your farm, and don't want it. I have asked for your daughter, merely as an act of courtesy. I'll marry her anyhow at the finish," he added defiantly, under his breath.

"Eh? Don't want the farm?" The old man was a little deaf, but he caught every word that pertained directly to wheat.

"Well, I don't say you do. But you know the man that gets Helen gets the farm along with her, and me and Sarah thrown in, for that matter. Mind, now, young man, it ain't that I don't like you, personally. And I'll admit that you're bright, and chuck-full o' diplomys. But you're one of them pesky young Easterners that come into the valley with a whoop and a hurrah and change things. The country's always been good enough for me just as it is. I'm ready to let well enough alone. I ain't got any respect for your diplomys, an' I consider the years you spent a-gettin' 'em as so much time wasted. They don't have anything to do with the price of Oregon wheat. I want a man to marry Helen that can go right on here a-raisin' wheat, as I've been doin' for more than thirty years. You couldn't do that." And the old man climbed into the buggy.

"I'm not so sure that I couldn't raise wheat if I set my head to it, Mr. Keating," insisted the young man, in a longing effort to put off the inevitable. "My college work was intended as a basis for business. I——"

"Well, you'll have to show me," tartly declared the other, gathering up the laprobe.

"I was about to add that I was raised on an Iowa wheat farm," replied the young man hotly. "I've done a few strokes at the plow myself."

"You'd ought to 'a' stayed with it, then," remarked old man Keating shortly; "that's all I know." And buttoning the duster about his throat he drove out of the barnyard and down the maple-lined roadway toward Sheridan.

But as he turned out of the driveway into the Sheridan and Willamina road he held his horse down to a sober walk and reflected.

He was the wealthiest farmer in the Willamette Valley within a radius of twenty miles—and that was saying a good deal. But he wasn't thinking of that. Everybody knew that. Neither was he thinking in particular of the handsome young man who had just had the temerity to ask for the succession to his acres, though it must be admitted that this had, in a manner, directed his thoughts. He was thinking of the girl—his little wayward Helen—who, after she had finished the public schools, at the uncertain age of fifteen, had come to him, one day when he was out among the cattle, with the modest request of a term of years in one of the up-valley colleges. He remembered with satisfaction how he had denied her petition and, towering up in the full strength of his acknowledged authority, had told her to go back to her dish-washing, thinking there would be an end of it; and that, a year later, he remembered with some chagrin she had come a second time, set her dainty little foot down, and amid a storm of passion declared she just would go. And then, the great show of temerity suddenly forsaking her, she had tumbled into his arms weeping and begging and kissing, till he had rushed away in consternation to the bank and drawn five hundred dollars as a starter.

The old man smiled to himself at the thought of it. It did him good to remember how the girl had outdone him. After all, she was his daughter—she ought to be shrewd. She certainly got it from no stranger. However, he deeply deplored what he considered the undeniable evidence of degeneracy in the race when a daughter of his, after all his careful training, had developed, at the tender age of fifteen, a love for books, newspapers and society stronger than that she entertained for dishwashing and the garden-hoe.

Old man Keating was one among the thousands whom the Government Donation Land Law of the 'sixties, which gave to every man of family six hundred and forty acres of the free rich loam of the Willamette Valley—hardly enough to repay the imminent dangers of the journey—had enticed with ox-teams across the plains to Oregon.

John Keating's first business deal had been put through then and there when he laid his plan before a certain young lady. The young lady soon thereafter became Mrs. John Keating. Together they had traveled the long months, driving a few milch-cows before them, to settle in the broad, open prairie, near what afterward became the town of Sheridan.

But that was near half a century ago, when apples were fifteen dollars a box and ginghams could not be had at any price. But wheat—well, John Keating began to raise dollar wheat. With hundreds of others who were first on the ground he made a fortune out of dollar wheat. He bought another section joining his first, and then began to bank his money.

In the course of twenty-five years came a new population, and it was distinctive. An energetic, restless, business people in the East had received a tip, and they came like a flight of hungry locusts, increasing year by year. Cities sprang up everywhere, ships ran into every seaport and steamboats plowed all the rivers.

The new populace gobbled up the remaining land running far out into the fertile foothills; they purchased everything available for mill, factory and town sites; they laid hold of the reins of government, to the very considerable disgust of the first inhabitants.

Then the world's market became surfeited with wheat, prices dropped, and the hard times that will always be known as the crisis of American farm life came to Oregon. There was a shortage of crops in the Argentine Republic, a large firm failed in London, American currency was contracted, confidence became shaken, investments were drawn in, the United States issued bonds to defray government expenses in time of peace instead of levying taxes, and within two years the Willamette Valley farmer was selling wheat at forty cents.

A year later those who were forced to sold at thirty-five cents, and the fall of 1897 found thirty cents the prevailing price of wheat throughout the country.

This is why old man Keating, as he drove down the Willamina road, looking complacently from right to left upon his own flocks and herds grazing in the fields, and his own lands stretching out mile upon mile, corrugated with fences, saw also, here and there, as far as the smoky horizon on either side, occasional red or brown painted granaries, bursting with Oregon legal-tender. The farmers were storing their wheat. Old man Keating himself had one hundred thousand bushels packed in bins. But it was thirty-cent wheat, notwithstanding. And so, as the old gentleman rode on down the dusty roadway in the smoky atmosphere of the October afternoon, with the weight of so much wheat on his mind and an interminable bank account troubling his conscience, he forgot the girl and the young man, and inwardly groaned at the burden of the fearfully hard times.

AND WHERE THEY PASSED THE STUBBLE WAS THICKLY STREWN WITH SACKS OF WHEAT

The young man with the dazed, far-away look in his eyes came to himself with a start, and saw that the sun was tipping well down over the Coast mountains, and that the yard-full of maples cast their shadows eastward half a mile. He felt the wooing breath of the sea-wind upon his cheek, and fiercely pulling himself together, crossed the road toward the house.

As he opened the gate there was a flash of red ribbons among the cedars, a rustling of skirts, and a glint of sunlight upon a crown of gold hair.

"Well, Dick, what is it to be, peace or war?" The girl came up close and peered cautiously into his face. "Oh, I can see by your look it's war."

"You have spared me the pain of telling you," he said sententiously; "your father says 'nix'."

"Oh, I was afraid papa would," she said. "It's just like him for all the world. But he——"

"Yes, he thinks I'm a nice fellow—a bright fellow, but he doesn't want me and my 'diplomys' in the family.

"He's got it in for every man that didn't come to the country with an ox-team. He kicks me out because he calls me progressive; primarily, however, because in an effort to get at something more to my liking I'm filling up my time, though not necessarily my pocket-book, with teaching district school instead of raising wheat."

"Oh, it's too bad," cried the girl. "But you mustn't accuse the whole family. We're not to blame because papa grew up with the country and is crazy on wheat. We're not to blame because there is a school in our district for somebody to teach, either, though I am in part to blame," she admitted shyly, "for securing a boarding-place for the teacher. But don't you worry, Dick. Papa's like the Chinook. He's liable to blow pretty steady in one direction for several days, but he's just as sure to change in the end. He makes a big bluster, but he doesn't run everything hereabout, even though mamma and I do sometimes humor him by letting him think so."

"He thinks I ought to be able to buy Foster's thousand acres on the west before I'm eligible," complained the young man, "and I suppose I should. However, at present it's my wit against his wisdom."

Then there was a clatter of hoofs, a flourish of whip, a flash of wheels, and a man in a buggy pulled up at the gate.

"Howdy," he shouted, waving his hand with a broad sweep. "Folks all well? I thought so. Pa gone t' town? You don't say! Thought I seed tracks comin' out o' th' gate. Fine day, ain't it? But need rain bad fer plowin'. Ghk! ghk! ghk! Giddap, Fan." And he disappeared down the road in a cloud of dust.

"That's Furious Foster," the girl said, laughing.

"Yes," he admitted ironically. "The man I'm to buy out before I'm eligible."

Old man Keating plumed himself upon his shrewd insight. But for all their two years' acquaintance he had not properly sounded the metal of the young man who taught the Keating district school.

Now Richard Morrison was a product of the Middle-West. But in his twenty-first year he had unwittingly assisted history to repeat herself in a small way for the millionth time by joining the throng of vigorous, restless young men who seek illusive Fortune on the North Pacific Coast. Richard was careful, thoughtful, and unusually quick to see an opening. Old man Keating's judgment never fell into greater error than when he called him a mere school-teacher.

That evening after supper Mrs. Keating rocked gently to and fro on the broad front porch, reading in her religious weekly an argument favorable to the Spanish-American War. The family disposed themselves in various attitudes about her.

"Now, ain't that sad!" she exclaimed sympathetically, looking up from the newspaper. "Just listen to this." And she began to read again:

A General Scarcity of Wheat Feared in All European Countries
Women Selling in India at Forty Cents a Head
A Fearful Time is Anticipated

"There's a whole long article about it. And only think, our granaries bursting with thirty-cent wheat and here we are powerless to help!"

"I'll give them every bushel I've got at thirty-five cents," said old man Keating, rousing up from a doze as the magic word wheat tickled him back into semi-consciousness. "That I consider a downright liberal offer. And another thing! If anybody feels disposed to go into the humane society business I'll rent my whole farm to 'im for the next year for five dollars an acre, cash when the grain's sold, or by Christmas—that's all I know," and the old man settled back again into a half-doze, satisfied that he had now performed the extent of his obligations to the heathen.

Miss Keating looked at Richard and smiled. "Catch papa renting those wheat fields," she said. "Why, he'd rather sell ma than that!"

The young man sat silently exhaling long slim funnels of smoke from his cigar. He appeared to be intently watching an infinitesimal speck in the Amity Hills, thirty miles away.

Presently he stood up, groping with his hands about him as if feeling for something more in his mind than within his physical grasp. His gaze wandered to Helen's face.

She was watching him intently from under half-closed lids. But he did not see her. He was still groping.

Presently his glances alighted upon the face of Mrs. Keating, who was still reading with a troubled look.

"Let me see the paper, please," he said.

She passed it to him and he sat down with it, absently reading and not reading, over and over again:

Famine in Russia . . .
Women Selling at Forty Cents in India

Long after that evening he remembered what an indescribable horror that sentence created in his breast.

The paper had lain half an hour at his feet.

Presently he picked it up and mechanically handed it back to Mrs. Keating with thanks. He found his hat, pulled it down hard over his face, and groped out to the gate, across the fields into the interminable stubble, and on into the night.

When he returned to the house it was long after midnight. He lighted a lamp and wrote a letter to a friend in Chicago. Then he extinguished the light, but immediately relighted it and burned the letter. He then sat down and rewrote the letter, addressed, stamped and sealed it, blew out the light and threw himself upon the bed, forgetting to remove his clothes.

The next morning old man Keating spilled a cup of coffee in his lap. It was all on account of a statement made by the school-teacher.

The school-teacher had said: "To-day is Saturday and I'm going down to Sheridan to raise the money necessary to rent your farm for the next year, in accordance with your proposal of last night. I take it you threw out that bait to me, Mr. Keating, to test my temper. I accept your proposition and shall be ready to close with you this evening. I also feel from the bottom of my heart for those poor people starving in India, and I should like an option on your hundred thousand bushels of wheat at the figure named. I may be able to raise a subscription and send it to them."

"Yer a blanked idjit," shouted the old man wildly. "Let the heathen take care of himself. I'll rent you my farm," he added, "if you make me suitable terms; but you can't have my wheat for no thirty-five cents. That was yesterday, and my price has gone up. But I'll tell you what I will do"—the spirit of traffic was rising up strong within him—"I'll call it forty cents and a go—though it's my opinion you're a stark, starin' idjit," he added under his breath.

The young man smiled. His eyebrows narrowed shrewdly. "If you'll split the difference I'll consider it," he said.

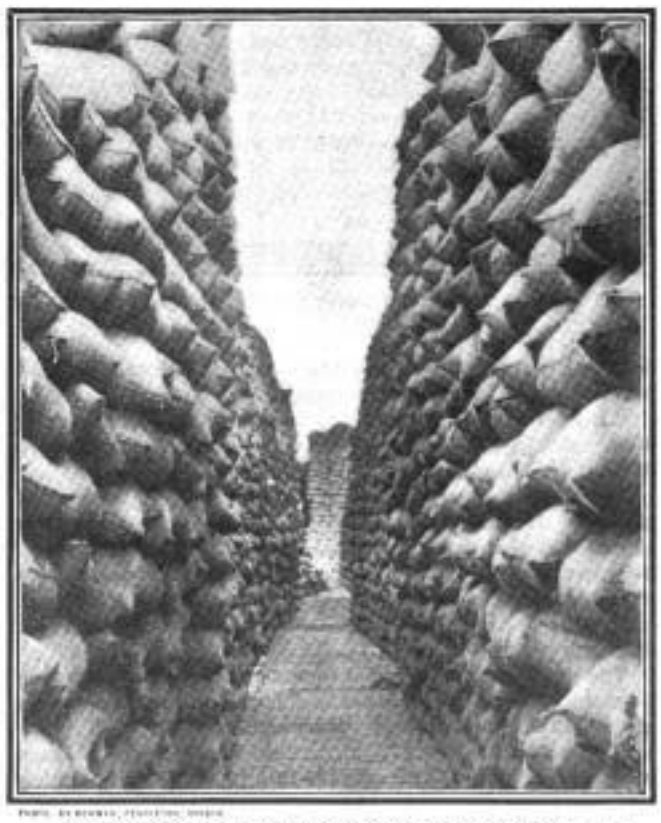
"Not a cent less," shouted the old man, all excitement. "One hundred thousand bushels, no more and no less, and at forty cents—I don't have to sell!"

"Wheat is only thirty cents now, and I won't consider it at forty, but I ask an option at thirty-eight," urged the young man firmly. And the deal was left open.

When Richard returned that night he brought with him a thousand dollars, his own savings, and a promise of credit at the Sheridan Bank on his personal note and a mortgage on the crop, less rentals, for whatever he might require up to ten thousand dollars.

After splitting hairs till near midnight, old man Keating signed the lease for one year and then went out by the well in the moonlight and called himself a "tarnel ol' fool."

On his return to the house Richard went at him diligently, with the money spread out on the table between them, and under this talismanic influence the old man, loosening up in a manner to astonish the entire household, offered him a six-months' option at thirty-eight cents. Then Richard proposed to buy with a thousand-dollar deposit, and one year's time on the balance at five per cent. interest. They finally compromised at thirty-eight cents, and six per cent., signed the contract, and Richard paid over the money.



That night the rain came. Gentle, insinuating at first, a few great drops here and there; then faster and faster on the parched roofs and dust-laden leaves, like the patter of shot, or the rattling roll of a drum calling to action.

For a week the rain continued intermittently, saturating the earth. Then team followed team in long, sober procession into the fields; steam plows puffed noisily out of summer retreats, and the fall breaking began.

Richard Morrison pulled off his coat and went to work. By the conditions of his contract he was to have the use of all stock and farm implements and he had retained the hired men. Arrangements were readily made for a substitute to finish his term of school; and Richard's time was soon fully occupied with the work in hand.

As autumn waned into winter, and the long, level stretches of valley became dim with mist and rain, there was an enforced leisure, and the weight of the responsibility he had undertaken grew upon him until it assumed at times the haunting, ghostly shape of failure. But he was used to thinking much and keeping his own counsel. His temperament was such that, once thoroughly in the race, he was willing to stand for all by his own judgment. "If my business training is ever to stand me in hand, now is the time," he thought fiercely, and went ahead.

Through it all he made just one confidant—Helen. He had disclosed his great scheme to her—had evolved his theory with its different international influences, sitting all one windy winter evening by the kitchen fire with the slant rain coming against the windows, and the Chinook singing through the tree-tops like lost dryads, and she, in full sympathy with his plans—since they two had conspired to make common cause against the designs of an arrogant old man—had clapped her hands in delighted admiration, but had been frightened at his daring. However, with all her secret apprehensions she was too tactful a little woman ever to dream of discouraging him with a word about failure. Instead, there were small schemes and conspiracies innumerable — long buggy rides to night entertainments at Lafayette and Newberg, with return trips the next day, to help fill in the lapse of time. Then Susie Terrill, Charles Fairbury and other college friends came up to the farm for a week at a stretch, when the big, old house would ring from moss-grown roof to basement with shouts and music, with the clatter and lisp of feet and the banging of doors, till Mrs. Keating would stop in the middle of the floor and hold up both her hands in feigned dismay. All these days the rain pounded intermittently against the outside of the windows.

Spring came with its west winds, its bud of promise, and found the young farmer in shirt and denim overalls, making plank fence and watching the market.

He had subscribed for the Daily Oregonian, an act which curled old man Keating's lip in scorn, for old man Keating persistently refused to read a newspaper, considering the practice an evidence of weakness. But the markets were in the Oregonian, and a great deal of news about famines abroad and the menace of pending war at home.

That spring of '98 was in many respects the hardest one known in the latter history of the valley. Orchards were laden with bloom; the sun kissed health into the hop vines; the earth was a veritable carpet of waving, tossing wheat; but prices were hopelessly out at the bottom. Hop buyers came through the country contracting for the season's yield at six cents, and they did business. Portland shippers looked blue over the prospect of tons of green fruit that had already begun to split the trees all over the valley. And wheat lay dead at thirty cents. It had not moved for months.

There was just one big wave that threw up a spray along the Oregon coast that spring. When Richard read in the papers, with great scareheads and illustrations, about the blowing up of the Maine in Havana Harbor and the imminence of war, he rushed at Helen, who was beating a cake in the kitchen, and gave her such an embrace as startled her out of returning him the customary cuff on the ear.

"What did you do that for, Mister?" she demanded threateningly.

"Why!" he shouted, "the Spaniards have blown up the Maine at Havana; we're sure to have war!"

"You heartless beast!" declared the girl. "I suppose you're going to enlist at once. In fact, I hope you do."

"No, I'm not; but don't you see?"

"No, I don't see."

"No? Oh, of course not. You're only a woman." And he grabbed his hat, and made out of the house and up on to the hill where there was more air and room.

Then the current of affairs ran desperately low again in the valley. The sorrows of a famine abroad were eclipsed by the prospect of war at home. But Oregon was so far removed from the seat of activity at Washington that her farmers felt only an indifferent concern. Moreover, their chief interest was centred around the price of wheat and prunes, and these gave forth no sign. So the "ranchers" drove listlessly up and down the valley, stopped and talked long to each other, leaning upon the fences, anxious to realize upon their crops, but obstinately waiting for the world's market to move first.

They were gloomy days for Richard Morrison. When he thought of the hundred thousand bushels of wheat that lay dead, eight cents below the purchase price, and the intolerably heavy expenses of the crop that were upon his shoulders, he was almost distraught.

And then he saw, perhaps for the first time in his life, the true mission of woman, and had the first sweet taste of a love that stands by a man in trouble.

"Don't worry, Dick, dear; I know it will all come out right." That was all she could give him just then — that and her looks. But what, truly, could have been more eloquently convincing?

He was encouraged for nearly a week. He read everything pertaining to the famine in Europe and the plenty in America. He hung with almost breathless suspense upon the actions of Congress, and chafed fearfully under the President's delay. Then he began to doubt the wisdom of his great enterprise, and even questioned his own sense.

Finally, in despair, he dashed off a telegram.

He awaited an answer just three days. Then a messenger came pounding up the Sheridan road, bringing a cloud of dust with him — and a telegram. Richard broke the seal and read, under a Chicago date line:

> RICHARD MORRISON, Sheridan, Oregon:
> Wheat on the jump. Buy quick. Hold for advance. J. C. K.

It was evening. She was coming down the path toward him, he knew she was. He could see her, and the roses at her throat with the spray of dogwood bloom. Her face was looking at him as in a dream. The glint of sunlight was on her gold hair.

"Helen," he said, holding out the bit of paper. Something in his throat was choking him.

She took the telegram, read, and dropped it upon the grass.

"My own Richard," she said, and put her two hands caressingly upon his face, but tears were in her eyes as she spoke. "My Richard is always right. I knew it would all come true."

That day Congress had declared war against Spain.

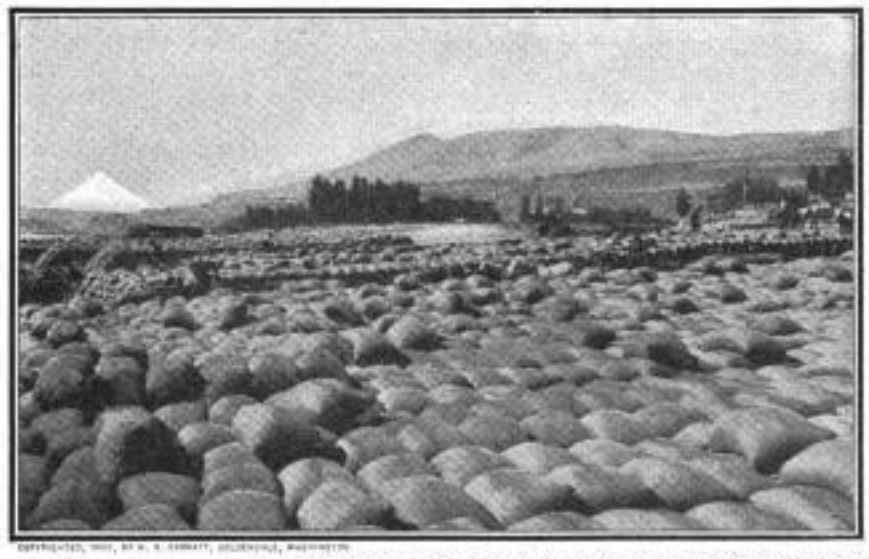
All over the valley the green billows were changing to brown. A new life was in the country. Farmers drove a little faster — excepting Furious Foster, who couldn't possibly — talked a little brisker and not so long. The buzz and boom of traffic were everywhere; everywhere men were doubly occupied in putting in canvas drapers, and tightening nuts on headers and harvesters.

Old man Keating generously assisted Richard and the hired men with their work. The drivers swung out their long whips over the twenty-four-horse teams and drove the harvesters into the field. The sun came down hot upon the horses' backs and there was a continual swish, swash of wheat and the thud of heavy bags of grain from morning till late at night. One after another they went along the solid banks of standing grain, and where they passed the stubble was thickly strewn with sacks of wheat. Men with teams followed after, gathering up the yield and transporting it to the railroad for shipment. And they could not be too diligent to suit present needs; for every day saw prices advanced.

Through it all Richard kept a watchful eye on business. The newspapers assisted him to keep his finger continually upon the world's pulse. Telegrams came every day from Chicago, and his own special messenger brought them to him on swift hoof.

Before the first day of the threshing every available team had been detailed to haul the stored grain to the warehouses, and bank it, against pending emergencies. At the end of the tenth day the harvesters took up the line of march out of the field, and Richard knew that his thousand acres had yielded him just forty thousand bushels of yellow wheat.

He now set about with feverish interest to watch the market. A dizzy success had already evolved out of his first crude plan; but there was yet a possibility of losing all. "Here's where my strategy must avail," he said to himself, and went to laying plans.



And he made a fair beginning. That same evening as he stood by the front gate he saw a cloud of dust and knew that Furious Foster was coming up the road.

Foster saluted with a broad, circumspect sweep of his arm. His horse was trotting low, under whip. Evidently he had not intended to tarry.

"Hold on there," shouted Richard, in despair of bringing him to a halt. "I want to know what you will take for that farm of yours. Heard it was for sale."

"Fifty thousand dollars," yelled Furious Foster back at him, cracking his whip. "Late fer supper. Can't stop. Wheat's still a-rizzin'" — and he was gone.

Richard had entered into negotiations with the warehouse dealers. His grain was all delivered and he stood ready to close the deal at a moment's notice. As for the warehouses, they had long since refused to contain the grain that had been thrust at them. They were already bursting with fullness, and upon the river-bank appeared acres of sacks, piled into huge pyramids.

UPON THE RIVER-BANK APPEARED ACRES OF SACKS

The price had already gone to ninety-five cents. But when so many thousand bushels are at stake the careful farmer can do no better than to consider the fractions.

Richard's faith in his friend on the inside of the Chicago market was unbounded. At the last he felt, somehow, that the work must be quick. So he stayed in Sheridan day and night, stopping at the hotel, with an eye on the telegraph office.

Wheat had now gone to ninety-nine cents. Men were selling all about him, and Richard's ears were besieged with free advice from "ranchers" who knew wheat better than they did their own wives. But Richard trusted to his understanding of the situation, and, though the suspense was great, still he waited.

Then suddenly one morning the market jumped to one dollar and five, and everybody gasped.

The young man almost staggered that morning as he got into the railway station; and his eyes fed hungrily upon the little electric instruments that seemed so busy talking around the world.

That afternoon it came, ticking over the wires in the smoky little box of an office.

The operator mechanically reached over the counter and handed him the paper with a knowing smile.

"I guess you're 'it,'" he said.

Richard caught the precious scrap out of the man's hands, and his eyes fairly burned into it as he read:

> RICHARD MORRISON, Sheridan:
> Market full; sell quick. J. C. K.

Three minutes later he was at the desk of the elevator company and within thirty minutes he was stuffing the drafts for the full amount of wheat into his pocket.

The next day the market was steady at ninety-eight cents.

That evening as the family sat on the front porch enjoying the luxury of midsummer-time, old man Keating was interrupted, in a careful perusal of the market reports in the daily paper — he had lately acquired some degree of the daily paper habit — by the young man who used to be a school-teacher.

"Mr. Keating," he remarked, after a reflective silence, "what price do you place upon your farm?"

Old man Keating peered cautiously at the speaker over the rim of his paper, pretending not to see him, before he finally answered. He had long since learned to expect the usually unexpected from this young man.

Then he put down the paper. "Land and improvements," he said — "though I'm not anxious to sell — I've always held at sixty thousand dollars, cash. Why, have you a buyer?"

"That price will be satisfactory to me, sir," replied Richard promptly, emphasizing the pronoun. "My only condition will be that you put in the girl." There was a twinkle in his eye, but the old man did not see it.

The girl blushed beautifully.

Old man Keating squared around at his adversary with a fierce look. "Yes, I guess yer at yer same old tricks ag'in, ain't yuh, young man?" he urged severely.

"No, sir," replied Richard; "it's a plain business proposition: a question of girls, farms and wheat. If I have to buy the farm to get the girl, why, I guess I can do it. I'm in dead earnest."

The old man's face assumed a comical look of defeat. "Well, I s'pose you'd better take the girl," he said at last. "I don't care so much about that; she seems to rather like you. But you can't have the farm," he added emphatically. "Nobody can't beat me out of a roof to die under in my old age — not when I've got all my faculties."

"Do you think you've got 'em all, Pa?" inquired the girl mischievously.

But old man Keating paid no attention to her. Though temporarily defeated, he still had his sign out for business. He scratched his head as if an entirely new thought were just taking root inside of it, though, in fact, what he had in mind had been there for months, ever since the crops began to head, and Furious Foster had come by and said that wheat had "riz."

"Let me see," he said; "there's neighbor Foster's thousand acres that jines me on the west. His boy has got a big claim up in Klondike and he wants the old man to come up and help develop it. So Foster told me the other day if any one come nosin' 'round he might sell. Said he'd take fifty thousand dollars at a pinch. Why don't ye buy that? We might work the two together."

When Dick and Helen were married at Christmas a throng of college young folk were present and the house was full of people.

The next day they all drove to Sheridan in carriages to see them take the train for a little trip to the East, which was one of the diverse conspiracies hatched the past winter while wheat was thirty cents, and only now to be realized.

The laughing young people threw old shoes and slippers after them, and old man Foster pulled off his boot and threw it — and he could well afford to, even at the imminent risk of never getting it back again, for hadn't he just sold his farm to them and got the money?

But that other accompaniment of a wedding journey, that other harbinger of good luck, which they threw all over the happy couple, all over the seats and even in at the windows after the train had started, was not rice at all; it was wheat.

A PECULIAR PEOPLE

By Rebecca Harding Davis

WHEN I was young, although I lived in a slave State, chance threw me from time to time in the way of some of the leading Abolitionists, the men and women who then were busied in sowing the seeds whose deadly outgrowth was the Civil War.

To make you understand them we need not discuss the great issue which tore the country asunder. But I must remind you that they were for years a small band, a Peculiar People. The great majority of Northerners, a large minority of Southerners, including many slave owners, recognized slavery as an evil and hoped to free the country from it by gradual and legal methods. But these Radicals would not temporize nor wait. "Abolish the evil now; cut out the cancer now, at any cost," they cried.

It would be impossible for the young people of today to understand the fury of zeal which fired this little band, or the hate and horror with which they were regarded in the South. We have grown more tolerant nowadays, both as to beliefs and individuals, and, it may be, more indifferent to great issues. We suffer any man now openly to exploit his opinions; whether he preach anarchy or monarchy, heathen gods or no God, his worst punishment is a shrug of contempt.

But in the fifties the Abolitionist crossed Mason and Dixon's line at the peril of his life. His errand was supposed to be either abduction or murder.

Now, however, the grandchildren of these hot-blooded, warring folk in both South and North are curious to know what the men were like on either side who fought the war.

It is a natural curiosity. Even the heroes of the old Greek legend whose hate was so strong that their souls went on fighting for four days after their bodies were dead, must surely, after a few years of leisurely rest in Hades, have felt a curiosity as to what kind of men their enemies really were, and have suspected that they might have been good fellows, after all.

Some such late rueful doubt is stirring now in the hearts of the old foes, and warming them to a wholesome, friendly heat.

The Little Touch that Made the Whole Sect "Queer"

I have been asked to sketch such of the early Abolitionists as I knew. It must be in silhouette only. The inattentive eyes of a young girl could not discern depths of character or heights of motive.

I certainly never found the mark of Cain on their foreheads which their fire-eating neighbors declared was there; nor did I see the "aureoled brows of warrior saints," which Lowell and Whittier sang. They were men and women, all alike fired with one idea — the freedom of the slave. They preached it, they prayed for it, in season and out of season. They would not eat sugar nor wear cotton. Some of them gave up God Himself because He had tolerated slavery. They were generally regarded as madmen running about with a blazing torch to destroy their neighbors' homes. But their frenzy was usually recognized as an unselfish madness. They certainly gained nothing by carrying the torch. No man was ever more relentlessly denounced or ostracized than the Abolitionist, even in the North.

To make a truthful picture of them I must confess that apart from this common uplifting motive there was in every man and woman of the little sect a touch of eccentricity, no matter what their station or breeding. They were always, in popular opinion, "queer." It was the old story of Doctor Johnson's twenty cups of tea, of Shelley's paper boats, or Jean Paul's soiled jacket. The man who rebels against an established rule, from Abraham to Paderewski, wears his hair down his back. The man who makes war upon the world's great ordinances almost always picks a quarrel with its harmless little habits, even decencies. When the Florentine noble dared want and death to bring the sacred fire from the Holy Sepulchre to the altar of his little church at home, he preached an immortal lesson to the world. But why need he have ridden with his face to the horse's tail, so that the common people called him "Pazzi"— fool?

Why, because these good folk wanted to free the slave, should they refuse to cut their beards, or to eat meat, or have run after new kinds of fantastic medicines or cookery or religions? But so it is. Your chivalric reformer, your holy saint, almost invariably fights obstinately about some absurd trifle, which makes the purblind public call him Pazzi. You may safely take his thoughts as bread for your soul, but generally you will find him a nuisance at dinner or on a journey.

I remember, too, that when you were with the Abolitionists you were apt to be kindled at first by their great purpose, but after a while you were a little bored by it. They saw nothing else. Like Saint George, they thought that one dragon filled the whole world.

Their narrow fury angered you. "Is the Devil dead?" you said. "What of his old works? What of drunkenness and hate and lies? Let us talk of these, too." But they ignored them all.

However, I suppose that the party or sect which is to do any work in the world must breathe its own peculiar atmosphere, speak its own little patois, and see but one side of the question on which it fights.

My family lived on the border of Virginia. We were, so to speak, on the fence, and could see the great question from both sides. It was a most unpleasant position. When you crossed into Pennsylvania you had to defend your slave-holding friends against the Abolitionists who dubbed them all Legrees and Neros; and when you came home you quarreled with your kindly neighbors for calling the Abolitionists "emissaries of hell." The man who sees both sides of the shield may be right, but he is most uncomfortable.

One of the familiar figures to my childish eyes during these yearly visits to Pennsylvania was F. Julius Le Moyne, the candidate for Vice-President in 1840 on the Abolition ticket with Birney. The two men offered themselves to certain defeat in order to test the strength of their party. They polled only a few thousand votes.

Twenty years afterward William Lloyd Garrison said to my husband, "A handful of us used to meet year after year and nominate a ticket for the Presidency. The whole country jeered at us. But we knew we should elect our man at last. We would finish our work. We have elected him. The work is done."

Le Moyne, the Most Radical of Reformers

Francis Le Moyne was a physician in Washington, Pennsylvania, then a sleepy village. He was as unlike the townspeople (most of them my own kinsfolk) as if Neptune or Mars had put on trousers and coat and gone about the streets. They were Scotch-Irish, usually sandy in complexion, conventional, orthodox, holding to every opinion or custom of their forefathers with an iron grip. He made his own creed and customs; he was dark, insurrectionary, and French. He was descended, I have been told, from an émigré family — Breton comtes. Some of the hunted folk of the ancien régime settled on the Ohio at Gallipolis and tried fruit raising there. The father of the reformer made his way up to this quiet hill town. He was a kind of fairy godfather to the village children, because he spoke another tongue than English and lived in a foreign-looking house in the midst of a great garden of plants and flowers unknown elsewhere. In his office, too, he was always surrounded by uncanny retorts and crucibles; and many birds flew about him that he had taught by some secret method to sing French airs.

His son was a large, swarthy man, with much force of personal magnetism. He had, as I remember, a singular, compelling, intolerant eye, which once seen you never forgot; the eye of a man who, having chosen a cause to serve, would give it the last drop of his own blood and force other men to give theirs. The cause he served was that of human freedom. He drew many of his townspeople into the Abolition party. But I think that they never quite understood or appreciated him. He was always alien to them. He should have lived in a court, or a metropolis, some great arena in which to work. He had the power for any work. Doctor Le Moyne was probably the truest representative of the radical Abolitionist in this country. He never gave in his adherence to any temporizing or experiment of expediency, whether made by Frémont, Sumner or Lincoln. "Cut out the cancer, and cut it now, though the patient die," was his creed. After the slaves were freed he gave both his influence and money to the work of their education.

Then he took up another reform — Cremation. The rotting bodies under ground fretted him as much as the slaves living on it had done. He urged the matter vehemently on the American people and built the first crematory on this continent. Baron Palm, who, with Madame Blavatsky and Colonel Olcott, was the original teacher in this country of Theosophy, was, I think, the first person to be cremated in it. Doctor Le Moyne once showed me some of his ashes. It was characteristic of the doctor that he kept them in a little begilt candy box; he never threw lime-light on his great effects.

The Melancholy Jaques of Wheeling Wood

In the early days the leading Abolitionists were sometimes his guests. I remember one, a tall, unsmiling young girl with black hair and eyes, who provoked my childish antipathy by eating an apple as if she and it were playing a part in a great tragedy. This was Sara Clarke, then known to the country as the Liberty Poetess. After the war was over she dropped the tragic lyre and became a popular story-writer under the name of Grace Greenwood. Dickens hailed her as one of the foremost of American writers. I knew her many years afterward in Philadelphia. She was one of those born helpers who always are tottering under the load of some unable individual or race. I do not know whether she is carrying these helpless folk now in this world or in another. But wherever she is, I am sure that is her work, God bless her.

Her elder brother, Joseph Clarke, came to Wheeling — the town where we lived — shortly before the war, to edit a newspaper. He, too, had been born in the dark of the moon, and saw the world only as a huge stage for tragedy. He was suspected of Abolition principles, but of necessity kept them out of sight. But his gloomy brain seethed with other revolutionary ideas. He tramped over the neighboring hills composing poetry until the bones of his easy-going neighbors ached; he urged them to build a cholera hospital on the main street, and to prove that the disease was not contagious slept all night in a bed from which a man who had died of it had just been carried. He was a believer in the knockings and teachings of the Fox sisters. The staid old town held him at arm's length, but to two or three young people in it these ideas, imported from the outer unknown world, were fearful but alluring, like the glimpses one has of the moon through a telescope.

I remember this melancholy Jaques even now with a grateful throb at heart, for he was the first editor who urged me to write for him. He put a pen in my hands and bade me "treat of Italian Art." Now the only Italian I ever had known was the barber at the corner, and my knowledge of art was confined to our photographer's gallery. But I wrote an essay on the art of Angelica Kauffmann and he printed it (anonymously) on the front page of the paper. He told me that it was fine, and I quite agreed with him.

Abolitionism never was a burning question in that part of Virginia. Nothing lay between any slave there and freedom but the Ohio River, which could be crossed in a skiff in half an hour. The green hills of Ohio on the other side, too, were

—A WEAZENED, STUNTED BOY, IN A UNIFORM

CHAPTER XVI

SO THE month of May drew to its close. Between the twenty-fifth and the thirtieth Jadwin covered his July shortage, despite Gretry's protests and warnings. To him they seemed idle enough. He was too rich, too strong now, to fear any issue. Daily the profits of the corner increased. The unfortunate shorts were wrung dry and drier. In Gretry's office they heard their sentences, and as Jadwin beheld more and more of these broken speculators, a vast contempt for human nature grew within him.

Some few of his beaten enemies were resolute enough, accepting defeat with grim carelessness, or with sphinx-like indifference, or even with airy jocularity. But for the most part their alert, eager deference, their tame subservience, the abject humility and debasement of their bent shoulders drove Jadwin to the verge of self-control. He grew to detest the business; he regretted even the defiant brutality of Scannel, a rascal, but none the less keeping his head high. The more the fellows cringed to him, the tighter he wrenched the screw. In a few cases he found a pleasure in relenting entirely, selling his wheat to the unfortunates at a price that left them without loss; but in the end the business hardened his heart to any distress his mercilessness might entail. He took his profits as a Bourbon took his taxes, as if by right of birth.

His wife he saw but seldom. Occasionally they breakfasted together; more often they met at dinner. But that was all. Jadwin's life by now had come to be so irregular, and his few hours of sleep so precious and so easily disturbed, that he had long since occupied a separate apartment.

What Laura's life was at this time he no longer knew. She never spoke of it to him; never nowadays complained of loneliness. When he saw her she appeared to be cheerful. But this very cheerfulness made him uneasy, and at times, through the murk of the chaff of wheat, through the bellow of the Pit, and the crash of collapsing fortunes there reached him a suspicion that all was not well with Laura.

Once he had made an abortive attempt to break from the turmoil of La Salle Street and the Board of Trade, and, for a time at least, to get back to the old life they both had loved —to get back, in a word, to her. But the consequences had been all but disastrous. Now he could not keep away.

"Corner wheat!" he had exclaimed to her the following day. "Corner wheat! It's the wheat that has cornered me. It's like holding a wolf by the ears—bad to hold on, but worse to let go."

But absorbed, blinded, deafened by the whirl of things, Curtis Jadwin could not see how perilously well grounded had been his faint suspicion as to Laura's distress.

On the day after her evening with her husband in the art gallery, the evening when Gretry had broken in upon them like a courier from the front, Laura had risen from her bed to look out upon a world suddenly empty.

Corthell she had sent from her forever. Jadwin was once more snatched from her side. Where, now, was she to turn? Jadwin had urged her to go to Geneva Lake for the season, but she refused. She saw the change that had of late come over her husband, saw his lean face, the hot, tired eyes, the trembling fingers and nervous gestures. Vaguely she imagined approaching disaster. If anything happened to Curtis, her place was at his side.

During the days that Jadwin and Crookes were at grapples Laura found means to occupy her mind with all manner of small activities. She overhauled her wardrobe, planned her summer gowns, paid daily visits to her dressmakers, rode and drove in the Park till every turn of the roads, every tree, every bush was familiar to the point of wearisome contempt.

Then suddenly she began to indulge in a mania for old books and first editions. She haunted the stationers and second-hand bookstores, studied the authorities, followed the auctions, and bought right and left with reckless extravagance. But the taste soon palled upon her. With so much money at her command there was none of the spice of the hunt in the affair. She had but to express a desire for a certain treasure, and forthwith it was put into her hand.

She found it so in all other things. Her desires were gratified with an abruptness that killed the zest of them. She felt none of the joy of possession; the little personal relation between her and her belongings vanished away. Her gowns, beautiful beyond all she had ever imagined, were of no more interest to her than a drawerful of worn-out gloves. She bought horses till she could no longer tell them apart; her carriages crowded three supplementary stables in the neighborhood. Her flowers, miracles of laborious cultivation, filled the whole house with their fragrance. Wherever she went deference moved before her like a guard; her beauty, her enormous wealth, her wonderful horses, her exquisite gowns made of her a cynosure, a veritable queen.

And hardly a day passed that Laura Jadwin, in the solitude of her own boudoir, did not fling her arms wide in a gesture of lassitude and infinite weariness, crying out:

"Oh, the ennui and stupidity of all this wretched life!"

She could look forward to nothing. One day was like the next. No one came to see her. For all her great house and for all her money, she had made but few friends. Her "grand manner" had never helped her popularity. She passed her evenings alone in her "upstairs sitting-room," reading, reading till far into the night; or, the lights extinguished, sat at her open window listening to the monotonous lap and wash of the Lake.

At such moments she thought of the men who had come into her life—of the love she had known almost from her first girlhood. She remembered her first serious affair. It had been with the impecunious theological student who was her tutor. He had worn glasses and little black side whiskers, and had implored her to marry him and come to China, where he was to be a missionary. Every time that he came he had brought her a new book to read, and he had taken her for long walks up toward the hills where the old powder mill stood. Then it was the young lawyer—the "brightest man in Worcester County"—who took her driving in a hired buggy, sent her a multitude of paper novels (which she never read), with every love passage carefully underscored, and wrote very bad verse to her eyes and hair, whose "velvet blackness was the shadow of a crown." Or, again, it was the youthful cavalry officer met in a flying visit to her Boston aunt, who loved her on first sight, gave her his photograph in uniform and a bead belt of Apache workmanship. He was forever singing to her—to a guitar accompaniment—an old love song:

> "At midnight hour
> Beneath the tower
> He murmured soft,
> 'Oh, nothing fearing,
> With thine own true soldier fly.'"

Then she had come to Chicago, and Landry Court, with his bright enthusiasms and fine exaltations, had loved her. She had never taken him very seriously, but none the less it had been very sweet to know his whole universe depended upon the nod of her head, and that her influence over him had been so potent, had kept him clean and loyal and honest.

And after this Corthell and Jadwin had come into her life, the artist and the man of affairs. She remembered Corthell's quiet, patient, earnest devotion of those days before her marriage. He rarely spoke to her of his love, but by some ingenious subtlety he had filled her whole life with it. His little attentions, his undemonstrative solicitudes came precisely when and where they were most appropriate. He had never failed her. Whenever she had needed him, or even when through caprice or impulse she had turned to him, it always had been to find that long since he had carefully prepared for that very contingency. His thoughtfulness of her had been a thing to wonder at. He remembered for months, years even, her most trivial fancies, her unexpressed dislikes. He knew her tastes as if by instinct; he prepared little surprises for her, and placed them in her way without ostentation, and quite as matters of course. He never permitted her to be embarrassed; the little annoying situations of the day's life he had smoothed away long before they had ensnared her. He never was off his guard, never disturbed, never excited.

And he amused her, he entertained her without seeming to do so. He made her talk; he made her think. He stimulated and aroused her, so that she herself talked with a brilliancy that surprised herself. In fine, he had so contrived that she associated him with everything that was agreeable.

She had sent him away the first time, and he had gone without a murmur, only to come back loyal as ever, silent, watchful, sympathetic, his love for her deeper, stronger than before, and—as always timely—bringing to her companionship at the moment of all others when she was most alone.

Now she had driven him from her again, and this time, she very well knew, it was to be forever. She had shut the door upon this great love.

"STOP!" SHE CRIED, SPRINGING UP

Laura stirred abruptly in her place, adjusting her hair with nervous fingers.

And, last of all, it had been Jadwin, her husband. She rose and went to the window, and stood there a long moment, looking off into the night over the Park. It was warm and very still.

Suddenly she started from the window. She called a servant and asked:

"Has Mr. Jadwin come in yet?"

"Mr. Gretry just this minute telephoned that Mr. Jadwin would not be home to-night."

When the servant had gone out Laura, her lips compressed, flung up her head. Her hands shut to hard fists, her eye flashed. Rigid, erect in the middle of the floor, her arms folded, she uttered a smothered exclamation over and over again under her breath.

All at once anger mastered her—anger and a certain defiant recklessness, an abrupt spirit of revolt. She straightened herself suddenly, as one who takes a decision. Then, swiftly, she went out of the art gallery, and, crossing the hallway, entered the library and opened a great writing-desk that stood in a recess under a small stained window.

She pulled the sheets of notepaper toward her, wrote a short letter, directing the envelope to Sheldon Corthell, The Fine Arts Building, Michigan Avenue.

"Call a messenger," she said to the servant who answered her ring, "and send him in here when he comes."

She rested the letter against the inkstand and leaned back in her chair, looking at it, her fingers plucking swiftly at the lace of her dress. Her head was in a whirl. A confusion of thoughts, impulses, desires, half-formed resolves, half-named regrets, swarmed and spun about her. She felt as though she had all at once taken a leap—a leap which had landed her in a new and terrible country, an unfamiliar place—terrible, yet beautiful—unexplored, and for that reason all the more inviting, a place of shadows, out of which pleasant voices called and strange hands beckoned.

Laura rose and paced the floor, her hands pressed together over her heart. She was excited, her cheeks flushed, a certain breathless exhilaration came and went within her breast, and in place of the intolerable ennui of her last days there came over her a sudden, an almost wild, animation, and from out her black eyes there shot a kind of furious gayety.

She was aroused by a step at the door. The messenger stood there, a figure ridiculously inadequate for the intensity of all that was involved in the issue of the hour—a weazened, stunted boy, in a uniform many sizes too large.

Laura, seated at her desk, held the note toward him resolutely. Now was no time to hesitate, to temporize. If she did not hold to her resolve now, what was there to look forward to? Could one's life be emptier than hers of this last month—emptier, more intolerable, more humiliating?

"Take this note to that address," she said, putting a coin in the boy's hand. "Wait for an answer."

The boy shut the letter in his book, which he thrust into his breast pocket, buttoning his coat over it. He nodded and turned away.

Still seated, Laura watched him moving toward the door. Well, it was over now. She had chosen. She had taken the leap. What new life was to begin for her to-morrow, that very evening? What did it all mean? With an inconceivable rapidity her thoughts began racing through her brain.

She did not move where she sat. Her hands, gripped tight together, rested upon the desk before her. Without turning her head she watched the retreating messenger from under her lashes. He passed out of the door, the curtain fell behind him.

And only then, when the irrevocableness of the step was all but an accomplished fact, came the reaction.

"Stop!" she cried, springing up. "Stop! Come back here. Wait a moment."

What had happened? She could neither understand nor explain. Somehow an instant of clear vision had come, and in that instant a power within her that was herself and not herself, had laid hold upon her will. No, no, she could not, she could not, after all. She took the note back.

"I have changed my mind," she said abruptly. "You may keep the money. There is no message to be sent."

She tore the note into fragments, and making a heap of them in the pen-tray burned them carefully.

During the week following upon this Laura found her trouble more than ever keen. She was burdened with a new distress. The incident of the note to Corthell, recalled at the last moment, had opened her eyes to possibilities of the situation hitherto unguessed. She saw now what she might be capable of doing in a moment of headstrong caprice, she saw depths in her nature she had not plumbed. Whether these hidden pitfalls were peculiarly hers, or whether they were common to all women placed as she now found herself, she did not pause to inquire. She thought only of results, and she was afraid.

For what she was now about to do she could give no reason, and the motives for this final and supreme effort to conquer the league of circumstances which hemmed her in were obscure. She did not even ask what they were. She knew only that she was in trouble, and yet it was to the cause of her distress that she addressed herself. Blindly she turned to her husband; and all the woman in her roused itself, girded itself, called up its every resource in one last test, in one ultimate trial of strength between her and the terrible growing power of that blind, soulless force that roared and guttered and sucked down, there in the midst of the city.

She alone, one unaided woman, her only auxiliaries her beauty, her wit, and the frayed, strained bands of a sorely tried love, stood forth like a challenger against Charybdis, joined battle with the Cloaca, held back with her slim hands against the power of the maëlstrom that swung whole nations in its grip.

In the solitude of her room she took the resolve. Her troubles were multiplying; she, too, was in the current, the end of which was a pit—a pit black and without bottom. Once already its grip had seized her, once already she had yielded to the insidious drift. Now suddenly aware of a danger, she fought back and, her hands beating the air for help, turned toward the greatest strength she knew.

"I want my husband," she cried, aloud, to the empty darkness of the night. "I want my husband. I will have him; he is mine, he is mine. There shall nothing take me from him; there shall nothing take him from me."

Her first opportunity came upon a Sunday soon afterward. Jadwin, wakeful all the Saturday night, slept a little in the forenoon, and after dinner Laura came to him in his smoking-room, as he lay on the leather lounge trying to read. His wife seated herself at a writing-table in a corner of the room, and by and by began turning the slips of a calendar that stood at her elbow. At last she tore off one of the slips and held it up.

"Curtis."

"Well, old girl?"

"Do you see that date?"

He looked over to her.

"Do you see that date? Do you know of anything that makes that day different—a little—from other days? It's June 13. Do you remember what June 13 is?"

Puzzled, he shook his head.

"No—no."

Laura took up a pen and wrote a few words in the space above the figures reserved for memoranda. Then she handed the slip to her husband, who read aloud what she had written.

"'Laura Jadwin's birthday.' Why, upon my word," he declared, sitting upright. "So it is, so it is. June 13, of course. And I was beast enough not to realize it. Honey, I can't remember anything these days, it seems."

"But you are going to remember this time, aren't you?" she urged. "You are not going to forget it now. That evening is going to mark the beginning of—oh, Curtis, it is going to be a new beginning of everything. You'll see. I'm going to manage it. I don't know how, but you are going to love me so that nothing—no business, no money, no wheat will ever keep you from me. I will make you. And that evening, that evening of June 13 is mine. The day your business can have you, but from six o'clock on you are mine." She crossed the room quickly and took both his hands in hers and knelt beside him. "It is mine," she said, "if you love me. Do you understand, dear? You will come home at six o'clock, and whatever happens—oh, if all La Salle Street should burn to the ground, and all your million bushels of wheat with it—whatever happens, you—will—not—leave—me, nor think of anything else but just me, me. That evening is mine, and you will give it to me, just as I have said. I won't remind you of it again. I won't speak of it again. I will leave it to you. But—you will give me that evening if you love me. Dear, do you see just what I mean? . . . If you love me. . . . Now—no, don't say a word, we won't talk about it at all. No, no, please. Not another word. I don't want you to promise, or pledge yourself, or anything like that. You've heard what I said—and that's all there is about it. We'll talk of something else. By the way, have you seen Mr. Cressler lately?"

"No, no," he said, falling into her mood; "I haven't seen Charlie in over a month. Wonder what's become of him?"

"I understand he's been sick," she told him. "I met Mrs. Cressler the other day, and she said she was bothered about him."

"Well, what's the matter with old Charlie?"

"She don't know herself. He's not sick enough to go to bed, but he don't or won't go downtown to his business. She says she can see him growing thinner every day. He keeps telling her he's all right, but for all that, she says, she's afraid he's going to come down with some kind of sickness pretty soon. I can see she is worried about him."

"IT IS MINE," SHE SAID, "IF YOU LOVE ME"

"Say," said Jadwin, "suppose we drop around to see them this afternoon? Wouldn't you like to? I haven't seen him in over a month, as I say. Or telephone them to come up and have dinner. Charlie's about as old a friend as I have. We used to be together about every hour of the day when we first came to Chicago. Let's go over to see him this afternoon and cheer him up."

"No," said Laura decisively. "Curtis, you must have one day of rest out of the week. You are going to lie down all the rest of the afternoon, and sleep if you can. I'll call on them to-morrow."

"Well, all right," he assented. "I suppose I ought to sleep if I can. And then Sam is coming up here by five. He's going to bring some railroad men with him. We've got a lot to do. Yes, I guess, old girl, I'll try to get forty winks before they get here. And, Laura," he added, taking her hand as she rose to go—"Laura, this is the last lap. In just another month now—oh, at the outside six weeks—I'll have closed the corner, and then, old girl, you and I will go somewheres, anywhere you like, and then we'll have a good time together all the rest of our lives—all the rest of our lives, honey. Good-by. Now I think I can go to sleep."

She arranged the cushions under his head and drew the curtains close over the windows, and went out, softly closing the door behind her. And a half-hour later, when she stole in to look at him, she found him asleep at last, his tired eyes closed, and the arm, with its broad, strong hand, resting under his head. She stood a long moment in the middle of the room, looking down at him; and then slipped out as noiselessly as she had come, the tears trembling on her eyelashes.

Laura Jadwin did not call on the Cresslers the next day, nor even the next after that. For three days she kept indoors, held prisoner by a series of petty incidents: now the crippling of one of her carriage horses, now the delay in the finishing of her new gowns, now by the excessive heat, now by a threat of rain. By Thursday, however, at the beginning of the second week of the month, the storm was gone and the sun once more shone. Early in the afternoon Laura telephoned to Mrs. Cressler.

"How are you and Mr. Cressler?" she asked. "I'm coming over to take luncheon with you and your husband if you will let me."

"Oh, Charlie is about the same, Laura," answered Mrs. Cressler's voice. "I guess the dear man has been working too hard, that's all. Do come over and cheer him up. If I'm not here when you come, you just make yourself at home. I've got to go downtown to see about railroad tickets and all. I'm going to pack my old man right off to Oconomowoc before I'm another day older. Made up my mind to it last night, and I don't want him to be bothered with tickets or time cards or baggage or anything. I'll run down and do it all myself. You come right up whenever you're ready and keep Charlie company. How's your husband, Laura child?"

"Oh, Curtis is well," she answered. "He gets very tired at times."

"Well, I can understand it. Lands alive, child, whatever are you going to do with all your money? They tell me that J. has made nearly a hundred millions in the last three or four months. A man I was talking to last week said his corner was the greatest thing ever known on the Chicago Board of Trade. Well, good-by, Laura; come up whenever you're ready. I'll see you at luncheon. Charlie is right here; he says to give you his love."

An hour later Laura's victoria stopped in front of the Cresslers' house, and the little footman descended with the agility of a monkey, to stand, soldierlike, at the steps.

Laura gave orders to have the victoria call for her at three, and ran quickly up the front steps. The front entrance was open, the screen door on the latch, and she entered without ceremony.

"Mrs. Cressler!" she called, as she stood in the hallway drawing off her gloves. "Mrs. Cressler! Carrie, have you gone yet?"

But the maid, Annie, appeared at the head of the stairs.

"Mrs. Cressler has gone out, Mrs. Jadwin," she said. "She said you was to make yourself at home, and she'd be back by noon."

Laura nodded, and standing before the hat-rack in the hall took off her hat and gloves and folded her veil into her purse.

As she entered the "back library" she was surprised to see Mr. Cressler there, seated in his armchair, his back turned from her.

"Why, I didn't know you were here, Mr. Cressler," she said as she came up to him.

She laid her hand upon his arm. But Cressler was dead; and as Laura touched him the head rolled upon the shoulder and showed the bullet hole in the temple, just in front of the ear.

A Philadelphia Anachronism

PHILADELPHIA has been the victim of so many chronological references and comparisons that it ought to be able to stand one more. During the present winter a well-known woman was asked to read a paper before the organization that stands for a large part of the culture of the Quaker City. She pronounced the name slowly and then said:

"What an anachronism! A Contemporary Club in Philadelphia!"

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶The best way to get even is to forget.

¶Imaginary trouble is the real thing, after all.

¶More people try to learn by talking than by listening.

¶Fearlessness burns its bridges behind; fear, the bridges before.

¶Man thinks more of the cigar thrown in than of the box he pays for.

¶It is natural that the man who gives himself away should feel cheap.

¶A postponed task more toil begets and borrowed money pays no debts.

¶Every wise man has a parachute of prudence attached to his balloon of enthusiasm.

¶Some people get credit for broken hearts when they have simply lost their nerve.

¶The man who makes wagers may show good judgment, but better judgment is usually shown by the man who doesn't bet.

¶It has required much more time for many a man to toil up the stairway of fame than it has for him to slide down the banister of obscurity.

¶There are men who attempt to obey the injunction of Holy Writ by not letting their right hands know that their left hands never do anything.

¶Many an aspiring young poet is convinced that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for an editor to enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

¶"Look up and not down" is good advice, but it won't do for the man who has to descend into the cellar every day to see how much longer his coal supply will last.

The Lorenzes of the World

EVERYBODY was interested the other day in the progress of the great Austrian surgeon Lorenz through the country, when scores of poor crippled children were brought to him at every halt in his journey. A wrench, a skillful kneading of the poor little bones by his hands, and the babies were sent back cured for life.

While here he told a story as significant as his work: how when he was a very little, very poor boy he found one day a glove — fine, embroidered, the glove of a gentleman — the sign to him of an upper, unknown life where the best men and women lived. He wore it proudly, quite unconscious of his rags and bare feet.

One day his mother said to him sadly: "It will be long before you can earn the other glove, my son." Then came the history of hard struggle and defeat. After thirty years, when his profession was almost open to him, the outbreak in his blood of a terrible eczema closed its doors to him.

"There seemed," he said in his quaint English, "nothing left to me but to blow out the brains. Gentlemen, I have known what is despair."

But this was twenty years ago — twenty years of indomitable work. Now, famous as a great surgeon throughout two continents, and followed by the prayers and blessings of legions of poor mothers — he has found the other glove!

The story of Lorenz reminds us of that of a poor Portuguese knight who lived centuries ago. He was starving in Lisbon one winter when he was seized with smallpox and was driven to the fields to herd with lepers, according to the usage of the times. When he recovered he had but one thought — to save other men from the want and loathsome agony that he had undergone. He carried two lepers from the streets to his clean garret and begged food and medicine for them. Soon two more followed, then other two. Then rich, kindly neighbors looked into the matter and hired the whole house for his lepers and smallpox patients. The story of his work spread. Other knights took it up for the love of Christ; houses were given to him in several cities of Spain and France. He nursed, he begged, he prayed, until he grew old and white-haired, and, still working, died. He was the founder of the first hospitals in Europe.

Surely this old Portuguese San Juan and this modern surgeon, though centuries apart by birth, were twin brothers at soul!

The air suddenly fills with crowding shapes claiming to belong to the same family. Father Damien and the black-masked Brothers of the Misericordia and the trig visiting nurses of American cities; the mighty corps of hospital workers, the doctors next door to us who give their skill and time to paupers free of charge; or it may be you who read helping some helpless neighbor with your whole heart in the work. It is the army of these who love their brother man, and the Nazarene is their leader.

It may be that it is the Christmas season which has summoned this enchanted legion to our view. It is not a dream. Its work will last when the doings of Kings and Trusts are forgotten.

Things that are Worth While

ONLY a few weeks ago Andrew D. White, then Ambassador to Germany, was pointing a Berlin audience to seventy millions given by Americans within the year for education and philanthropy as proof conclusive that they are not materialists but idealists. Yet since he spoke the sum has been increased by scores of large gifts, one of them providing for the expenditure of fifty millions. The fact is, there never was a nation of true idealists until ours. We were founded politically and socially not upon loyalty to some man-made institution or some royal family, but upon the ideals of liberty, equality and fraternity; and we have lived in a progressively exalted atmosphere of abstractions.

If ever there was a work of the imagination, a work of creative and constructive genius, it was the conquest of this continent from the wilderness. Look closely at the so-called idealist ages of the past, and you find beneath a thin veneer of highfalutin profession coarse and base passion contending in sordidness and selfishness. Look closely at the civilization that has risen within two generations upon this continent, and you find beneath a veneer of dollar-hunting materialism a splendid and humane imagination planning miracles and executing them for the sake of principle, for the sake of posterity. An Indiana historian, Doctor Ridpath, dedicated one of his books "to my father and mother, who on the rough frontier of civilization toiled and suffered and died that their children might inherit the promise." That tells the story. Is it not more inspiring than any embodied in the beautiful art creations of Europe paid for by "munificent," art-patronizing rulers with blood and tears wrung from their peasants?

To a truly cultured mind there is more idealism in any one of several hundred homely, humble colleges founded in our wilderness by poverty-pressed pioneers than in all the monuments Old-World genius has built to tyrants and butchers and gilded nobodies and cynical statesmen playing the game of maintaining the serfdom of the masses of mankind. And the ideas taught in those little colleges — ideas of freedom and manhood, of independence and self-reliance, of the dignity of labor and the dishonor of parasitism, and the right of every man to work out his own destiny without hindrance — where in Europe, monarchical, socialistic, artistic, is their like to be found?

It is well to acquire what may be called the wisdom of the senses that is so highly developed in the Old World — the keen appreciation of painting, sculpture, architecture and music. But we ought never to forget that our own idealism, our spiritual idealism, our passion for the things not made by hands, not bought and sold, not capable of being materialized for the grosser perceptions of sight and touch and hearing, is finer and nobler than any idealism which the most artistic civilization of Europe could give us. We should be poor, indeed, if we lost our own, or learned to think less highly of it, in reaching out for theirs. As for Europe's political and social ideals — Germany's kind of socialism and England's kind of trade unionism, both frank copies of despotism that denies individual rights — we cannot afford to coquette with them.

As the direct result of this spiritual idealism of ours which has been overlooked by those who can appreciate only the things of the senses, we have these vast outpourings of wealth for mental and moral development, for the making of a wiser and better race. We always gave, never more liberally than in the days of our poverty. We give now of our abundance, but not more generously.

It is important that the spirit of these givings shall be maintained. It is important that, in acquiring the culture, the refined senses which constitute the education imported from Europe, we shall not lose our own original higher idealism. That is indeed a badly educated American who learns to value any culture of the senses, any views of past civilization, any survivals of the old order with its "right forever on the scaffold, wrong forever on the throne," as at all comparable with the teaching of America's culture of the mind and heart of man. That culture expresses itself not merely in marble or paint or cunningly wrought metals and stuffs or in "concord of sweet sounds," but in ever more and more millions of manly men and womanly women.

It would be a sorry use of these gifts to education, and we should soon find the sources of them drying up, if we should educate ourselves out of our profound idealism into Europe's veneer of idealism.

America has given a new meaning to the word Character. It must give a new meaning to the word Culture.

A Trade Wind from the Caribbean

IT'S an ill wind that blows nobody good. The bleak gale that has been whistling over Venezuela of late bids fair to be a particularly balmy breeze to the United States. For some time before the Anglo-German fleet began giving lessons in "courtesy" by sinking gunboats and blowing up forts the feeling of Latin America toward this country had been growing distinctly chilly. The little republics had been growing restive under the guardianship of the big one. They did not like our interference to preserve order on the Isthmus of Panama; they were disturbed by our proceedings in Cuba, and they suspected us of all sorts of imperialistic designs imperiling their independence. They began to question the value of the Monroe Doctrine. After all, they asked, was not the Yankee peril the real danger they had to fear? Would it not be best for them to draw closer to Europe and declare their independence of the United States?

The Germans and English have obligingly answered all these questions in our favor. Latin America, from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn, again recognizes the United States as its indispensable protector, and the Monroe Doctrine as the priceless charter of its liberties. In view of the proceedings of the allies at La Guayra and Puerto Cabello, nobody can doubt for an instant that if this Republic had not stood in the way the European Powers would have undertaken to wipe Venezuela from the list of nations. They would have made Castro a fugitive like Kruger and divided his country like Poland. And every Latin American state realizes again, as it has realized on similar occasions in the past, that its own national existence depends on the same protection that is saving Venezuela.

No doubt this realization has helped to smooth the way of the Panama Canal treaty with Colombia and of the reciprocity treaty with Cuba. Its effects will be felt in many other ways, especially in the matter of trade. The boycott of German and British goods in Venezuela is likely to spread in a greater or less degree throughout South America. Italy, Spain and the other European Powers that have associated themselves for the coercion of Venezuela will all feel the effects of Spanish-American ill will. A small republic may not think it prudent to give armed assistance to a neighbor in distress, but no country is too small or too weak to trade where it pleases. The Kaiser's mailed fist cannot compel an Argentine merchant to give an order to a German drummer when he prefers to deal with somebody else.

All this must work to our advantage. Our national manners are not always pleasing to the South Americans, but, after all, they are beginning to realize that they can trust us; and that counts for a good deal in these days.

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

THE rapidity with which the changing kaleidoscope sometimes shifts the scenes is strikingly illustrated in the swift transformation of interest at Washington within a period of two weeks. Congress met with all eyes fixed on the President's message and its questions. Before it was cold all eyes were turned to Venezuela. The sudden developments had filled the horizon with foreign complications. For the hour trusts and tariff and Cuba were all remanded to the background.

With this change the White House and State Department became the focus of attention, instead of the Capitol. Senators and Representatives debated Statehood, but thought and talked about Venezuela. The turn freshly exemplified how completely the executive side of the Government controls foreign questions. This is inherent in our American system, with its sharply defined division of executive, legislative and judicial functions. A legislative body cannot conduct diplomacy. The Senate has its voice when it comes to the ratification of treaties, but the real management of foreign issues must be in the hands of the President, and it marks the broad distinction from the parliamentary system where the government is the embodied parliament.

This executive power is far-reaching. The Monroe Doctrine, which from its announcement has been the pivotal and dominant law of the Western Hemisphere, was simply an executive declaration. All the issues growing out of the Spanish war were practically within the control of the President. It was his judgment which decided whether the nation should enter upon expansion or not. He determined that we should take the Philippines and how we should handle Cuba. An obstructive and hostile Congress might perhaps have embarrassed his policies, but the President can so far commit the nation that it is really constrained to accept and follow his counsel.

The question which arose over Venezuela was simple in its form but complex in its possibilities. English and German subjects had claims of various kinds against Venezuela—partly financial obligations for loans or services, partly indemnity for alleged injuries. The Venezuelan Government was a delinquent debtor. At the best it was never either very able or very willing to meet its obligations. Revolutionary conditions and shifty rulership had clouded both its ability and its disposition. The English and German Governments took up the matter on behalf of their complaining subjects and proceeded to joint coercive measures. They dispatched their fleets to the Venezuelan coast, sent identical ultimatums to the Venezuelan Government, shotted their guns, kicked and cuffed the little delinquent with accidental or incidental violence, instituted a blockade and demanded a settlement at the cannon's mouth.

Our Attitude Toward the Powers

In this controversy the attitude of the United States was from the first plain and unequivocal. First of all it could not permit any infraction of the Monroe Doctrine. Neither England nor Germany nor any European Power could be allowed to make any acquisition of territory on this continent or even to engage in any extended occupation. They could not be suffered to levy on Venezuelan territory. The reason for this prohibition on our part was not that such a seizure would be a wrong to Venezuela—though it might be—but that it would be an affront to the United States. It would be an infringement upon the Monroe Doctrine which we have established for our own protection and security. According to the popular cartoon, the Monroe Doctrine is a live wire which it is not safe to step on.

On the other hand, the United States cannot stand up for delinquent debtors. It cannot allow the Monroe Doctrine to become a shield for any improvident or reckless American nation in repudiating or resisting just claims upon it. If we are tenacious in insisting that no European nation shall extend its political power on this continent, it is the more incumbent upon us not to encourage any of the weaker American Governments to incur obligations and attempt to evade them under cover of that position. The United States is primate of the American continent and its rights must be respected; but it cannot act either as a sheriff, or as a debt-collector, or as a guarantor, or as a passive and complacent accessory.

The position of our Government was made the easier by the frank and unreserved assurances of the European Powers. Before taking any step they advised the United States of what they proposed to do and asked if it had any objection. They explicitly disclaimed any design of acquiring or permanently occupying Venezuelan territory. There is no reason to doubt their good faith. Their assurances were entirely in harmony with all their later professions. A year ago England, Germany and other European Powers were engaged in an active rivalry as to which was the better friend of the United States.

HOW THE VENEZUELAN AFFAIR AND THE OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL HAVE OVERSHADOWED THE TWO SERIOUS QUESTIONS OF THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

They are all sedulously cultivating the good feeling and good will of the great Republic. They have fully accepted the Monroe Doctrine in all its length and breadth. To suppose that they would now willfully and deliberately transgress it and challenge the United States is to assume that all their professions are a sham and that they would wantonly provoke a conflict.

The attitude of the United States, then, was simple and direct. To let the creditor nations use rightful measures to effect a settlement; to let the delinquent debtor take care of himself and ward off legitimate punishment for illegitimate contumacy, if he could, by paying up or promising to pay up; to hold both within the proper ground of settling disputed claims—this was the rôle of the United States as the friend of all parties. At the same time, when there is a heap of chips lying around no one can tell what spark will start a conflagration. If a war was begun, was it certain where it would end? If the creditor Powers went ashore to seize the custom houses, was it clear how soon they would again go aboard? If little Venezuela—needful as it might be to teach her a lesson—were pressed too hard, was it plain how far the resentment would spread through South America?

There were dangerous possibilities which it was better to eliminate. The United States was neutral, but she is the amicus curiæ. She is the friend of all. On every ground she preferred a peaceful settlement. With this view she suggested and urged arbitration within the appropriate limits of her relation as not being a party in interest; and her position is so commanding and her moral influence so great that her counsel prevailed. The application of the principle of arbitration is of the first importance. The form and the method are secondary. With its adoption, whatever details remain to be adjusted, the acute stage of the controversy has passed and it is in process of peaceful solution.

The diplomatic stroke of England and Germany in meeting the President's proposal of The Hague tribunal as the arbitrator with the counter proposal that the President himself should arbitrate the dispute was exceedingly clever. Naturally it was both tempting and repellant. It attracted in its implications and opportunities and it excited doubt in its responsibilities and possibilities. It is difficult to blend the functions of defender of the Monroe Doctrine, adviser of the sister Republics of America and the adjudicator of their equivocal disputes, and to be the impartial judge and at the same time keep a free hand is a delicate matter. But better this than no arbitration or long delay. At the present writing it is undetermined whether the President will act or will induce the consent of the contending parties to an acceptable alternative, and the question is one of great interest and of large significance in its bearings on the future.

The only issue of the session thus far has been the Omnibus Statehood bill. It was the last gasp of the long session and it is the first legacy of the short session. The House passed it last year without any consideration, doubtless assuming that it would be buried in the Senate, and in the Senate it arouses one of the closest and sharpest fights of years. The struggle is for and against the admission of each of the remaining Territories, Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Indian Territory as separate States. The antagonists of the scheme oppose the admission of Arizona and New Mexico, and favor uniting Oklahoma and Indian Territory and admitting them as one State.

Senator Quay is the leader of the Omnibus forces, and he leads with characteristic boldness and audacity. He is full of nerve, fertility and resource. If he were readier in debate, with the accessories of parliamentary equipment, he would be a powerful leader. But he is a strong partisan chief, and he makes up in part for the lack of parliamentary dexterity and debating facility by his force and his adroitness in general management. The battle columns are drawn, not entirely but nearly, along party lines. The great body of the Republican Senators and all of the recognized strong men, except Quay and Foraker, are against the Omnibus bill. Behind Quay are a few straggling Senators from the Rockies and the bulk of the Democrats.

Senator Quay has thrown himself into the fight with all his aggressive energy and determination. He wages the battle much as he waged the tariff fight, in which he coolly and calmly brought forth his barrel of inexhaustible manuscript whenever he wanted a concession or objected to a rate, and proceeded complacently to read away until his adversaries in sheer desperation yielded as the price of relief. He is a warrior who uses every weapon. A letter turns up in which he advises that Arizona shall go Democratic in order to influence the Democratic Senators, and he sheds it as a duck sheds rain. The point is made that his particular friends have interests to be promoted, and he answers that it is his pleasure to serve his friends. That is a kind of warfare which it is hard to combat.

The leadership of the opponents of the Omnibus bill devolves on Senator Beveridge as chairman of the Committee on Territories. He engages in the contest with all his ardor and earnestness. His position in the Senate is steadily advancing. He came there with a high reputation as an orator, but with the challenge which faces a new member. He encountered the prejudice directed against his youth, and the inquisition aroused by his undisguised purpose to achieve a place and make an impress. But with his ability, his studious industry, his patriotism, his high ideals, his unselfish devotion to the public interests, he disarmed the challenge and has rapidly gained in the esteem of his associates. He has not made the mistake of speaking too often in the Senate, but he has been a power on the stump, and the range, elevation and cogency of his speeches have commanded respect and confidence.

In fighting the Omnibus bill Senator Beveridge will have the help of Senators Aldrich, Allison, Spooner, Hanna, Hale, Lodge, Platt of Connecticut, and practically all of the recognized Republican leaders. Senator Quay started with an undoubted majority of the Senate. But the array on the other side is a powerful force to stand up against. Under ordinary circumstances it would be irresistible. The indications now are that it will win this battle. It has already picked off a man here and there from Senator Quay's column, and all the influence it can exert will be put forth until the fight is ended.

It has the argument of the obvious unfitness of Arizona and New Mexico for admission, their scanty population, their alien character, their illiteracy, the aridness of the land, the hopelessness of any material advance, the recognized mistake of premature admissions heretofore made, and various other considerations amplifying and enforcing these. The objections to giving these two Territories, with all their manifest disabilities, a power in national legislation equal to that of New York and Pennsylvania put together, for they would have an equal vote in the Senate, seem conclusive. But it will be a hard and vigorous struggle, and though the present signs point to the defeat of the Omnibus bill that result is not yet fully assured.

The Trusts and the Tariff

The overshadowing interest of the Venezuela question and the absorption of the Senate in the Statehood contest have put the two leading points of the President's message, the trusts and the tariff, to one side for the hour. But with the resumption of the session after the holiday recess they will reappear—reappear only in the case of one of them to be hung up without any immediate and definite action. It is plain that nothing can be done with the tariff at the short session. Any real consideration would consume at least three months, probably much more, and only two months remain. The most that can be undertaken is to instruct the Ways and Means and Finance Committees to take up the tariff for examination and review with a view to future action.

The suggestion of a commission of outside experts, to which the President is inclined, is not likely to be adopted. There is, indeed, very much to be said in its favor. Such a body, judiciously constituted, could make a more searching and scientific investigation of the tariff than the committees of Congress. Approaching the subject from the two standpoints of maintaining the protective principle and of applying it intelligently and fairly in the best interests of general business, the commission could readjust the schedules on the most equitable basis in the light of present conditions. the committees frame them it is more a matter of give and take. But Congress is jealous of commissions. It is unwilling to commit its power to an outside body. If it created a commission it would not follow the report, but would make a new investigation and a new measure of its own. Under these circumstances it will be disposed to keep the question in its own hands, and the most it will do at this session is to direct an inquiry as to the basis of legislation in the future.

The question of trust legislation is in a different position. The President is pressing it as more immediate, and in every way it is more easily handled. It is complex in its elements, but limited in its range. It is intricate in its problems and methods, but direct and restricted in its objects. Unlike the tariff, which covers a great variety of interests, each requiring its own special study, it is addressed to the one subject of Federal regulation of corporations engaged in interstate commerce. But though simple in form trust legislation is exceedingly difficult in essence and in substance. Though capable of being compressed into two or three printed pages, it will perplex the deepest wisdom to frame it so that it will be effective without being injurious and practical without being unconstitutional.

No man has yet framed it. The Sherman anti-trust law was prepared and passed thirteen years ago, before the trust problem had reached its present proportions. Just how much virtue it possesses has never been fully tried. It was long dormant, and its recent revival and application have yet to pass the judicial test. But, however sound within its scope, it falls short of present needs as demonstrated by the later trust developments. How to supplement and complete it with additional legislation is the problem, and no man has yet solved it.

One of the most interesting announcements of the day is that Senator Hoar is preparing such a measure. He is chairman of the Judiciary Committee and recognized as a profound lawyer. He was the real author of the essential and vital part of the Sherman Act, and has expressed the conviction that this law does not exhaust the constitutional power of Congress on the subject. One of the most penetrating and suggestive speeches on the question of trusts and their regulation was that which was made by Senator Hoar during the late campaign. He has no demagogic spirit; he is impelled only by the highest devotion to the public welfare; and his utterances are the fruit of deep reflection.

If any trust legislation shall pass at this session it will be because the President insists on it, and if he can carry a well-considered measure it will be a great tribute to his influence and his leadership. Nothing short of his earnest force will secure it. Such a project will naturally and honestly excite divisions and occasion debate. It would be quite remarkable if, with the novelty of the subject and the difficulties which surround it, a satisfactory law could be perfected in a single short session, and it will not be surprising if it goes over.

The Poets at a House-Party

By CAROLYN WELLS

[A modern mortal having inadvertently stumbled in upon a house-party of poets given on Mount Olympus, being called upon to justify his presence there by writing a poem, offered a Limerick. Whereupon each poet scoffed, and the mortal, offended, challenged them to do better with the same theme.]

The Limerick

A scholarly person named Finck
Went mad in the effort to think
  Which were graver misplaced,
  To dip pen in his paste,
Or dip his paste-brush in the ink.

Omar Khayyam's Version

Stay, fellow-traveler, let us stop and think,
Pause and reflect on the abysmal brink;
  Say, would you rather thrust your pen in paste,
Or dip your paste-brush carelessly in ink?

Rudyard Kipling's Version

Here is a theme that is worthy of our cognizance,
  A theme of great importance and a question for your ken;
Would you rather—stop and think well—
Dip your paste-brush in your ink-well,
  Or in your pesky pasting-pot immerse your inky pen?

Walt Whitman's Version

Hail, Camerados!
I salute you,
Also I salute the sewing-machine, and the flour-barrel, and the feather-duster.
What is an aborigine, anyhow?
I see a paste-pot.
Ay, and a well of ink.
Well, well!
Which shall I do?
Ah, the immortal fog.
What am I myself
But a meteor
In the fog?

Chaucer's Version

A mayde ther ben, a wordy one and wyse,
Who wore a paire of gogles on her eyes.
O'er theemes of depest thogt her braine she werked,
Nor ever any knoty problemme sherked.
Yette when they askt her if she'd rather sinke
Her penne in payste, or eke her brushe in inke,
"Ah," quo' the canny mayde, "now wit ye wel,
I'm wyse enow to know—too wyse to tel."

Henry James' Version

She luminously wavered, and I tentatively inferred that she would soon perfectly reconsider her not altogether unobvious course. Furiously, though with a tender, ebbing similitude, across her mental consciousness stole a re-culmination of all the truths she had ever known concerning, or even remotely relating to, the not-easily fathomed qualities of paste and ink. So she stood, focused in an intensity of soul-quivers, and I, all unrelenting, waited, though of a dim uncertainty whether, after all, it might not be only a dubitant problem.

Swinburne's Version

Shall I dip, shall I dip it, Dolores,
  This luminous paste-brush of thine?
Shall I sully its white-breasted glories,
  Its fair, foam-flecked figure divine?
Or shall I—abstracted, unheeding—
  Swish swirling this pen in my haste,
And, deaf to thy pitiful pleading,
  Just jab it in paste?

Eugene Field's Version

See the Ink Bottle on the Desk! It is full of Nice Black Ink. Why, the Paste-Pot is there, Too! Let us watch Papa as he sits down to write. Oh, he is going to paste a Second-hand Stamp on a Letter. See, he has dipped his Brush in the Ink by Mistake. Oh, what a Funny Mistake! Now, although it is Winter, we may have to Endure the Heated Term.

Stephen Crane's Version

I stood upon a church spire,
A slender, pointed spire,
And I saw
Ranged in solemn row before me,
A paste-pot and an ink-pot.
I held in my either hand
A pen and a brush.
Ay, a pen and a brush.
Now this is the strange part;
I stood upon a church spire,
A slender, pointed spire,
Glad, exultant,
Because
The choice was mine!
Ay, mine!
As I stood upon a church spire,
A slender, pointed spire.

Mr. Dooley's Version

"I see by th' pa-apers, Hennessy," said Mr. Dooley, "that they've a question up for dee-bate."

"What's a dee-bate?" asked Mr. Hennessy.

"Well, it's different from fish-bait," returned Mr. Dooley, "an' it's like this, if I can bate it into the thick head of ye. A lot of people argyfies an' argyfies to decide, as in the prisint instance, whether a man 'd raythur shtick his pastin'-brush in his ink-shtand, or if he'd like it betther to be afther dippin' his pen in his pashte-pot."

"Thot," said Mr. Hennessy, "is a foolish question, an' only fools wud argyfy about such a thing as thot."

"That's what makes it a dee-bate," said Mr. Dooley.

The remarkable thing about Stein-Bloch Smart Clothes is that there's none just like them. Other ready-to-wear clothes for which as much money is asked, lack our nearly fifty years' experience in their tailoring—the superb styles, the perfect proportions, the variety of sizes and shapes. And there are very few "merchant tailors" who can produce better clothes than Stein-Bloch; but, just because you can AFFORD to pay the high class tailors' extravagant prices of $65 to $80 is no good reason why you should do so.

The Reading Table

To Him that Hath

BERNARD N. BAKER has become one of the richest men in the South. Five generations of his family have lived in Baltimore. He graduated from Yale and returned to his city. He had ideas and he proceeded to work them out. Baltimore had an interesting commerce, but it was capable of development. First he formed a lighterage company. A small steamship was chartered. Then another ship was added. Next the Atlantic Transport Company was organized, and it had its trials, but through them all its president, Mr. Baker, was never discouraged. He constantly increased the line until he had regular services from New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Prosperity came, and a few months ago he placed orders in American yards for some of the finest ships ever designed.

When the new trust cut out some of the Baltimore offices, Mr. Baker gave two years' salary to those who lost their places through this change and one full year's salary to all the other employees, thus distributing among his young men—they were nearly all under forty—the comfortable total of $350,000.

A man who visits Baltimore tells a story about Mr. Baker, whom he admires. "Eight years ago," he said, "I was down there and met a friend, and in the course of conversation said something of a complimentary sort about Baker. I noticed my friend was silent, and I asked him what was the matter. 'Oh, nothing,' he replied, 'only a man isn't always big because he thinks million-dollar ideas on stockholders' money.' I was in Baltimore the other day and I met the same friend. He was as happy as a clam at the high tide of prosperity, for he had profited largely from Mr. Baker's success, and I mentioned Baker's name again, which was hardly necessary, when everybody was speaking it. 'Baker is a wonder,' said my friend. 'He has the genius of foresight, and it does a few of us a mighty lot of good to feel that we had confidence in him all the way along.' I could not help recalling the little conversation of eight years previous, and my friend very properly flushed. 'Well,' he said finally, 'to tell you the honest truth, when I said that the stock wasn't paying any dividend and nobody wanted to buy it.'

"I always tell this little story," concluded the man, "when I hear about the old fellows who blow over their confidence in a man after the man has won. As a matter of fact, Baker pushed through extraordinary difficulties, and he succeeded because he is a most remarkable man, with real American grit."

IMPERTINENT POEMS

By Edmund Vance Cooke

(VIII) DIAGNOSIS

YOU have a grudge against the man
Who did the thing you couldn't do.
You hatched the scheme, you laid the plan,
And yet you couldn't push it through.
You strained your soul and couldn't win;
He gave a breath and it was easy.
You smile and swallow your chagrin,
But, oh, the swallow makes you queasy.
I know the illness, for, you see,
The diet never pleases me.

Your dearest friend has made a strike,
Has placed his mark above the crowd,
Has won the thing which you would like,
And you are glad for him and proud.
Your tongue is swift, your cheek is red,
When some one speaks to his detraction,
And yet the fact the thing is said
Affords you half a satisfaction.
I see the workings of your mind,
Because my own is so inclined.

You tell me fame is a hollow squeak,
You say that wealth is carking care;
To live care-free a single week
Is more than years of work and wear.
Alexander weeps his highest place,
Diogenes is happy sunning:
What matters it who wins the race,
If one has had the joy of running?
And yet, you covet prize and pelf—
I know it, for I do myself.

SYSTEM is a 96-page monthly magazine.

Brim so full of bright ideas and clever systems that an official of the National Cash Register Company writes us as follows:—

"The ideas gathered from your magazine have enabled me to formulate systems for Mr. Patterson's letters, books, pamphlets, telegrams, bills, orders, addresses, etc., which have simplified this work greatly."

And the United States Fidelity & Guarantee Company say:—

"Since the first of the year, when we subscribed to your magazine, we have completely changed our methods of bookkeeping, and have been guided solely by the suggestions contained in SYSTEM. We find the work is more simple, and, better still, there is less chance of error."

And what a monthly reading of SYSTEM has done for them it will just so surely do for you.

The man of experience gets in SYSTEM the experience of other men. To the young man beginning business, to the clerk, bookkeeper or student, SYSTEM is more than a business college.

To enumerate SYSTEM'S contributors is simply to name the foremost system experts and the strongest business men.

The general articles they write will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

Systems actually used in large, successful factories, offices, stores, banks, publications, professions, are described in detail. And experts show how these same systems can be adapted to smaller businesses.

The field of SYSTEM is so broad it is not possible to particularize. But no matter what your business or profession, one at least of our experts is familiar with it, and tells the best of what he knows in SYSTEM. It is your privilege to consult him freely.

GOLDEN FLEECE

The night before they landed she and Frothingham sat on deck late, her father dozing in a chair at a discreet distance. Both were depressed—the sense that they were once more about to plunge into the whirlpool of life made each sad. Honoria was remembering the past; Frothingham was brooding over the future. If he had dared he would have proposed to her. "She'd make a satisfactory wife," he said to himself. "She's just enough English to understand me and to make my people like her. She wouldn't get on their nerves. And she doesn't talk through her nose except when she's excited. She's a little too clever—but a steady goer, once the harness is on. If I could get her it would be good business, good swift business."

"You're a queer sort," he said to her suddenly. "Most girls are full of getting married. But I don't believe you give it a thought."

"I sha'n't ever marry," she replied.

He laughed. "Oh, I say, that's nonsense. Every girl must marry. You may as well make up your mind to it, close your eyes, shut your teeth and dash in."

"You might not think it," she said after a pause, "but I'm like you English—I'm horribly, incurably sentimental. I know it's foreign to my bringing up, but——" Her jaw set, and her eyes fixed upon something visible only to her in the blackness beyond the rail. "My bringing up was all wrong and rotten," she went on presently. "I don't know just how or where, but I know it's so. I began to feel it dimly when I visited my aunt in America four years ago. My mother died when I was a baby, and I was trained by my father and governesses—governesses that suited him. My father—— But I needn't tell you, and you probably don't sympathize with me. His one idea in life is social position. It seems to me a contemptible ambition for a man. With women—there's some excuse for it. We're naturally petty. And, so far as I can see it, as the world is made up, if we haven't got that we haven't got anything. We can't have any other ambition—it's the only one open to us. Well, I haven't got even ambition. I want—that is, I wanted——"

She paused again, resisting the mood that was urging her on to confidence. "By Jove," thought Frothingham, "it wouldn't be hard for a man to love her."

"No matter what it was I wanted," she went on, "I didn't get it—and sha'n't, ever." She turned her face toward him. "You may misunderstand me—may think I'm in love and hopelessly disappointed—there's a story of that kind going round. But I'm not in love. I was—but I'm not now."

"Do you think one ever gets over it?" he asked absently.

She did not answer.

"I'm afraid not—at least, not thoroughly," he answered himself. There were two faces out there in the blackness into which they were staring, but each was seeing only one.

"One ought to get over it—one must," she said slowly, "when one finds that the person one cared for is a bad lot. But"—she sighed under her breath—"I might marry, yes, would, if I needed a home or money. But I don't. So I shall be much better contented alone. I'll never believe deeply in any human being again."

"You mustn't take life so seriously," he said gently. "You'll change before you're twenty-five."

"So my father thinks." She looked at Frothingham with a mischievous, audacious smile. "He thinks I shall change immediately—and marry—you!"

Frothingham gasped.

"How funny and fishlike you look," she said, laughing at him. "You're in no danger. Do you suppose I'd have said that if I'd had you on my list? No, I like you, but—but!"

"You may change your mind," he recovered himself sufficiently to say.

"No—you're safe. I spoke out because I wish to be friends with you. I don't especially admire your purpose in going to America. But at least you're frank about it."

"I? Why, Miss Longview—I——" Frothingham began to protest, pushing at his dislodging eyeglass.

"Don't prevaricate. You wouldn't do it well. As I was about to say, I wish to be friends with you. And it's impossible for a woman and a man to be friends when either is harboring matrimonial designs against the other, or fancies the other is harboring them."

"I certainly have to marry somebody," said Frothingham mournfully.

"Yes—I know. Father explained about you. He's up on every titled family in England above the baronet. And he's determined that I shall be a countess at the very least. He says he has the money to buy it—and possibly he has. But"—she was intent upon the blackness again—"I shall never go back to England," she said. "I shall stay in America—with a visit to Paris and the Riviera now and then."

"That'll cheer your father when he hears it," drawled Frothingham. He coughed and stammered and added in an embarrassed, apologetic tone, "And I don't like to hear a girl as young and attractive as you are talk in that ghastly way."

She looked at him with a teasing smile.

"You'll make some woman a good husband," she said. "Selfish and flighty, perhaps, but on the whole good. I'll be glad to help you—with some other girl. In fact, I've one in mind—an acquaintance in New York—we call each the other friend, and I'm fond of her, as that sort of thing goes with women."

He began to stammer again and she saw that he was still hanging hopefully over her father's plan. "If I were a marrying woman and ambitious," she went on, "I'd think seriously of having a cast at you. But I'm neither, so I can appreciate your assets quite impartially."

"I've got nothing," he said, "nothing but debts."

"Debts are an asset—if contracted in a way that would seem romantic to a girl. Then, there's your title. That's a big asset either in England or America. And you've got a fairly good disposition and nice manners, and you pretend indifference charmingly, assisted by your eyeglass. And your character is not too bad. Not too good, either. I've heard one or two rather thick stories of you. If I were your wife I'd keep an eye on the money—you will gamble. But your character is well up to the average for our kind of people."

"I've been rather bad, I'm afraid," he said, in the shallowly penitent tone in which human beings glory in the sins they are proud of. "I've been as bad as I knew how to be."

"All of us are that, I fancy," replied Honoria, rising. "I sha'n't trouble you to confess to me. Save it for—her. Good-night." She put out her hand friendlily. "I think we shall be friends."

Frothingham looked after her as she went with her father down the deck toward the main companionway. "She is a queer lot," he muttered. "I suppose that's American. Well, if it's a fair specimen, I certainly sha'n't be bored in America."

Why Tears are Salt

RECENT announcements of scientists as to the wonderful properties of salt and saline solutions in sustaining and renewing life have directed much attention to this substance.

"It is curious when you come to think of it," said a chemist in the Smithsonian Institution, "that salt is the only mineral we use as an article of diet.

"Indispensable as it now is, however, it is an acquired taste. Aborigines that lived by the chase did not salt their meat. Many nomadic tribes still refuse to use salt.

"The tribes of Arctic Russia and Siberia devour decayed fish with great relish. The Russian Government seeking to improve their food supply issued a mandate that their fish should be salted. The inhabitants obediently complied with the order, but as the ukase did not include any order about eating the fish thus salted, the tribes continued to live on their unsalted and reeking diet.

"Tribes in Africa, however, and in other lands depending on vegetable diet naturally take to salt. In America agricultural or sedentary tribes have gone to war for the possession of saline springs.

"With the progress of civilization and the use of a mixed diet salt has become so universal a condiment that it has permeated the whole human system. The blood is saline in taste, human tears are salty, and every tissue of the body is bathed and cleansed by salt.

"In surgical operations where death would otherwise occur from loss of blood, life is now sustained by the injection of saline solutions."

"ROMANCES OF THE WORLD'S GREAT MINES"

AN ARTICLE in one of the December magazines tells of the fortunes produced by a few famous mines. We hear of the great successes and "strikes," but seldom of the heart-breaking failures. The best-known gold mine in America, and perhaps in the world, was once traded for a mule. The owner either did not have money or energy enough to develop his hidden wealth. A company was subsequently formed to work the property and only after the hardest of struggles against indifference and unbelief were the promoters able to raise enough money to barely start the enterprise. That mine is to-day pointed to everywhere as an ideally safe investment. Modern mining is not a business in which a poor man or a small company can succeed once in a hundred times. Crushing plants, smelters, concentrators, cyanide tanks and the ore hoisting and carrying plants involve vast expense before the modern mine is properly equipped to earn money for its owners. Trace the history of any great mine and you will go back to the day when its stock sold for but a fraction of its present market value, or almost went begging.

OUR first impulse in offering stock of the "Majestic" is always to simply state a few facts about the vast mineral wealth of this splendid combination of copper, gold, silver, lead, zinc and iron mines. If we stated here what we actually believe and what we actually know about this combination of riches, not one reader in ten thousand would believe our statements. In presenting our claims to the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST we make but two requests: First, send for our book, "Above and Below the Surface," by return mail; Second, if it is possible for you to do so, join one of the parties which we are sending out to personally inspect the mines. Private cars and dining car direct to the mines and return. Unimpeachable references are required, for each member of the party must be above reproach. As our largest subscriptions have been received from persons who have seen and examined the property, we shall send investors to see for themselves whenever it is possible. We can and will prove every statement we make in our book, "Above and Below the Surface," by actual development work already completed.

What We Offer

The "Majestic"

Combination of Copper, Gold, Silver, Lead, Zinc and Iron Mines

This vast property, located in Beaver County, Utah, embraces eight groups of mines:

1. O. K.
2. Old Hickory
3. Vicksburg
4. Harrington-Hickory
5. Larkspur
6. Hoosier Boy
7. Copperfield
8. Treasure

Of 2,400 acres in area; also hundreds of acres included in Smelter Site and New Town Site, more water than needed, brick and lime on property. Upwards of 20,000 feet of actual underground development work — shafts, drifts, cross cuts, winzes, etc. An excess of 100,000 tons of available ore on the dumps, estimated by experts to be worth between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000.

What Capitalists Say Who Have Visited the Mines

E. H. HOTCHKISS, of Hotchkiss Bros., Lumber Dealers, Torrington, Conn. — "I am impressed with the Majestic much more favorably than I anticipated, and to such an extent that I am agreeably surprised. While the reports given out regarding the Majestic by Messrs. Chapman, Mucklow & Bosson regarding the holdings of the Company were, by a good many, considered as being overdrawn, I am fully convinced that the full truth regarding these properties has not been told. In my opinion the Majestic, in point of value and promise, ranks among the best in the West."

HON. D. N. MORGAN (Ex-Treasurer of the United States), Bridgeport, Conn. — "All of the statements made to me of the values of the Majestic Mining and Smelting Company's properties have been fully verified by personal examination. Corroboration of these statements have been the unqualified opinions of eminent experts and others who have for years made a study and inspection of the mining industry of the United States. I believe that the Company has a wonderful future before it."

JOHN M. DICK, Hartford, Conn. — "I had heard many strong words in favor of the Majestic as an investment that would bring large returns, and, on the strength of some investigation covering a period of six months, I secured quite a good holding of the Company's stock, which, I considered, must be my limit. My impressions, since personally going over the property, are such that I feel that I must double my holdings, and have decided to do so."

SIDNEY E. PACKARD, Box Manufacturer, Brockton, Mass. — "My impressions were favorable before coming, and they are now more than confirmed by what I have seen. I believe that the management is honest and able, and I shall increase my holdings in the stock of the Company."

GEORGE E. KEITH, Shoe Manufacturer, Brockton, Mass. — "I had but little knowledge of the Majestic before making this trip, but I am very favorably impressed with its value; so much so that I will take a much larger block of the stock of the Company upon my return home. Am fully satisfied that this is a good investment. Have never seen anything in the mining line that will compare with the Majestic."

We Hold The World's Record

For High-Grade Ore

We have sent to the public smelters 1,200 tons of ore from the O. K. mine, which holds the world's record for high-grade copper ore. The actual result for 1,200 tons was:

40.9 per cent. Copper
$5.00 per ton Gold
$3.00 per ton Silver

EVERY TON WAS WORTH $100 NET

Many thousands, and tens of thousands, of tons of the same quality ore are in sight for our smelters, which are now being erected by the Colorado Iron Works Company of Denver. There are, of course, enormous quantities of low-grade ore in addition to the high grade. Yet all this is a "mere bagatelle." Still it is more than enough (without further development) to pay back the total capitalization of the Majestic Company.

And the "O. K." is only one of the eight great mines in the "Majestic" combination.

FEATURES

The great need of the Majestic property is an adequate smelter. Two months' operation of the 350-ton plant in process of construction, and which will shortly be in operation, will put the Majestic property in an absolutely independent position.

A handsome dividend is expected during the year 1903, and only a delay in the erection of the smelter can prevent this dividend. The contractors assure us it will be completed on time, January 25, 1903. Remember we have over a million dollars' worth of ore mined and on the dumps ready for the smelter.

MANAGEMENT

Mr. William A. Farish, one of the best-known mining experts in the country, has made a contract to act as General Manager for the Majestic Company for three years, and is now devoting his whole time to the development of the property.

The small block of stock we have for sale at $7.50 per share (par value $10.00) is being subscribed for so rapidly that we reserve the privilege of withdrawing this price without notice. An investigation is invited from the most conservative investors in stocks and bonds. The stock will be listed on the leading mining exchanges. Send your name and address on postal, or if more convenient, fill out blank, and copy of "Above and Below the Surface," a handsome 44-page illustrated book, will be sent free by return mail.

Address all communications to and make checks payable to the Fiscal Agents,

Between the Lines

The Pursuit of Happiness

"YOU will find here nine stories," writes Dr. Henry Van Dyke in the foreword of The Blue Flower (Scribners). . . . "I wished to bring them into one book because they seemed to me like parts of the same story—the story of the search for happiness, which is life." And so the author with his delicate and fragrant art has wrought out these tales. For the most part their atmosphere is legendary or idyllic. This is the literature of the ideal, rare enough in these latter days. It is the literature of sentiment and, as it were, of allegory, and there may be those who will grow impatient at the elusiveness of The Blue Flower, those who would prefer the search for happiness to be realized abruptly and concretely in the unearthing of the buried pot of gold. But this is not life, nor is it happiness. It is an artist, an artist of imagination and delicate perception, who has idealized the quest for happiness in sometimes evasive and always charming pictures which will not lack appreciation.

Marion Crawford's New Novel

The practiced hand of F. Marion Crawford has given us a most readable story in his new novel of modern Rome, Cecilia (The Macmillan Company). The friendship of Damon and Pythias, the betrothal of the modern Vestal Cecilia to the one friend, the mystical affiliation between Cecilia and the other, the loyalty of the latter, the defeat of intrigue, and the final unraveling of the tangle, with happiness on one side and renunciation on the other, provide the elements of a tale which will be read with sustained interest and satisfaction. Mr. Crawford knows his craft. The short-story motive is never called upon to maintain the weight of the novel, but there is always a thorough construction and continuous development with a constant interplay of motives and of interest.

Bishop Potter on Social Questions

The text of Bishop Potter's Yale lectures, The Citizen in his Relation to the Industrial Situation (Scribners), is the brotherhood of man. By this, it is hardly necessary to say, is meant a brotherhood moral and religious, something far removed from a socialistic state. With the sanity and common-sense and catholic sympathy characteristic of this eminent public teacher, Bishop Potter holds the balance even. He condemns the prejudiced socialist and he points the finger of reprobation at the unjust employer and the dishonest capitalist. His book offers a plea for equity and the practical application of the teachings of Christ.

In these times of readjustment of social and economic questions it furnishes much food for thought.

A Sentimental Journey

The dog reappears as the central character of Alfred Ollivant's Danny (Doubleday, Page & Co.). Now John Brown's classic Rab was a tale of true sentiment. The story which introduced Mr. Ollivant's Bob, Son of Battle, is described by his title. The author's second story is a tale of sentimentality. Danny was the pet of the child-wife of a dour Laird, who is plagued by an evil hag whose husband he had slain and her half-idiot son. Danny is taken to the hearts of the Laird and his eccentric old servants, and he seems to reduce them to a state of semi-hysteria which culminates in his suicide after he has been banned by the Laird on a false charge invented by the malicious Simon. The folk-talk is often piquant, but the author's straining for effect leaves the reader with an impatient longing for greater simplicity and directness.

Gray Days in New England

Mr. F. J. Stimson, lawyer, novelist and writer of excellent short stories, furnishes two strong novelettes in the volume called Jethro Bacon and The Weaker Sex (Scribners). The first is the bleak but vigorous story of the Cape Cod cranberry farmer who leads a double life, and the second a tale of urban submerged life and a woman's sacrifice for love. They are not cheerful studies, but they are convincing as regards the author's power and art.

Backwoods School Life

Ralph Connor's Glengarry Schooldays (Revell) is another wholesome tale of Scotch, Irish and English settlers in the backwoods

Concerning Your Boy

To what degree Mr. Nathaniel C. Fowler's book, The Boy: How to Help Him Succeed (The Oakwood Publishing Company), will be profitable his own test of experience will demonstrate; but that it is interesting—interesting to men who have failed or who have succeeded, to men who are balancing between success and failure, to men who have been boys themselves and now have boys of their own to bring up, to educators, economists, moralists, and to practical men of affairs concerned in the development of their aids and subordinates—most interesting, cannot be doubted.

Mr. Fowler, starting with the supposition that success is "the best possible at its time," that "in the arithmetic of life ability plus opportunity equals success," and may, without too much weighing of values, be defined as "the favorable and profitable termination of the thing attempted, the satisfactory issue of effort, the ending corresponding with the aims and desire entertained," felt himself concerned with the shortest and easiest part of that desire, whether of the boy himself or of his parents and advisers. Cautioned by the wise saw that "opinionists are afraid of experience," he resolved to form his own opinions only after experiment. He sent out a series of twenty-five questions to bankers, merchants, manufacturers, chemists, engineers, college presidents, doctors, lawyers—to everybody except beggarman, thief. To these he received in all three hundred and twenty-one answers. The first seven chapters and one hundred and twenty-eight pages of the book contain the doctrine of conduct drawn from these answers. The remaining two chapters are, respectively, a tabulated analysis of the answers as ayes, qualified ayes, noes, qualified noes, and non-committals; and the textual reply, in full, of each individual, given over his signature.

Questions and answers make most suggestive reading. Should a boy go to college? Should he stick to the country or try the cities? Should he embark on business for himself, if he sees a fair chance? Or should he stay with the house that employs him, for a larger salary? What should he read? Is strict honesty necessary to business success? What vices of character bring about the largest number of failures? Such is the main trend of the inquiry.

One reads at large in the answers that a boy should go to college no matter what his plans may be for later life, but that he never should be forced into college; that he should try the cities if he is ambitious; that he should go into business for himself when he may—even, on the whole, with borrowed capital; that the Bible and Shakespeare should be his reading (one author modestly specifies his own works); that honesty is overwhelmingly the best policy; and that lack of ability, lack of judgment, lack of perseverance, lack of application are the defects, and bad habits and extravagance—the two go hand in hand—the vices of character that wreck the machine. It is significant that where extravagance is mentioned thirty-three times as an element contributive to failure, bad luck is mentioned once and adverse circumstances twice.

President Eliot, of Harvard, to the question, Which, in your opinion, contributes the more to success—ability or experience? answers ability—ability will get experience. Mr. Paul Dana asks pertinently enough of the question, In choosing a trade, business or profession, would you advise the boy to enter the one for which he has a decided preference? Why not? Why not, indeed! It is worth while noting, however, in this connection, that the consensus of opinion is that a man may win success by application in even the most distasteful work. So, when the question of honesty comes, a strong minority regretfully holds with Machiavelli that honesty in small matters is essential and the appearance of it in larger matters—a stand which it is very hard to attack empirically, but which Mr. Dana, again, exposes morally with his Parthian reply: Is the safe-cracker who gets away successful?

It is possible here to quote briefly only. Careful examination of the questions and replies in full, with the tabulated analysis as a corrective for individual bias, will prove much more satisfactory. The book is one of those rare combinations sure to interest both the thoughtful and the shallow.

peopled by Quakers, all agents for the Underground Railway to Canada. Hence the only slaves we had were those who were too comfortable and satisfied with us to run away. We knew "the institution" at its best, and usually listened to the furious attacks on it with indifferent contempt.

There was one family, newcomers, who were accused of being emissaries of Garrison. I do not know how truthfully. They were illiterate, noisy radicals, believers in spiritualism, in divorce, and in woman's rights. They lived in a little farmhouse on the edge of the borough. In the spring of 1859 a tall, gaunt old man visited them, who came into the town sometimes, stalking up and down the streets with his eyes fixed and lips moving like a man under the influence of morphia. After he had disappeared it was told that he was a poor farmer from the West who was insane on the question of slavery, and that he had brought a quantity of huge pikes and axes to the house of our new neighbors, with which the slaves in town were to kill their masters whenever there should be an uprising.

I remember how we all laughed at the story. The children used to tease the old black aunties and uncles to show them how they meant to stab them with pikes or behead them with axes when the day came. We thought it a very good joke. But five months later, when the old farmer died at Harper's Ferry, on that bright October day, the whole world looking on with bated breath, the pikes were brought out of hiding by his friends, who declared that they never had meant to give them to the negroes to use, and had thought the old man mad.

The race for whom he had made the pikes certainly never would have used them. They are not a cruel nor malignant people. During the Civil War the women and children of the South were under the protection of their slaves, and I never have heard of a single instance in which they abused the trust.

I married during the Civil War and came to live in the North, where I met many of the men and women who had kindled the fire under the caldron.

In the flush of victory their motives and oddities came out more plainly. I will tell you of some of them another day.

With Lincoln's Indorsement

"IN 1853 I went to Springfield to study law," said Senator Cullom, "and one of my first friendships there was with Abraham Lincoln.

"Shortly after I began practice I saw an opening to make an investment, but $1000 was a necessary preliminary, and that amount or anything like it was utterly beyond me.

"My inclination was to go forthwith to Lincoln and ask him to lend me that amount, but I soon satisfied myself that he, too, had no bank account. Nevertheless I went to him.

"'Mr. Lincoln,' I said, 'I wish very much that I had $1000.'

"He looked at me good-humoredly.

"'My boy,' he remarked, 'I thought from the first that we were kindred spirits.'

"Then Lincoln asked me seriously what he could do for me, and when I had stated my case he said: 'You just make out your note for $1000 and I'll indorse it and we'll go over to the bank and get the money.'

"I confess," continued Senator Cullom, "that I was staggered. But I underestimated then the economic value of unassailable integrity.

"The cashier glanced at the note, turned it over, and with a pleasant word or two counted out the money.

"Years afterward I asked the banker how he happened to advance the amount on an unsecured indorsement.

"'Simply because it was worth $1000 to us in our standing in Springfield and throughout the State,' he replied, 'to have it known that "Honest Abe" was doing business with us. His signature was regarded in Illinois as gilt-edged security.'

"When I first came to Congress, a few months before Lincoln's assassination," continued Senator Cullom, "I again had need of an indorser and I ventured to go to the President.

"'Yes, I'll indorse your note gladly,' said Mr. Lincoln, 'but you must not be surprised,' he added merrily, 'if they refuse you, for you see they know me better now than they used to when I was in Springfield.'"

The Rubber Industry in South America

RUBBER is the elastic material that ties the world together. Those who first discovered a commercial use for rubber two hundred years ago in India — hence the name India rubber — little thought that there would come a time which historians would chronicle as the rubber age. That age is the present time; for rubber is unquestionably foremost in importance, in a certain sense, in the commercial progress of the world. This is called also the electrical age, but it is rubber that makes possible the manifold applications of electricity. For example, if the Pacific cable were to be built within the present year, its construction would consume the entire available supply of rubber in the United States to-day.

Comparatively little use was made of rubber before Goodyear was led by his genius to the discovery of a scientific treatment of the crude product which gave to the world a new commercially available product of extraordinary value in advancing the arts of modern civilization. Rubber has now become a vital necessity, its production assuming vast proportions and its consumption a dominant factor in a great number of industries.

Every day a new use is found for rubber. Manufacturers separate the products into five divisions: (1) Foot-wear; (2) Mechanical Goods; (3) Clothing; (4) Druggists' Sundries; (5) Hard Rubber. Over thirty per cent. of all these manufactured rubber goods is represented by boots and shoes, this branch of the industry giving employment to twenty thousand workmen who produce annually forty million dollars' worth of rubber footwear. Altogether the rubber factories of the United States use yearly over sixty million pounds of rubber, turning it out again in thousands of different useful articles. Horses and human beings alike are clothed with rubber and wire is covered with it. The carriage wheel is tired with it, and the vehicle that has not a rubber tire is called old-fashioned. Miles of rubber hose are used in gardens, railroad cars, and a hundred other places where water, steam and gas are used. Then comes rubber belting and matting. Notice the rubber mats on floors and stairs and aboard ship, and the mats under ice pitchers, the mats on the cigar stand for change! Typewriter manufacturers need rubber in immense quantities for the rollers; a quarter of a million dollars is put in billiard tables; and there is one hundred thousand dollars' worth of rubber used in the carpet sweepers made annually. The tiny pieces of rubber sunk into lead pencils for erasers would weigh tons if collected in one pile. The rubber rings on preserve jars represent a huge fortune, one company alone using several hundred thousand pounds of rubber a year in such rings. There are immense values in rubber in the shape of rubber stamps, atomizers, air-cushions, water bottles, harness trimmings, inkwells, rulers, penholders, and fittings for pipes. Baseball and football players alone use a million dollars' worth of rubber every year.

The manufacture of all these rubber commodities has created a demand for rubber that is simply insatiable. Rubber, indeed, ranks third among American imports, being exceeded in quantity and value only by sugar and coffee. Whence comes this vast quantity of crude rubber? What are the facts relating to the world's rubber supply?

Rubber comes from South America, from the Central American States, from Western Africa, India, and the Indian Archipelago. The best rubber, however, as all the world knows, comes from just one region — and that is the region of the Amazonis, embracing a certain part of Southern Venezuela and the borders of the Amazon in Brazil. In his book on South America, Mr. Frank G. Carpenter, the distinguished traveler who made a twenty-five thousand mile journey in search of industrial information, says: "Amazon rubber is the best of all rubber; it furnishes the bulk of the product and the nations of the earth pay tribute to Para." Para, it should be explained, was until recent years the capital of the rubber world. The importance of this city in the rubber industry, however, has declined of late and Manaos is now known as the greatest of rubber shipping cities. Seventy-five per cent. of all the rubber produced in the world is shipped via these two places, from either one of which ships leaving for New York often carry cargoes of rubber valued at two million dollars or more. Manaos has gained its importance as a rubber port because of its nearness to that section of the Amazonis which scientists have discovered to be the world's greatest rubber country. The country referred to is a certain strip between the Rio Orinoco and the Rio Negro in Venezuela — all of which territory has been acquired by a company of American capitalists — but that is a story that will keep until later on.

It is a significant fact that the greatest of rubber regions is now conceded to be within the borders of a country toward which the whole world is looking as the great new industrial Eldorado — Venezuela. At this present moment England and Germany have concentrated fleets of warships off the coast of that country; the ships form material evidence of the fact that England and Germany are engaged conjointly in a dispute with Venezuela. A dispute over what? Our own Monroe Doctrine would not permit England or Germany to acquire territory in Venezuela; hence is it not obvious that that which these two European nations wish most of all of Venezuela is a commercial foothold? The natural resources of that South American Republic, indeed, have aroused the cupidity of European commercial nations, and this is the real cause of the presence of the fleets of two great nations to-day off the coast of Venezuela.

As United States Minister to Venezuela, Francis B. Loomis, said: "The resources of Venezuela are by no means confined to gold. Within a few months capitalists in command of large fortunes have been making a close study of possibilities in Venezuela. They are also seeking to acquire large tracts of land for the purpose of exploiting the rubber products which they contain."

According to Minister Loomis, then, rubber is one of the greatest natural resources of Venezuela, and it is the valuable rubber forests of that country that have been acquired by the American capitalists before referred to — a circumstance which forms the theme of this story.

Before giving the reader a glimpse of this rubber region, however, it is necessary to state one or two facts concerning other rubber regions. In the Central American States, for example, and in Peru and even in Brazil, the natives cut down the rubber trees ruthlessly instead of merely tapping them, with no regard for the future. But rubber in its crude state is a sap, and should be gathered as is maple sugar sap, by tapping the tree, not by destroying it. A much larger amount of sap of course can be gathered from a given tree by cutting it down than by tapping it. But it is evident that the method pursued by the Peruvians and the Central Americans and to some extent even the Brazilians in gathering the rubber is very much like killing the goose to get the golden egg.

As the future production of rubber in the tropics is threatened by the excessive tapping, as well as the felling of the wild rubber trees by the rubber hunters, American rubber manufacturers sometimes anxiously inquire how it will be possible to supply the enormous demand in the immediate future. It is claimed that one remedy for the destruction of the wild tree is the fostering of the cultivated rubber tree. Those who have traveled in the rubber country, however, and have studied conditions there, dispute this claim. Mr. Carpenter, the traveler before referred to, says: "It takes from fifteen to twenty years after the planting before rubber trees will produce enough sap to pay for gathering it." Scientists who have studied the conditions add that it is not possible to plant and cultivate rubber trees here, there or anywhere, with any degree of commercial success, any more than it is possible to raise oranges in Maine or coffee in Montana. The fact remains, then, that the rubber industry for many years to come must depend entirely upon the wild trees.

These wild trees grow along the borders of rivers, and the particular series of streams involved in the rubber industry are the Amazonis before mentioned, the greatest rubber producing section of this greatest of rubber regions being that bordering both sides of the Rio Casiquiare, between the Rio Orinoco and the Rio Negro in Venezuela — the region, in short, acquired by the Para Rubber Plantation Company. The territory thus acquired is larger than the State of Rhode Island. It is one hundred and seventy-five miles long and eight miles wide, with the Rio Casiquiare forming a natural canal flowing almost directly through its centre. The total area is fourteen hundred square miles, an area greater than that of Rhode Island by more than two hundred square miles. To put these figures in another way, the property embraces one million acres, the number of rubber trees averaging six to an acre, making at least six million wild rubber trees now matured and ready to yield their valuable sap.

Let us journey into this region and see what the greatest of rubber countries looks like. Tracing the location first of all on the map, we come to Para and later to Manaos, the two rubber shipping centres of the world. In these towns live the proprietors of many of the rubber plantations in the Amazon region and officials representing Companies who have capitals of millions, and who manage their rubber properties after modern business methods. In these cities also live many other individuals interested in the gathering and selling of rubber. It is said, indeed, that the whole of the great South American rubber region is owned by the Companies represented by the chief citizens of these cities. Para itself is a city of one hundred thousand people, many of the inhabitants having grown rich either by actually dealing in rubber, or in supplying necessaries to the camps.

In both Para and Manaos the most prominent feature of industrial life is the shipment of rubber, just as the shipment of tobacco is most prominent in Havana. All the exporting sections of the cities are occupied by packing houses where the rubber is packed for export. To these packing houses the crude rubber is brought in lumps that very much resemble hams, though if you happen to drop one of these lumps of rubber you will realize that it is not the ham it seems to be, but a very elastic substance, since as soon as it touches the ground it bounces up and down after the manner of a heavy rubber ball. In the warehouses each lump of rubber is carefully weighed, and is then packed in boxes, three hundred pounds in each box, ready for shipment.

The traveler will be welcomed as a passenger on one of the boats that bring the crude rubber to the warehouses of the Para Rubber Plantation Co. at Manaos, and after a short sail the boat will land the passenger in the heart of the rubber country. The territory was purchased in fee simple by the Company from the Venezuelan Government. This is the region that is destined to supply not only the best, but the bulk of the rubber used throughout the world for many years to come.

Scientific men explain that rubber is a product obtained by proper treatment of the milky sap or "latex" of such tropical trees as siphonia elastica and siphonia braziliensis, belonging to the genus distributed thoughout the section of South America now under discussion. The last United States Census report says that although rubber may be produced from any plant such as common milkweed, having a milky sap, still it can be obtained in commercial quantities only from tropical countries and from rubber trees. The census expert adds that like other vegetable products rubber differs in quality according to the place of derivation; and that the best rubber is shipped from Para and Manaos in South America. We have then the fact of Government recognition of the superiority of rubber coming from the territory here brought to the attention of the reader.

Let us see how operations in this rubber country are conducted. Let us see how the Indians, native to the region, gather the rubber. In the first place the rubber tree resembles ordinary forest trees, such as the English Ash. The reader probably supposes that rubber comes from the rubber plant which ornaments his home, or which he has seen in conservatories, but that plant produces gutta percha, and not rubber.

In the rubber forest the rubber hunter does most of his work in the forenoon, when the sap runs most freely. He begins by tapping the tree as high up from the ground as he can reach, neither boring the tree with an auger as we do our maple trees, nor scarifying the tree as we do our turpentine pine trees of the South. The rubber gatherer taps the tree with a tomahawk or hatchet, which has an inch wide blade. He makes only a slight gash in the bark with his hatchet, taking care not to cut the wood beneath the bark. Immediately a fluid, as thin and as white as milk, oozes forth. The gatherer now fastens a small cup into another cut made below the gash, thus catching the fluid as it runs down. He makes three or four similar gashes in each tree, fastening the cup under each gash. About noon-time he goes from tree to tree and empties the milk from the cups into a bucket. He has only a certain number of trees allotted to him, and as there is a tablespoonful of fluid in each cup when he gathers it at noon-time, each tapper has about a gallon of sap to show for his morning's work.

The rubber forests are divided into what are known in the rubber regions as paths. These consist of from sixty to one hundred trees each, the paths leading in and out of the woods and crossing streams. One such path is allotted to each of the native workers who tap the trees and gather the rubber. The size of a plantation is known by its number of paths; hence, the size of the plantation owned by the Para Rubber Plantation Company is known as a plantation of about 75,000 paths, making this plantation of a size that renders even our great cotton plantations or wheat farms insignificant by comparison. As two thousand laborers will soon be at work, over eleven hundred now being actually employed on the Company's property, the reader will understand that eleven hundred paths are being worked. The Company expects to add extra workers at the rate of at least two thousand a year.

After the gathering, the next process is that of smoking, referred to in a previous paragraph. As the sap coagulates on exposure to the air, it is necessary to smoke it the day it is gathered. By following this rule the best rubber is obtained. Under the influence of the smoke the sap hardens. The fuel that makes the fire that makes the smoke is covered with ordinary palm nuts, which, when fired, give forth a dense smoke. In this smoke the worker holds the lump of sap or rubber on a kind of wooden paddle, turning it round and round until the operation is finished.

The lump of rubber is accumulated upon the end of the wooden paddle by first dipping it in the sap or milk, and then holding it in the smoke. After turning it round and round rapidly as described for a minute, the milk hardens. The worker again thrusts the paddle into the bowl of milk, and again he holds it in the smoke, repeating this process until a ball of crude rubber of the regulation size has been gathered. The Para Rubber Plantation Co. will ship thousands of these rubber hams, as we may call them, from Manaos. On the Company's property every tree is scrupulously cared for, and it is a fact known to science that if a rubber tree is not abused it will produce milk in abundance continuously for thirty or forty years.

The purposes of this Company are those of exploitation, trade and the opening up of their rubber lands. In the matter of exploitation, it is impossible to prophesy, for who can say what will be the limit of the natural resources of this vast tract of virgin rubber forest? In the matter of trade, the Company has this two-fold advantage: It has the opportunity to pay for labor in commodities, and for making a large profit on those commodities. This, of course, will result in lowering the cost of production. Even after labor is paid, it is a known fact that the cost of production of rubber is less than that of any other product save gold. Trading conditions are such, therefore, that the Rubber Company now under consideration can make handsome profits. Let one of the Company's ships take down, for example, one thousand dollars' worth of commodities, consisting of calicoes, flour, jewelry, beads, and factory-made clothing. This cargo of one thousand dollars' worth of commodities can be traded for many thousand dollars' worth of rubber or labor. The natives, indeed, would rather be paid in this way than in cash, as it suits them better, for of what avail is money in a region where there is nothing to buy?

The Company will establish stores for trading purposes, and at these stores the rubber gatherers will do their trading. Thus, while the laborer will receive a fair recompense, taking his pay in supplies purchased from the Company's stores, the system will afford a large profit for the Company, as no other traders can come within a competing distance. This is precisely the system that made the great Hudson Bay Trading Company the greatest Fur Company in the world; it was just this method of trading that laid the foundation of the great Astor fortune when John Jacob Astor, the first, established himself at Astoria.

What are the other conditions that promise a great future and profit for all interested in the rubber industry? First of all, there is a market for every pound of rubber that can be brought into this country or into Europe. Rubber never has to go a-begging. A million pounds, arriving unexpectedly any day, would find immediate sale without lowering the market price. Para rubber sells for 88 cents a pound, with immediate prospect of further advance, and by Para rubber is meant the product that comes from the Rubber Company in Venezuela as well as the rubber regions adjoining. And while Para rubber sells for 88 cents a pound, Central American and all other rubber brings only 50 cents. To produce this rubber it costs the Para Rubber Plantation Company less than 35 cents, so that the profit on each pound may be estimated at about 100 per cent. As already stated, the Company owns about six million trees. Each of these produces about five pounds of rubber, which would make for the entire property thirty million pounds a year — all of which facts convey some idea of the future for all who are interested in rubber, when that interest comes through a Company whose plans are on lines similar to those of the great Hudson Bay Trading Company. As for markets, even if the demand of American manufacturers should be entirely supplied at a given time, the manufacturers of Europe would at once outbid each other to secure the raw material. And as for the profits on rubber made through European channels, there is no better known instance of a fortune made than that accumulated by the King of the Belgians through his ownership of rubber forests in the Congo region in Africa.

With the foregoing outline of what the rubber industry is, and what relation the Para Rubber Plantation Co. bears to the rubber industry, it is the purpose of this article to inform the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST that a fortune has been spent in the preliminary operations by the Company. This money has been spent in the acquiring of the property and the establishment of camps and trading posts, and it is now the purpose of the Company to sell a limited amount of its treasury stock for further exploitation. The capital stock of the Company is $5,000,000, of which only a limited amount will be sold to the public. The stock will be sold at its par value of $10.00 a share, and application will be made to list it on the exchanges.

In view of the foregoing the officers of the Company feel that they are very conservative in assuring investors that present prospects warrant their looking forward to a dividend of at least 6 per cent. from the first year's earnings, and it will be seen at a glance that the natural available resources of the Company are such that this dividend should be immediately and largely increased.

We desire to emphasize that the above calculation of a 6 per cent. dividend is based on the employment of but two thousand men, but this number can be doubled and trebled, and the Company owns sufficient territory for the employment of forty thousand laborers. Two thousand laborers net 6 per cent., and there is room for the constant employment of forty thousand. The forty thousand are available. It is unnecessary to say more. The great immediate prospective value of the stock is apparent at a glance.

The officers of the Company are: PRESIDENT, JOHN CUDAHY, of the John Cudahy Company, Chicago; VICE-PRESIDENT, ALLEN T. HAIGHT, President Manhattan Terrace Company of New York; TREASURER, ELMER B. MARTIN, S. K. Martin Lumber Co., Chicago; SECRETARY, F. M. CRAWFORD, 52 Broadway, New York.

THE NEW MEMBER

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS
Committee to Elevate the Condition of Labor
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 31, 1902.

NOW at last I am a really, truly Member of Congress. I have sworn at the Speaker. Don't look shocked. In company with the other men who were elected last month to fill vacancies, I stood in front of Speaker Henderson's desk, and while our right hands were uplifted we heard him say something that sounded like: "You do solemnly swear to defend and support the Constitution." Each of us said, "I do," and that made us Members of Congress. Before, we were only members-elect; now we are members and may rightfully have M. C. put after our names.

Yes, I will admit I felt nervous, but no more so, you may be sure, than the others. There were three or four of us standing in what is called "the well," the open space in front of the Speaker's desk. There was General Henderson looking down at us from his heights as if he had nothing but supreme contempt and supreme disgust for the kindergarten class; if he had ordered us put in chains and carried off to jail I shouldn't have been at all surprised. But they tell me the Speaker is a "good fellow," overflowing with the milk of human kindness and Scotch wit, and perhaps some night before the end of the session I'll be fortunate enough to be at a dinner when the Speaker is in good trim, and I shall hear him sing his famous song, "There's a Hole in the Bottom of the Sea." It's worth while coming all the way from the Pacific Coast just to hear that one song, I am told.

I can't keep to my text because I've got so many things to tell you. I started out to give you an idea of how it feels to be sworn in, and here I've rambled off to dinners and songs. Well, to get back to the House. There was the Speaker looking very solemn, and on a tier below him were the clerks, and still below them the official stenographers. All around us were the members, chattering like a lot of schoolboys when the teacher has been called out of the room. Some of them were reading and some were writing, and there was a big bunch around "Joe" Cannon, who was evidently telling a funny story, because they were all laughing as if they enjoyed it immensely. "Uncle Joe," as most people call him in Washington, will be the next Speaker, and a Speaker's stories, like Royalty's jests, must always be laughed at.

The Press and the Pygmy

I looked at the galleries and saw them crowded with men and women; and over the Speaker's head was the press gallery full of men. Talk of avenging angels! I can now understand how a man feels at the judgment seat.

You remember meeting Senator Graham at the State convention? The day after I arrived I went to call upon the Senator. "Turner," he said, in his sarcastic way, "I suppose you think you're going to save the nation and that the country is sitting up nights waiting to hear your views. Well, whenever you feel an attack of that kind coming on just take a glance at this; you can have it; better have it framed and hung up in your room where you can see it every morning when you get up." The old man chuckled sardonically as he put in my hands a newspaper.

There was a cartoon of a very big and "chesty" man striking a grandiloquent attitude and saying to an insignificant creature at his feet: "I decline to be interviewed, but the Banner may state my position on the tariff," and underneath was the inscription: "The new member the day after election; fancy pictures the press at his feet." Below this was another picture—a big man with a big notebook, with the supercilious and haughty look of a hotel clerk at a fashionable summer resort, and bowing and cringing to him the Member of Congress, who is saying: "Please, Mr. Correspondent, dear, good, kind Mr. Correspondent, won't you be so kind as to put my name in the Banner," and underneath this was the inscription: "The new member the day after arriving in Washington; he learns the power of the press."

I guess Senator Graham knows.

Here I am still standing in "the well." I must make a short job of it and come to the surface right away. The member of the kindergarten class next to me was Captain A. P. Gardner, of Massachusetts, who succeeds

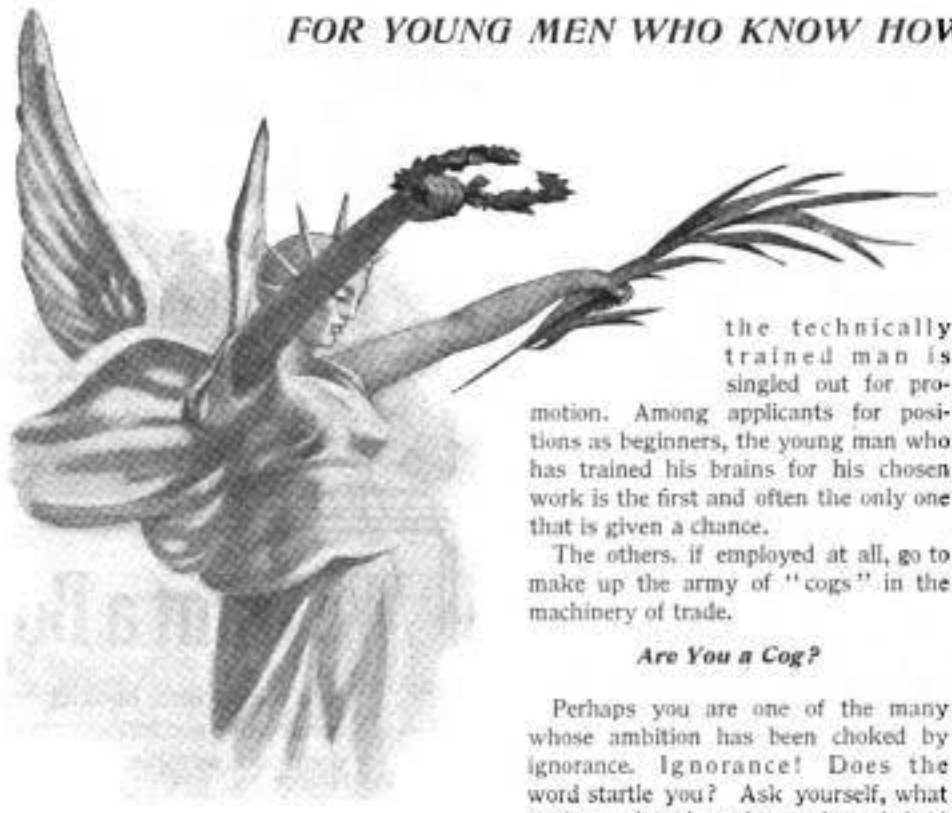
Mr. Moody, who resigned to enter the Cabinet as Secretary of the Navy. Captain Gardner is one of the lucky new members. He is young, immensely wealthy and the son-in-law of Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts, and Senator Lodge is pretty nearly the whole thing in Washington since his bosom friend, Theodore Roosevelt, became President. Senator Lodge rides and drives and walks with the President; when he isn't dining at the White House the President is dining at his house. They say that Mr. Lodge has more influence with the President than any member of the Cabinet or any other Senator, and that all Mr. Lodge has to do to get a place for a friend is simply to ask for it, as the President refuses him nothing. This has made some Senators frightfully jealous, I am told. It seems strange, doesn't it, to think that great men, our statesmen, the men who rule the country, can be so small and petty? But when a man gets to be a Member of Congress, like an actor he wants to occupy the centre of the stage all the time, and is always suspicious that some other member of the cast will be given too much "fat."

Every politician wants to go higher. Every Representative wants to be a Senator, every Senator wants to be President. Washington is just bubbling over with pure patriots, willing to sacrifice themselves on their country's altar whenever the altar is erected in the White House. We are the most unselfish set of men you ever saw, or ever dreamed of. We love our country so dearly that we are always willing to serve it (when we can serve it in Congress, the Cabinet or the White House) at somebody's else expense. I wonder whether at one and the same time a man can be a patriot and draw a salary? Senator Lodge, they say, expects to be made the President's political heir. Pleasant talk this, as you can imagine, for Senator Fairbanks, Secretary Shaw and the other men who have hopes.

Now consider me sworn in and back in my seat in the last row. I suppose you think now that I am a Member of Congress I have made a speech, and that the whole House listened to what I had to say with rapt attention. Another illusion shattered!

You remember when we read Balzac together how interested we were in A Distinguished Provincial at Paris and Lost Illusions. When I come home next spring we will write a novel which I shall name The Lost Illusions of a Distinguished Pacific Coaster in Washington (I like the title for its brevity!), in which we shall show how different the real thing is from the imaginary. I have looked so often at that engraving in father's library of Henry Clay making his great speech that I imagined when a Member of Congress spoke every other member was as quiet as if he were in church. As a matter of fact no one cares a continental what any one says, and no one pays the least attention. Members sit at their desks and read or write (just as I am doing now), or swap yarns, and when they get tired of that they go off into the cloak-rooms and smoke and tell more stories. It's only a great man on a great occasion whose speech is listened to. All the rest, the small fry, simply talk for the benefit of their constituents so that they can get their names in their home papers and have their speeches reported in the Congressional Record, copies of which they can send to the people at home. I haven't been able to do that yet, I am sorry to say.



How the Congressional "Plebe" Likes It

In Washington speeches as well as kisses go by favor. I thought it would be easy enough to get up and say my say whenever I felt like it, but I am wiser now. Before a member can speak he must be "recognized" by the Speaker or have an arrangement with the chairman of the committee having charge of the measure under consideration. A new member isn't of much account in Washington. He is a good deal of a fellow in his own district, especially immediately after election, because there is only one of him at a time, and his constituents really think he has something to say about making the laws and ruling the country, but down here in Washington there's a whole heap of him, and a man must be well up to the top to count for anything. We new fellows are like the plebes at the Military Academy. We've got to say "sir," and salute our superiors and old members, and how they do love to make us feel our inferiority!

I thought I should have a chance to make a speech when I introduced my bill to establish a uniform system of divorce in all the States of the Union. You know how much time I gave to the preparation of that bill, how we talked it over with Judge Weston and Doctor

The Hour of Opportunity

FOR YOUNG MEN WHO KNOW HOW TO DO THINGS

There is a tide in the affairs of men.
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.
—Shakespeare.

TODAY is full of possibilities for the man of character and initiative. Never before in the history of this "Land of Opportunity" has the demand for brains and executive ability been so great—or so unsatisfied. In every department of the world's work men are wanted—men young, if not in years, in energy and enthusiasm, men who are filled with the strenuous spirit of the times, men prepared to do something and to do it now.

The demand for such men is unsatisfied, not because of a lack of willing workers, but because too few possess the special qualifications required nowadays, of those in authority.

Special Training, the Key to Success.

The world-supremacy of American manufactures and commerce is due to the work of trained specialists, under the direction of men, who by long experience and unremitting study of their work, have become recognized experts. But the supply of such specialists has not kept pace with the need for them. A prominent builder of machine tools, in a letter requesting the Students' Aid Department of the International Correspondence Schools to help him secure the services of some technically trained men, wrote in part: "There is not much difficulty in obtaining average talent—but we must have men of superior ability. We find that the time to get a good man is when he presents himself, because when you really want him it is very difficult to find him." The condition existing in the broad field of mechanical engineering is typical of that prevailing in all other lines of industry. Too many depend wholly on "rule-o-thumb" methods and their own experience. Such men are debarred from advancement above the hundreds of their fellows of equal experience and ability.

In engineering or in business, when positions of responsibility become vacant, the technically trained man is singled out for promotion. Among applicants for positions as beginners, the young man who has trained his brains for his chosen work is the first and often the only one that is given a chance.

The others, if employed at all, go to make up the army of "cogs" in the machinery of trade.

Are You a Cog?

Perhaps you are one of the many whose ambition has been choked by ignorance. Ignorance! Does the word startle you? Ask yourself, what is the cash value of your knowledge? Ability to read and write and calculate, honesty, willingness to work, etc., are not passes to promotion, but prerequisites for employment. Do you know anything that is not the common knowledge of all? Can you do anything that others cannot do?

If you do not know and cannot do what the world is bidding for, are you not essentially ignorant?

You Can Succeed.

Because your work and the necessity of earning a living prevents you from attending a technical or business college you are not debarred from obtaining the mental equipment required for entrance into, or advancement in, your chosen profession.

The International Correspondence Schools can train you at home, in your spare time, and at small expense, for the position or profession of your choice.

No other single agency in the whole country has contributed so much to the success of the American people as has this institution. During the eleven years since its inception over half a million men and women have eagerly grasped the opportunity it offers for escape from low-waged toil. Each month ten thousand more join this army of ambitious workers.

Will you?

The I. C. S. is ready and able to help you if you will help yourself.

How the I. C. S. Helps.

To illustrate how the International Correspondence Schools are helping ambitious people, consider these cases, selected at random from among hundreds of others:

John C. Tibbetts, a telegraph operator, became dissatisfied with his work and aspired to become an architect. When he enrolled in the I. C. S. he "knew nothing of drawing or the profession of architecture." The Schools not only taught him architectural drawing and the principles of building design and construction, but placed him in touch with a well-known architect, who offered him a partnership. Mr. Tibbetts accepted, and became one of the firm of Lyons & Tibbetts, Architects, Fairmount, W. Va.

Robert W. Brodman, of 22 Second Ave., College Point, N. Y., tells his story very clearly and convincingly in the following letter to the Schools:

"When I took up the I. C. S. training in electrical engineering I was an apprentice in an electrical instrument-making establishment. As I proceeded with my studies, I advanced in my work and soon raised myself to be instrument maker. Later, I accepted a better paying position as a designer of arc lamps. Here I advanced very rapidly and was soon put in charge of the testing room. I left this place to accept a position as electrician on the Long Island Railroad's trolley line at Rockaway Beach, and a month later was placed in charge. My salary is now seven times as much as when I enrolled."

It will be noted that while Mr. Tibbetts was dissatisfied and changed his occupation, Mr. Brodman stuck to his original line of work and steadily advanced to the top. The conditions varied greatly, but the I. C. S. showed each his opportunity and helped him win.

One more very interesting experience was that of M. E. Hoag, a dentist, of Maxwell, Iowa. Not content with the limitations of his practice, he determined to cultivate his mechanical talents, so enrolled in the I. C. S. for instruction in drawing. While studying he earned considerable money making mechanical drawings for local concerns. About the time he completed the Course, the Schools secured for him the position of chief draftsman with the Smith Metallic Packing Co., 861 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Ill., at a salary of $100 per month and expenses. He writes: "I believe that any man who will take up a Course with the I. C. S., and will follow instructions, will have no trouble in doing the work, and will better his position in a short time. Any one of ordinary intelligence can succeed."

What Position Do You Want?

The business of the I. C. S. is to help people advance. What help do you need? If you desire expert advice on the best method of increasing your earning power the I. C. S. can give it, without cost to you. The value of this advice can be judged by reading the experiences of over a thousand successful students, as set forth in a booklet, "1001 Stories of Success," sent on request.

Write for it today. Tell the Schools your ambition. Cut out, fill in, and mail the coupon now.

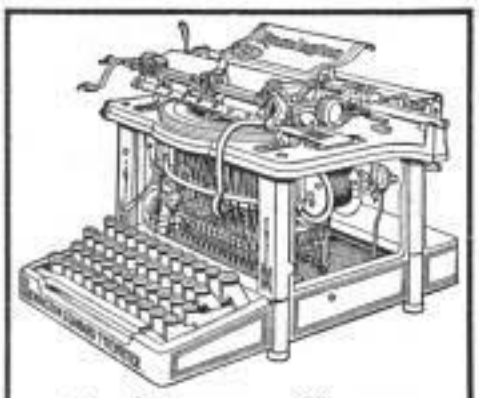
EAT SLOW

Means Chew Fast, Fine and Hard but Swallow Slow

"Across the table sat a young man," remarked an old gentleman from New Albany, Ind., recently, "with a sickly face, who was slowly chewing in a fashion which led me to believe that his teeth were all in such condition that if he should forget himself and bite a little bit harder, off would fly the top of his head. Finally I remarked:—

'You have to be very careful of them?'

'Yes, indeed,' he replied, 'I have no stomach. My doctor told me to eat slow. No odds what your hurry may be,' said he, 'eat slow.'



'You misunderstood him,' said I, 'what the doctor meant was to chew fast, fine and hard but to swallow slowly. Now you are actually committing suicide, the doctor meant for you to use your teeth. Are your teeth all right?'

'Yes,' he replied, 'I can bite through sole leather. I wonder if the doctor did mean that I should chew hard instead of slow?'

Then I told him of my experience in the food line. I'm a pretty old man now but, like a good many other people, my stomach went back on me one time and I commenced to study food and the requirements of the body. After experimenting a good deal I came across Grape-Nuts and was soon convinced that this food met all the requirements of health and as a daily diet is indispensable.

I am not a doctor but it is easy to understand that the great change from my former condition to my present good health and ability, at the age of 67, to walk 25 miles a day, if so inclined, is due solely to Grape-Nuts and the proper nourishment my body has received from this valuable food.

The crispness of Grape-Nuts gives the teeth sufficient action to keep them in good condition; its taste is delicious and the way it is prepared corrects any digestive trouble a person may have. I know my lease of life has been renewed for a term of years by its use." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Lawton, who showed it to some of the other pastors, who all said that it was exactly the kind of legislation Congress ought to pass, and ever so much better than wasting its time talking about the tariff and the trusts. You remember Judge Weston said there could not be a single legal objection raised, and that he should be very much surprised if Congress did not pass the bill without changing it in the least particular. That encouraged me and I prepared a speech, my maiden speech, that I believed would make the House understand that we men of the West have given some thought to the great questions of the day.

Judge Lancaster is the senior member of our delegation, and I asked him how I should go about it to get my bill before the House and make my speech. He is chairman of the Committee on Interstate Divorce, which is the committee to which my bill has been sent, and Gaines, of West Virginia, who is a good fellow and serving his first term, which makes him have some sympathy for a man as new as I am, put me up to the dodge of seeing the chairman of the committee.

"I tell you what it is, Turner," he said, "you can't do anything here unless you stand in with the chairman of your committee. Let's see, who's your chairman?" and then we went to consult a Congressional Directory.

"Whew," he whistled as he turned over the pages and his eye fell on the name he was looking for.

I didn't like that whistle. "What's the matter?" I asked.

"Oh, nothing," said Gaines laughing; "I just had a funny thought."

I could see his "funny thought" had something to do with my bill, so I pressed him, and finally he said:

The Most Unpopular Member

"Well, I'll tell you a story that seems to fit your case. You remember Holman, of Indiana, who was in Congress long before our day? Marsh, of Maryland, who served with him, told me the story last session and he declares it to be true. Holman, you know, was called 'the Watch-Dog of the Treasury' and 'the Great Objector,' because he always objected to the passage of bills that appropriated money, which made him the most unpopular man in the House, but Holman didn't seem to care in the slightest about that, and if he couldn't kill a bill in one way he could in another. There was a young fellow from Illinois serving his first term who knew he was going to have a terrific fight for renomination, and whose only chance was to secure the passage of a bill for the erection of a public building at the county-seat. Half a dozen times he had attempted to pass the bill only to meet with the stereotyped 'I object' from Holman. It got to be very near the end of the session and the man from Illinois was desperate.

"Then one evening he called on Holman. He frankly told him that unless he got that public building he might just as well go right out and leave his order with the undertaker.

"The old man looked dreadfully sympathetic. Although he chewed tobacco he rarely expectorated, but he kept up a constant movement of his lips and punctuated every second word by pressing his tongue against his lips as if he were expelling the air, which made a sound like 'tph.' 'Afraid you'll be—tph—beaten; too bad, too bad—tph—wouldn't have that—tph—tph—happen for the world—tph,' and then he went on to tell him that out of the goodness of his heart he would offer the bill himself next morning. The man from Illinois went away rejoicing.

"Next morning the man from Illinois went to the House early. There was Holman chewing and 'tphing' as usual.

"'Good-morning, Mr. Holman,' said the man from Illinois timidly, 'I hope——'

"'That's all right, young man—tph—tph; I sha'n't forget your bill.'

"When the proper time came, up got Mr. Holman and asked for the passage of the bill.

"The House could scarcely believe its eyes or its ears. Holman asking for the passage of a public building bill! It was incredible. Then it suddenly dawned upon the members that it was a bill for a building in Holman's district and here was a chance to get even, and the bill could be held up until Holman ceased his objections to other bills; so from all parts of the House came a chorus of:

"'I object.'

"'I object.'

"'I OBJECT.'

"'Mr. Speaker,' began Holman, but the Speaker cut him off curtly with, "Objection is made,' and that was the end of it. That was one way of helping a friend and killing a bill."

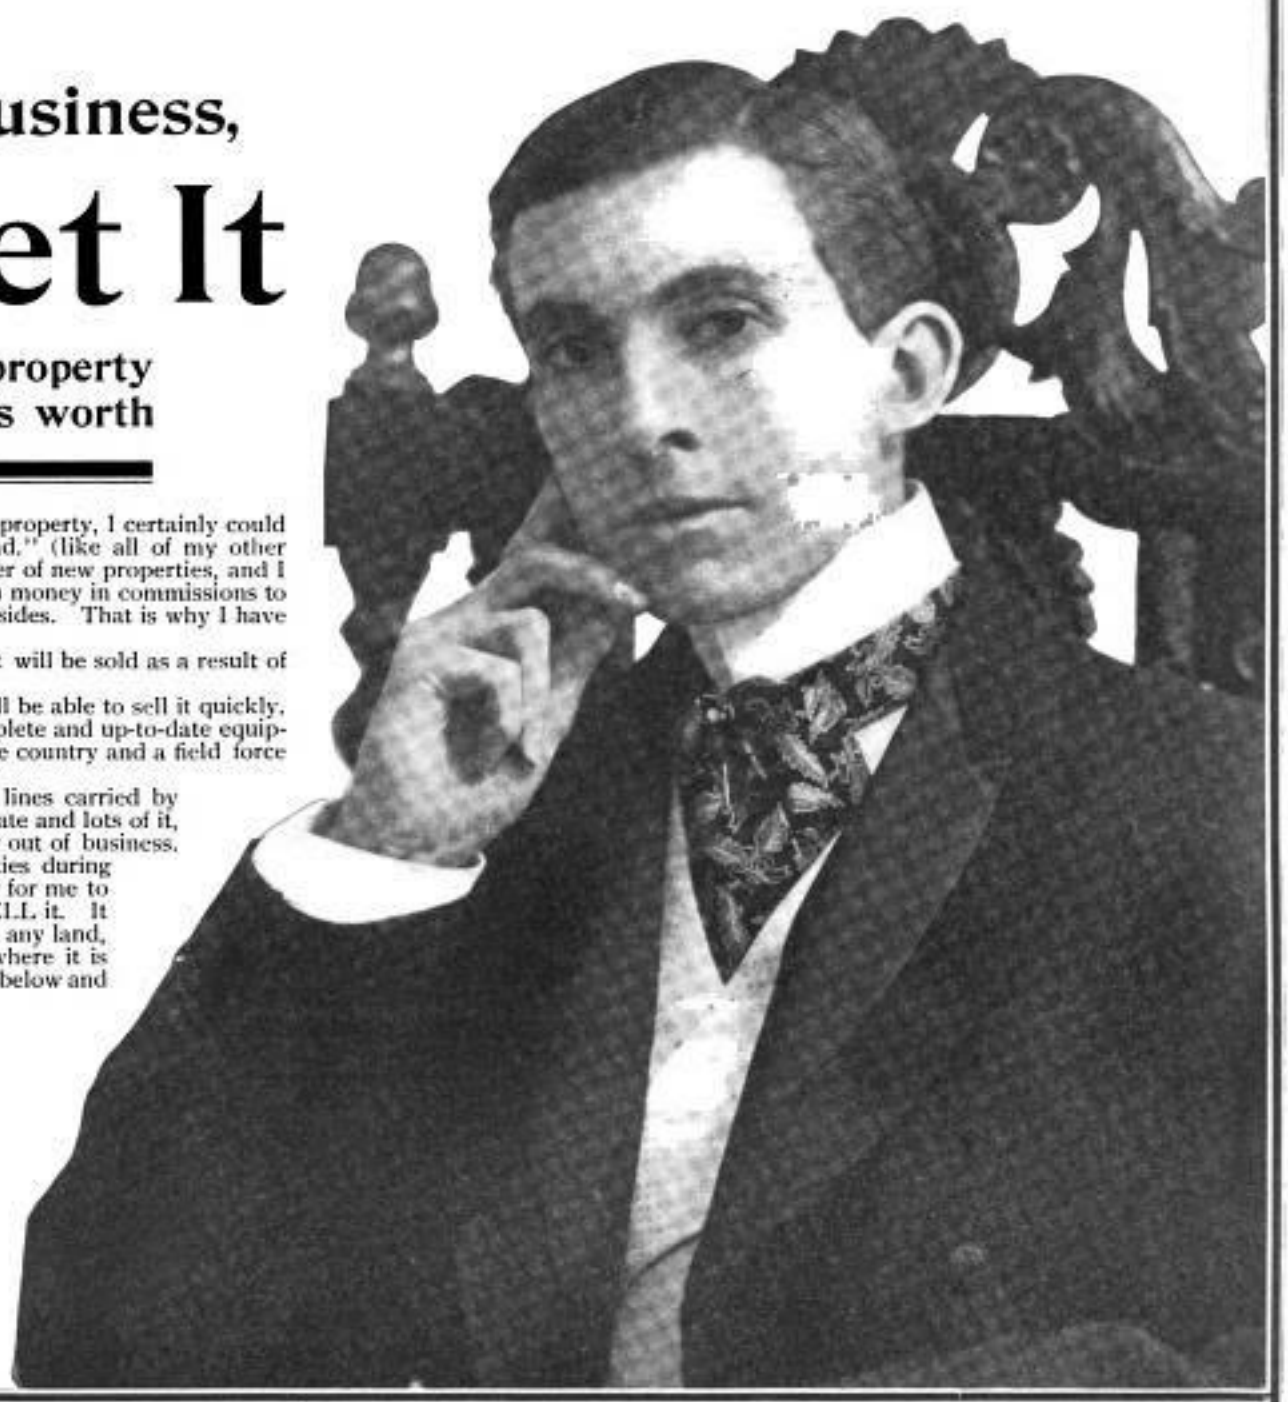
If You Want Cash

For Your Real Estate or Business,

I Can Get It

No matter where your property is located or what it is worth



IF I DID not have the ability and facilities to sell your property, I certainly could not afford to pay for this advertisement. This "ad." (like all of my other "ads.") is practically sure to place on my list a number of new properties, and I am just as sure to sell these properties and make enough money in commissions to pay for the cost of the "ad." and make a good profit besides. That is why I have the largest real estate business in the world to-day.

Why not put your property among the number that will be sold as a result of this "ad."?

I will not only be able to sell it,—sometime—but will be able to sell it quickly. I am a specialist in quick sales. I have the most complete and up-to-date equipment in the world. I have branch offices throughout the country and a field force of 2500 men to find buyers.

I do not make any money through the various side lines carried by the ordinary real estate agent. I MUST SELL real estate and lots of it, or go out of business. I can assure you I am not going out of business. On the contrary, I expect to sell twice as many properties during 1903 as I did during 1902, but it will first be necessary for me to "list" more properties. I want to list YOURS and SELL it. It doesn't matter whether you have a farm, a home without any land, or a business; it doesn't matter what it is worth or where it is located. If you will fill out the blank letter of inquiry below and mail it to me to-day, I will tell you how and why I can quickly convert your property into cash, and will give you my complete plan (free) and terms for handling it. The information I will give you will be of great value to you even if you should decide not to sell. You had better write to-day before you forget it.

If you want to buy any kind of a Farm, Home, or Business, in any part of the country, tell me your requirements. I will guarantee to fill them promptly and satisfactorily.

WHEN I tell you that I teach a different kind of exercise, something new, more scientific, more rational, safer, and immeasurably superior to anything ever before devised, I am but repeating what thousands of prominent men and women are saying for me who have profited by my instructions.

If you are not convinced from my previous advertising that my system of Physiological Exercise will do all that I claim for it, the fault is in the advertising and not in the system itself.

What is so strong as the testimony of others?

Mr. J. Logan Jones, Vice-Pres. and Secy. of Jones Dry Goods Co., of Kansas City, Mo., after years of gradual but certain decline physically and mentally, had a complete collapse. It was impossible for him to sleep without medicine and he went without natural sleep for the period of about ten months. He tried the best physicians to be had, traveled almost constantly, being unable to remain long in one place; took hunting trips in Colorado and a sea-coast trip to Northern Maine, with no appreciable results. The following is an extract from a recent letter to me: "A little over ten months ago I took my first exercise from you, and under the circumstances consider the transformation a positive miracle. Will say that I am getting to be quite a giant. I weigh more than I have ever weighed in my life, and my muscular development is something wonderful. I sleep soundly, my digestion is good, cathartics no longer necessary, and do more work than I ever did in my life and enjoy it all the time." What could be more convincing, and do you wonder that he is enthusiastic? I could name hundreds of others who have received similar results, but it would not make the system any better. But if you will follow my instructions for a few weeks I promise you such a superb muscular development and such a degree of vigorous health as to forever convince you that intelligent direction of muscular effort is just as essential to success in life as intelligent mental effort. No pupil of mine will need to digest his food with pepsin nor assist nature with a dose of physic. I will give you an appetite and a strong stomach to take care of it; a digestive system that will fill your veins with rich blood; a strong heart that will regulate circulation and improve assimilation; a pair of lungs that will purify your blood; a liver that will work as nature designed it should; a set of nerves that will keep you up to the standard of physical and mental energy. I will increase your nervous force and capacity for mental labor, making your daily work a pleasure. You will sleep as a man ought to sleep. You will start the day as a mental worker must who would get the best of which his brain is capable. I can promise you all of this because it is common-sense, rational, and just as logical as that study improves the intellect.

I have no book, no chart, no apparatus whatever. My System is for each individual; my instructions for you would be just as personal as if you were my only pupil. It is taught by mail only and with perfect success, requires but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

I SHALL be pleased to send you free valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, upon application. This information which I furnish free is very interesting and cannot be secured elsewhere at any price. Write at once.

JUSTICE HARLAN

MORE fully convinced every day of my life that we human beings have existed in some previous state and that the Slocums, Robert and I, far back in a primitive age must have been homing pigeons. I am led to this belief from the remarkable similarity of our rapid and unerring flight each year from Spruce City back to Washington, and furthermore, no one of the feathered tribe could feel more delight at the home stretch than I when I catch my first glimpse of the dome of the Capitol as we round the curves of the track this side of Bennings.

It is said that Jupiter laughed for seven days after he was born, and I have a fellow-feeling for him, for I have laughed for seven days after getting back here, and finally even Robert was sufficiently distracted from his concern over the Statehood bill and his plans for reforming the tariff to remark:

"Well, Agatha, in your beatitude you no doubt would echo the blessing which the Reverend Dick Harlan pronounced at the gala dinner given to his father the other night."

"Indeed I would," said I, not having an idea what that blessing was, although Robert, who had attended the dinner, had told of all the other brilliant sayings and doings.

"Usually," said Robert, "one is deadly afraid of the invocations and of the tendency to 'slop' over, but the Reverend Dick arose and said, 'For good health, good friends, good cheer, Good God, make us ever truly thankful,' and sat down."

"He should have had a medal. Didn't they applaud?" I asked, feeling that that blessing would have been my own.

"They wanted to, and Judge D—— said to me, 'It is evident that Justice Harlan did not keep all the brains in his family.'

"I tell you what, Agatha," Robert continued, "that dinner was a rattling occasion. I never heard such speeches in my life, beginning with the President's with his tribute to the South, and ending with Mr. Perry's speech for the Washington Bar. When Brewer spoke, for he is a wag, you know, he said: 'Harlan never goes to bed without having one hand on the Bible and the other on the Constitution,' and Judge D—— interpolated loud enough to be heard:

"'And with his golf sticks under his pillow.' You should have heard the laugh that went up from our end of the room."

"Well, Robert," I said impressively, feeling that my time had come to speak of what lay so near my heart, "a town that can bring together continually so many brilliant men and women is the town for the Slocums to live in permanently. I want to build a marble palace here, one something like Mrs. Scott T——'s famous French one, which everybody admires. You see, Robert," I hurried on, for I saw signs of stress on Robert's face, "I speak of this house because it is one of the great signs of progress in the town."

I pronounced progress as though it were spelled with a big P. Robert groaned out:

"What's the matter with the house we've got? I had been in hopes, Agatha, that when we turned our backs on our tanneries, and had a seat in the United States Senate, a French cook and a new diamond fender, that you would be contented for a year or two, but——"

Robert would persist in calling my new diamond tiara a fender because it was shaped something after the pattern of a nursery fender.

"But, Robert," I protested, "our befluted Schneider house has already filled its mission. If we are to keep up with the holiday procession in this greater Washington, and if we are to live up to the newly bedizened White House, with the trend of the Administration and the smart set generally, we must have a marble palace of our own. We must progress with the rest——"

"Bother," said Robert testily; "progress is a disease in America; if we don't find the germ and kill it, it will kill us. I wonder you don't say you want to copy the Patent Office and done with it——"

I knew in my innermost heart that Robert's own idea of a fine dwelling was the one General Corbin has just built and which looms up in the northwestern section of the town much as an ocean liner looms up on the crest of a wave. I knew, moreover, that, in reality, Robert is deadly afraid to build a home here, in spite of the successful example of Senators Hale and Foraker, for he is fully persuaded that his constituents might take it into their heads to cut off his Senatorial toga close under his chin, just as Senator Van Wyck's was cut off some years ago because he elected to live in a corner house in a swagger section of the town, instead of going to a boarding-house on Capitol Hill.

I am going to suggest to our old friend Senator P—— the advisability of introducing a bill in Congress for supplying each seat in both Houses with a dwelling, to be built upon the classic lines of an adobe hut. This would forever allay the suspicions of, and heartburning among, Congressmen, and would make a fitting companion picture to the rows of tombs once in the Congressional Cemetery, which I am told were designed for, and do actually contain, defunct statesmen.

The truth is, I have drunk more deeply than Robert has of the "drowsy syrup" which renders one captive in this city. Indeed, it is commonly understood to be a condition that befalls nearly every one who comes here. As an instance of this, the first person we met on getting back was Captain J——, who to a certainty, when Congress adjourned last June, had been ordered to sea. Yet here he was still a landlubber. I said in surprise:

"What are you doing here? I thought you had been ordered, like Dickens' little Joe, to 'move on.'"

"I was told to 'move on,'" he laughed, "but I made out a strong case to the Secretary and persuaded him that I was more earnestly needed at the Bureau of Navigation than at sea. The correct reading of the situation is, Mrs. Slocum, that we old sailors cannot bear to leave Washington. It is a veritable Fiddler's Green to us."

"Fiddler's Green," echoed I, "and what might Fiddler's Green be?"

"Oh, you just ask any old salt what Fiddler's Green is, and he'll know even if he cannot tell you its origin. It is the sailor's Elysium. A land of perpetual mirth, music, dancing and tobacco—a sort of land o' the leal."

This chimed in exactly with my own feeling, and I was glad to fall in with Captain J——, for man though he was he would be likely to have most of the news of the town at his tongue's end; for who, save a deaf mute, could belong to both the Metropolitan and the Army and Navy Clubs, to say nothing of the Navy Department, and not be, like old Samuel Pepys, a "prince of gossips"?

"What's the news?" queried I with eager interest.

He stroked his chin thoughtfully and said:

"Firstly, you know we have lost Wu?"

"Yes, I knew he had been recalled," I said regretfully.

"Before he went he gave some of us an impromptu dance at the Legation, with spirited illustrations of his recent visit to a medium, where Chinese spooks appeared to him and wrote him spook letters in Chinese, which he thought was the most wonderful of all the things that he had seen Americans do. I asked him if he really believed it?

"'Ah,' he said, looking wise and mysterious. 'The American goes ahead of the Chinese in some things, and we have an old proverb in my country that says, "One needs a long spoon to eat with the devil."'"

Robert and I were much amused at this thrust from the Orient. Captain J—— continued:

"And Mr. Merou, the Argentine Minister, was making a study of our voting methods at the polls over in Baltimore, election day, and summed it up thus:

"'Your system is much like the system in my country. Perhaps we use more of the pistol than you do, and have more slain at the end of the day than you have votes, but in the main it is much the same.'

"And the Belgian Minister, Baron Moncheur, has set quite a new fashion in pets. He has just purchased at the recent cat show here a handsome yellow tiger cat, which his secretary has installed at the Legation, and which has caused the Persian Minister, Isaac Kahn, to tell his famous cat story of the cat of Kashan that nearly broke up his nation, and——" Captain J—— paused to think.

"Oh, yes, Director Roberts, of the Treasury Department, has scored a triumph. After months of search he has at length found the profile view of the President's face, and the usual Presidential medal of bronze is to be struck. This will complete the Presidential medals. They each sell for two dollars, save John Adams', which goes at one fifty——"

As he stopped I spurred him on.

"But the White House, what's been going on over there?"

"Nothing but its almost total destruction," he said tersely, "and the efforts of officials who have the work in hand to hatch that handsome, dubious egg which George Eliot calls 'Possibility.' Been over there yet, Mrs. Slocum?"

"Yes, and I saw all of Aladdin's wonders, even Aladdin's palace windows. You know, of course, about Aladdin's windows?" I asked, raising my eyebrows.

"Yes," responded the Captain. "They were set around with diamonds, weren't they? Did you see the Red Room?" he asked.

I nodded.

"Well?" There was challenge in this interrogative.

"Well," I echoed, trying to think of a comparison. "That room seemed to me to be a regular conflagration in still life. I could think of nothing but our prairie land out West when it is all on fire. It is a room that would bring joy to an Apache Chief, and with all those red velvet walls and that red leather furniture will surely make every woman who enters it wonder if she is not, after all, a descendant of poor Lo!"

"And for the rest?" the Captain went on.

"Oh, for the rest," said I seriously, "I could only take comfort by remembering that 'It is to live twice when one can enjoy the recollections of former things.'"

"I think," said the Captain with the first tone of approval he had shown, "that the State dining-room as it now is is a fine room, with its old English oak paneling, its tapestries, and——"

"And," said I interrupting, "I verily believe that whoever put those tapestries there knew that the President's guests would spend most of their time trying to decipher the four-line texts in old English. I could not make out one syllable, and I am going to ask Colonel Bingham if he had them hung there designedly. But," said I, "honestly, it was something of a shock to me, this new White House. There is not a familiar object, nor a familiar outline left. There are now bare open spaces where once were solid walls, and doors and windows that are surprises. It is all new varnish, gilding and buff frescoing. I sighed for the old Tiffany screens and for the old tubs of palms that used to stand like sentinels in the corridor, and I could have embraced the Milton shield if I could have found it anywhere——"

"Pshaw," broke in Robert, "all the changes in the mansion are nothing to the misfits over in the new executive offices. I've been over there and already sampled the sitting qualities of the furniture in the reception-room, and it isn't a patch on that old sofa with the sunken springs that used to be up in the corridor, you remember, Captain?"

The Captain nodded appreciatively.

"And, by George," continued Robert with gusto, "there are so many entrances and exits that a chap doesn't know where he came in nor where he is going out, and the surprise is continual of finding one's self suddenly out in the cold world, for every door seems to open outward. I'll be hanged if I see how the newspaper men are going to get along this winter. They won't have any way of knowing who comes or goes, and they won't be sure even that the President is there half the time. I asked Dave B——, of the Firmament, how they meant to manage.

"'Dogged if I know,' he said with a weary smile, 'unless we play a sort of game of ring-around-the-rosy about the entire building whenever any big job is on, and even then, ten to one we'll miss our man.'

"Oh, it will be a grand old game of hide-and-seek this session," laughed Robert, who has no particular ax to grind, and nothing this winter on hand but his usual solicitude for the Constitution and his desire to tinker the tariff, and therefore could afford to laugh at the newspaper fraternity.

"Poor Bingham has had his hands full," said Captain J—— commiseratingly. "He hasn't had a minute's peace since all this building and remodeling began, and all this fall every time he has tried to settle down to work comfortably a telephone message would go vibrating all over town:

"'We can't find the eight long mirrors that belong in the East Room. Ask Colonel Bingham if he knows where they are.'

"Or, 'Does anybody know where the malachite clock is?' Or, 'We've mislaid the vases sent by the Mikado of Japan during President Arthur's administration; please ask Colonel Bingham where they were stored.'"

"And did they find all these things?" I asked with the instinct of the housekeeper.

Captain J—— shrugged his shoulders and said:

"Presumably! I have an idea, however, that some of those things will remain mislaid forever more. I know for a certainty that some of the old stuff has gone to the junk shops. One interesting thing turned up when the workmen were knocking out the wall of the old State dining-room: they came upon partly charred blocks of wood, to which door jambs had once been nailed. These charred blocks told the tale of the burning of the White House by the British in our War of 1812."

"I wonder," said I speculatively, "whether all the old portraits of the past Presidents are among the things that have gone to the junk shops?"

"Oh, no," the Captain began to laugh, then went on with his narrative of relics.

"The other day when I was passing the Corcoran Gallery of Art, Mr. M——, the artist, who is a great lover of a joke, beckoned me to come into the gallery. He asked me if I'd ever seen their Chamber of Horrors. Of course I had not nor ever heard of any outside Madame Tussaud's and the Eden Musée, but I went in. Mr. M—— noiselessly and mysteriously unlocked one of the rooms downstairs and I tiptoed in, for I fully expected something creepy, but lo! there in a long line on the floor, minus their frames, were all the dead and gone Presidents that had been sent over from the White House to the Corcoran Gallery for safe-keeping during the summer. Of course, I had to laugh when I appreciated the situation. There was that awful old portrait of George Washington with his feet drawn together in a regular one, two, three dancing-school attitude, and his mouth drawn up as though he were just about to whistle. And the one of Abraham Lincoln, the worst of the whole bunch, where he is represented grasping a chair, as though he would topple over if he did not hang on. The only really good portrait among them is the one of Martin Van Buren, by Healey——"

"But," I interrupted, "you are forgetting the one of General Washington by Gilbert Stuart."

"True, Mrs. Slocum, but did you never know that that particular portrait is only a copy of the original one done by Stuart? This one was painted from the original by Stuart's daughter Jane. Gilbert Stuart made only two portraits from life of Washington. One of these two was sent to England and the other was sent to the Boston Athenæum. I don't know whether it is still there or not. There are thirty-five copies of the famous original portrait, and all of them were done by Jane Stuart, though none of their possessors to-day can be persuaded of that fact."

This was news to me, and I recalled the many times I had been shown genuine Gilbert Stuart portraits of Washington. I asked:

"What are they going to do with these old portraits from the Chamber of Horrors?"

"Mrs. Roosevelt is going to have them hung somewhere in the White House; but it will be a case of 'though lost to sight, to memory dear.'"

"But surely," said I, "some voter will come and will resent their position."

"Oh, no, for Mrs. Roosevelt will diplomatically hang her own new portrait by Chartran among them, and the voter will be disarmed and——"

"Ah," said Robert, "a carrying out of the idea that criticism was meant originally as a standard of doing well?"

"Exactly," said the Captain, and he continued, "as for the picture of Watts' Love and Life, about which there is such a howl, I think the President is right to order it back to the White House, though the Director of the Corcoran Gallery is heart-broken at losing it. He said to me prophetically:

"'Just wait till these women begin to clamor around the President's ears and to make his life a burden, then perhaps we'll have it back again. Oh, I shall live in hopes of seeing Love and Life back here again.'"

"If the women should really bother the President about this picture," said Robert, "he might let it be known on the quiet that if they come around the White House in delegations, armed with petitions, he has prepared himself by taking a course of 'Jim Jitsu,' the Japanese method of self-defense, in which they say he is an adept."

"What is that?" I asked.

"Oh," broke in the Captain, "it is only a gentle way they have in Japan of taking a person by the coat collar and throwing him over one's head."

Mistaking the Person

By WILLIAM MATHEWS

ONE of the most common and yet one of the most dangerous practices in social intercourse is that of speaking publicly in censorious terms to a stranger of a person whom one has never seen. What can be more awkward or trying than, after you have been denouncing or ridiculing some public man or private citizen—racking the vocabulary, perhaps, for invective or satirical epithets—to learn accidentally, either on the spot or afterward, that the victim of your obloquy or sarcasm is the very person you have been addressing? In such a situation has many a careless talker, to his inexpressible confusion and mortification, found himself, who has never learned or acted upon the sage advice of a modern bard:

If your lips you'd save from slips,
Five things observe with care:
Of whom you speak, to whom you speak,
And how, and when, and where.

An amusing story used to be told of Benjamin Kennicott, D. D., a learned canon of Christ Church, Oxford, who died in that city in 1783. In 1776 he published a Hebrew Bible, in the preparation of which he, with able assistants, collated sixteen Samaritan and over six hundred Hebrew manuscripts. Soon after he began his labors he was traveling one day to Oxford in public stage-coach, when the conversation of the other passengers chanced to turn upon his critical labors. "What success are they likely to have?" asked one. "Not much," replied a second; "what can you expect from the son of a cobbler?" "I beg your pardon," said Kennicott, to the no small astonishment and confusion of his critic, who had never seen him before; "my father was always reckoned a good shoemaker, and never cobbled his work." This incident reminds us of Dr. William Carey, the celebrated Orientalist and missionary to India, Professor of the Sanscrit, Bengalee and Mahratta languages in the College of Fort William. Dining with the British Governor one day he overheard an officer at the table ask in a low tone if Mr. Carey did not begin life as a shoemaker. "No, sir," quietly observed the latter; "I began as a cobbler."

A barrister once extolled Edmund Kean to his face, saying many things which tickled the ears of the great actor, especially the praises of his comic personations. When the barrister spoke of his circuit, Kean asked: "Pray, were you ever at the theatre in Exeter?" "Yes," was the reply, "and I saw there an ugly, croaking little wretch of an actor, playing the very part in which you so much excel." "That actor, sir," said Kean, "was your humble servant." Here was a most awkward situation; but with the presence of mind, readiness and adroitness of a veteran practitioner, the barrister extricated himself by exclaiming: "Is it possible, sir, that you should have improved so much, in every particular, in so short a time?" Reynolds, the dramatist, tells that once when he was witnessing the performance of his own tragedy, "Werter," in the theatre, a gentleman in the adjoining seat turned to him and said: "Did you ever hear such wretched stuff? If you will help to hiss and damn the play you shall have my hearty support."

Charles Dickens tells of an amusing incident in his experience, which shows how dangerous it is to affect a knowledge of famous persons when they are alive to contradict you. He rode in a railway train with a clergyman, who discoursed a long time to his fellow-passengers upon the novelist's weaknesses and failings. "Dickens is an atheist, sir, as I happen to know. He is a gambler also, and, I regret to say, drinks." "Dear me, how sad," said the person thus traduced. "Have you ever seen him drunk?" "Well, not exactly drunk; but certainly overtaken by liquor." "Have you ever seen him sober?" "Well, that is too much to say—Oh, yes; I have seen him sober." "Often?" "Yes, often." "No, sir, only once," responded the novelist. "You see him now for the first time."

Many persons who are familiar with Washington as it was fifty years ago will remember the National Hotel in that city when it was under the management of Mr. Guy, who had also a hotel in Baltimore. Guy resembled in physiognomy and general appearance Lewis Cass. General Cass was one of Guy's guests. The landlord not only looked singularly like General Cass, including his wart, but dressed like him. One day a Western gentleman, who was a patron of the National, entered the hotel and stepping into the office encountered General Cass quietly standing there. Mistaking the Senator for Guy, he slapped him on the shoulder and exclaimed: "Well, old fellow, here I am. The last time I hung up my hat in your shanty one of your clerks sent me up to the fourth story; but now I insist on a lower room."

Astonished at this startling salute, the General, who was a very dignified personage, coldly replied: "You have committed a mistake, sir. I am not Mr. Guy; I am General Cass, of Michigan." Thereupon he turned angrily away. Of course the Western man was shocked at his unconscious rudeness; but, before he had recovered from his mortification at the blunder, his victim, who had passed around the office, confronted him again, when, again mistaking him for Guy, the Westerner faced him and said: "Well, here you are, at last! I have just made a terrible mistake! Will you believe it?—I met old Cass, and mistook him for you, and I am afraid the Michigander has gone off mad." What General Cass would have replied to this second assault is not easily imagined; but, fortunately for the offender, the real Guy now approached and rescued him from any wrathful explosion of the twice-angered statesman.

A severe reproof was once administered to an Englishman by a Dutchman whom, on account of his facility in speaking English without the slightest foreign accent, the former had mistaken for a countryman of his. Asked what he thought of Holland, the Englishman replied: "I felt, on quitting it, very much like exclaiming with Voltaire: 'Adieu, canaux, canards, canaille!'" "Do you know another sarcastic saying of Voltaire about the English?" retorted the Dutchman. "He says, 'Les Anglais ont toute la dureté de leur acier, sans le poli.'"

AT L'APPEL DU MATIN

"WHAT DOES IT MEAN?" DEMANDED THE ASTOUNDED DESFORGES

By M. E. M. Davis

A STORY OF OLD NEW ORLEANS IN WHICH EVERY ONE WAS BLIND BUT LOVE

THERE were, it is true, other young ladies of the French Quarter who had been honored with a request from Père Moriguet to faire la quête at the Cathedral St. Louis that Sunday morning after mass. But public interest was unquestionably focused upon Mademoiselle Alixe Colombe. For this there were several reasons: Mademoiselle Colombe was high-born, she was young, she was rich—though this indeed counted for little among the spectators—she was charming—which counted for much, and she was beautiful. Notwithstanding all these, the chief reasons were, and had been from the very first—Felix Chavannes and Allard De Gruy.

A group of young men gathered without the entrance to the church discussed the situation in subdued but animated tones.

"She will choose Felix," declared Desforges with conviction; "that sees itself as plainly as the spire on the cathedral, or General Jackson yonder on his war-horse."

"Nonsense!" cried Le Beau. "Let Felix go drown himself in the Mississippi! He has about as much chance as Bergeron here has of squeezing through the gates of Paradise!"

"I wish I were as sure of a welcome from St. Peter as I am of Chavannes' success," retorted Bergeron.

"Aha? Then, what will you bet?" demanded Raynal, whipping notebook and pencil out of his pocket.

A hushed babel of intermingling exclamations stirred the air. "A supper at Antoine's against ——"

"Done!"

"A stall at the French Opera for next season."

"Taken!"

"A box of bonbons for Mademoiselle Alixe."

"A breakfast at Lake Ponchartrain."

"A fête champêtre at the Jockey Club in honor of Mademoiselle Colombe."

"Two to one on Allard!"

"Odds in favor of Felix!"

The disputants laughed, gesticulated, and even swore a little, good-naturedly, under breaths. Suddenly a bell tinkled within the church—a clear, small, insistent sound that clove the confusion like a simitar. Instantly all heads were bared and a respectful silence fell upon the wranglers.

The morning was at its prime; the towering spires and the gray old façade of the Cathedral St. Louis were bathed in the golden sunshine of early April; the great Pontalba buildings flanking the Place d'Armes flamed crimson against a turquoise sky; the low roofs of the French Market beyond shimmered silver-green in the dazzling light; the Square itself was a mass of glowing color—hollyhocks, bluets and poppies abloom in the prim beds, roses trellising the borders, children in gay frocks and nurses in multi-colored tignons dotting the white-shelled walks; in the midst of all, General Jackson erect on his bronze steed fringed about with Russian violets.

The church, inside, crowded with worshipers, was in accord with this scheme of light and color; the sunlight pouring through the tall stained-glass windows interlaced the dusky aisles with streamers and gonfalons of red, purple and blue; the chancel was starred with myriads of lighted candles and bright with the kaleidoscopic movements of bishop, priest and altar-boy in gorgeous vestments: all this seemed to blend with the stately fresco in the wall above—a part and parcel of the magnificent Court of St. Louis the Crusader.

The congregation, too familiar with all these details to note them even with careless eyes, craned eager heads forward at the close of the sermon. The fateful moment had arrived!

For several months the beau monde of the French Quarter had been assisting at what might be called a joust-at-arms between Felix Chavannes and Allard De Gruy. The combatants so far had been equally matched. If the one sat in the opera-box of Mademoiselle Colombe last night, the other assuredly would thread with her to-night the mazes of a mid-winter cotillon; if the white roses of Monsieur Chavannes filled at a Tuesday soirée her whiter arms, the red roses of Monsieur De Gruy at a Wednesday matinée musicale smiled up from her lap at her redder lips; if she cut daintily the leaves of a volume of poems sent in this forenoon by Allard, this afternoon with the same inscrutable smile she untied the ribbons from about Felix's box of marrons glacées. The wagers offered and taken but now at the church door were not the first by many which had been freely exchanged among the friends of these popular beaux garçons. The Quarter was aquiver with interest; the slightest uplift of Mademoiselle Colombe's silken eyelashes had become a matter of speculation; De Gruy's cravats, the swish of Chavannes' cane were subjects of vital importance! Now, the feeling was general that the truncheon was at last to fall, the tourney to end, the victor to receive his prize.

A pretty custom has prevailed from time immemorial at the Cathedral St. Louis. Two or more young women—demoiselles of high degree—are designated or appointed by the good curé in charge to pass about among the congregation after the sermon on certain Sundays in the year and faire la quête—in plain English, take up the collection—for the poor of the parish. Each fair alms-gatherer is allowed the privilege of inviting as her escort on this pious round some young man of her acquaintance—a selection always fraught with import. On this occasion it was charged with solemn meaning; the unspoken understanding, even on the part of the aforesaid jousters themselves, being that the choice of Mademoiselle Colombe would be at least a presage of the wedding-bell. The defeated knight was tacitly pledged to withdraw definitely from the arena.

His sermon ended, the white-robed Dominican father descended the winding stair of the pulpit. There was a second of breathless suspense; then, from somewhere in the neighborhood of the sacristy, the Suisse stepped into view.

The Suisse at the Cathedral St. Louis is a perennial joy to the parish. The tall, soldierly figure in the scarlet uniform of the Papal Guard—cocked hat, silver-laced coat, belt and sword—seems at each appearance to have stepped out of some lost page of history or romance. The fierce twist of the old man's gray mustachios, his eyes ambushed behind grizzly overhanging brows, keen to discover and annihilate unwary urchins, his majestic stride, the metallic ring of his tall staff tap-tapping the pavement—these never fail to send through even the dullest a thrill of emotion. The wonted murmur of admiration greeted him. Looking neither to right nor left, he paced forward a few steps, then stopped and waited, rigidly expectant, upon that lettered slab, beneath which repose the mortal remains of Don Andres Almonester y Roxas, founder of the Cathedral St. Louis.

Behind him, near the altar of St. Francis, stood shoulder to shoulder Felix Chavannes and Allard De Gruy. These men were singularly handsome—both of the accepted Creole type, slim, dark and wiry, with dark eyes and mobile features. But a keen observer would have detected a subtle difference in their quality; there were sensual lines about the mouth of Chavannes, the older by several years of the two, and signs of dissipation in the uncertain, fatigued eyes, which were entirely absent from the open countenance and the frank eyes of his avowed rival. Both on this occasion were outwardly calm, dilating nostrils and uneven breathing alone betraying inward agitation. But a sudden involuntary tremor stirred both when Mademoiselle Colombe stepped out of her family pew, preceded by her two companion-mendicants. These latter flushed rosily under the momentary glance of hundreds of eyes; from rose they went to scarlet as they made their predetermined selection of attendant cavaliers from the front row seats. Alixe was pale, her eyes were downcast, her lips compressed; the dusky hair falling low on her white forehead shaded a slight frown. She carried in her two hands a shallow silver bowl; as she advanced composedly her white sleeve brushed De Gruy's elbow; she made an almost imperceptible pause, and lifting her eyelids shot him an enigmatical glance which in the space of a single second raised him to rapture and reduced him to despair. Then she turned with a graceful gesture to his companion. "Will Monsieur Chavannes," she demanded in a low, clear voice, "do me the honor to accompany me on my tour de charité?"

An audible murmur passed from the fortunate occupants of the front pews to those less happily situated, conveying the news of Mademoiselle Colombe's choice. De Gruy, with a courteous inclination of the head, moved back—his face as white and as impassive as marble; Chavannes, literally treading on air, stepped forward and took his place beside the quêteuse principale; the Suisse sounded a double tap with his staff upon the tesselated floor and strode off at the head of the small procession. For the space of fifteen minutes, or thereabouts, no sound was heard throughout the great chapel save the droning of the organ in the loft, the sonorous tap-tap of the official rod, and the clink of coins rattling into the silver bowls of the alms-gatherers. At the turn beyond the middle aisle near the railed baptismal font Desforges and his friends stood waiting. The name of the victor in the famous contest had already reached them, and more than one among them had begun to figure out the cost of the victory to himself. But even these joined in the involuntary burst of admiration which greeted the approach of the well-matched couple. A color had flamed into Alixe's face; her dark eyes were like luminous wells of light; her white garments enveloped her like a mist, a smile parted her lips. Desforges and Raynal quarreled in a whisper over this smile.

"WILL MONSIEUR CHAVANNES DO ME THE HONOR?"

"It is a smile of supernal happiness," insisted the one.

"It is a smile of infernal triumph," growled the other. And though both confessed that the question admitted of no solution a bet was instantly recorded.

As for Felix, he was radiant; he saw his boon companions as it were through the golden round of a wedding ring; his face wore a proud air of possession. The pair were so harmoniously handsome that even the grim face of the Suisse relaxed—though that may have been at hearing behind him the tinkle of the silver shower which rained continuously into Mademoiselle's bowl!

Monsieur Chavannes handed the quêteuse principale into her carriage; she lingered for a moment listening to the congratulations of the gallants crowded about the carriage-door; she was waxen pale again and her beautiful eyes showed signs of fatigue.

"You have achieved a triumph, Mademoiselle," declared De Gruy, bowing gravely; "the poor of the parish will pray for you—or dance at your wedding."

She avoided his eye. "Both, I trust, Monsieur," she replied gayly.

"Would that you could be induced to faire la quête for me!" exclaimed Le Beau in a plaintive voice. "For if by chance I should decide to pay my debts——"

"Which you are bound to do, you know," interrupted Desforges, giving him a significant dig in the ribs. "A stall at the French Opera costs—let—me—see——"

"Then I shall have to put on the green bonnet," concluded Le Beau mournfully.

"As for this lucky Felix, ma cousine—" began Raynal with a mock indignation in which mingled a tinge of real feeling. The red flamed once more to her cheek—"he shall give us our revenge for so outdistancing us all!"

"Do not make him pay too dearly for a doubtful honor, I beseech you," she laughed as the carriage rolled away.

"The very least that you can do at the present moment, Felix, my boy," cried Desforges, seizing the fortunate knight by the arm, "is to come over to L'Appel du Matin and treat us all to coffee."

"Coffee!" echoed Le Beau; "he ought to treat the world in general to nectar and ambrosia, and ourselves in particular to champagne!"

"Make yourself easy, Le Beau," Bergeron hastened to remark. "The champagne will flow like the Gulf Stream at the supper you owe me!"

Le Beau made a wry face as he linked his arm in that of the speaker, and they all moved across the Square in the direction of the French Market. De Gruy and Chavannes found themselves by accident bringing up the rear, side by side. The former, though sore at heart, said, with a friendly touch on his companion's shoulder, "Eh bien, Felix; accept my congratulations. To be the choice of Mademoiselle Colombe—even for a tour de charité——"

"Two to one that this same tour de charité ends in a wedding tour. Who takes me?" The incorrigible Desforges, catching the end of Allard's phrase, had stopped short and produced his betting-book.

Chavannes smiled fatuously; what mortal man, indeed, would not have smiled at the vision thus conjured up! But the blood rushed to De Gruy's cheeks. "Monsieur Chavannes will certainly not permit Mademoiselle Colombe to be made the subject of such a wager," he said. Desforges colored, and making a gesture of apology, slipped the book back into his pocket.

"It is a prize worth striving for," interposed Le Beau amicably. "And truly," he added with a touch of malice, "Felix has striven—hard."

"Oh, as to that," said Chavannes, nettled, "woman, if you only knew it, my friend, is alike the world over. Foolish is the man who strives"—his tone became contemptuous—"for there comes a moment when of her own accord the woman—any woman—drops like a ripe peach into his outstretched hand."

A murmur of incredulous astonishment ran through the group.

"Are you speaking of Mademoiselle Colombe, Monsieur?" demanded De Gruy hotly.

"Mademoiselle Colombe is a woman like any other. As you will, Monsieur," returned Chavannes flippantly.

"Then you are a liar, a scoundrel and a coward," cried De Gruy, advancing upon him. Interposing hands drew them apart. "Are you mad, that you drag her name into an open quarrel!" whispered Raynal in the younger man's ear.

"The name of womanhood itself——"

"Chut!"

The excitement subsided before the promenaders thronging the Place knew that anything unusual had taken place among the elegant idlers drifting through their midst.

"Monsieur De Gruy," said Felix blandly, "I trust you will honor me by taking a cup of coffee with me at L'Appel du Matin."

"Willingly, Monsieur Chavannes." Allard's tone was equally bland. "The coffee at L'Appel du Matin I hear is excellent."

And without further reference to the scene—which had taken place near the tall iron gates guarding the Square on Rue Ste. Anne—the young men strolled on, the late antagonists walking as before, side by side.

A moment later they turned into one of the low sheds of the French Market. Making their way between the fruit-stands glowing with an equatorial warmth of color, and the fringe of vegetable stalls beyond, garlanded with garlic, they presently came to the open flagged space where half a score of stolid Chacta women squat above their baskets of filé and their bundles of sassafras. Here they paused to scatter a handful of coins which the brown fingers of an Indian baby closed greedily over while with small beadlike eyes he gazed impassively at the givers.

"Ma foi!" cried Le Beau; "what an anti-climax! After Mademoiselle Alixe and her bowl——"

"And her eyes!" interrupted Bergeron.

"The grimy fist of a naked Chacta brat! Put up your book, Desforges. It is all one to me whether the money goes for beads or for fire-water."

A few steps brought them to the famous coffee-stall known as L'Appel du Matin. The reverse of the signboard bearing this legend (in blue and gold) explains to possible English-speaking guests its meaning: The Morning Call. But no translation is needed for the comprehension of the amber-hued liquid which has been served by generations of Vauthiers, fathers and sons, to customers of all nations and all creeds. Thackeray himself, who came to the Old Town by the River "in the springtime, just when the orchards were flushing over with peach-blossoms and the sweet herbs came to flavor the juleps," sat, it is whispered, upon one of the high wooden stools at The Morning Call and sipped his cup (the flaky crumbs of the Vauthier cake lodging in the creases of his ample waistcoat), the while he viewed with kindly spectacled eyes the scene about him and emitted from genial lips the axiom that this was "the city of all the world where you could eat the most and suffer the least." Jenny Lind, moreover, and Lafayette, and Henry Clay—the tale is almost endless!

Chavannes invited his guests with a wave of the hand to be seated. A breeze swept in from the river hard by, bringing confused sounds from the levee; the air was heavy with the smell of pineapples, mangoes, and all manner of tropical fruits. A faint familiar perfume mingled with it from the blossoms adorning the stall.

—BOTH OF THE ACCEPTED CREOLE TYPE

Allard had fallen into a revery; he saw as in a vision a slim white hand uplifted to pluck a cluster of red roses; the sleeve fallen away to the elbow left bare the dainty wrist; once more, as last night in the moonlit old courtyard of the Colombe mansion, a moment of delirium seized him; he caught in his the slim white hand, he felt for a single instant the fluttering pulse of the wrist under his lips; and he stood again terrified but rapturous, watching the flying white-clad figure disappear up the winding stair.

A nudge from Raynal's elbow aroused him. Chavannes was speaking in a slow, deliberate voice. "I have twice reminded Monsieur De Gruy that he does not empty his cup. True, the coffee Vauthier is detestable."

Allard picked up the heavy cup before him and blew off the foam which whitened the dark surface of the beverage within. He touched the thick rim with his lips. "I am usually in accord with Monsieur Chavannes," he said, setting down the cup. "On this occasion, however, I beg leave to differ with him. I find the coffee Vauthier—and the company"—he bowed airily around—"admirable."

"I repeat, sir," interrupted Chavannes without a trace of emotion in his tone, "that the coffee of L'Appel du Matin is detestable."

"And I maintain," returned De Gruy, tapping with his teaspoon on the marble, "that the coffee of The Morning Call is the best that is made—ab—so—lute—ly."

"Then, allow me to offer you another sip," said Chavannes coolly. As he spoke he dashed the contents of his own cup at his rival.

"Thanks, Monsieur." De Gruy wiped the liquid from his shirt-front and rose to his feet. "I am in debt to you for the sip," he continued. "Mr. Raynal here is my banker; he will settle with yours the terms of payment."

"Ma foi!" muttered old Vauthier, passing a wet cloth over the discolored marble and watching his late customers stroll lazily away; "they are a hot-blooded lot—like their fathers and grandfathers before them." He shook his white poll. "But, I wonder me, what devil of a shrimp kicked in that cup! The coffee Vauthier indeed! As if zpp! mes beaux garçons! As if the brain Vauthier did not know that there was a woman under the cape!"

Underneath a giant live-oak toward the rear of the quiet, bird-haunted City Park stands—fast crumbling to ruin—the old family tomb of the Allard family. The flower-bordered aisles, the grassy slopes and the magnificent trees that surround it, once formed a part of the fine old Allard plantation. Later, the place, abandoned, gloomy and weed-grown, became known as The Oaks, the famous dueling-ground of the old régime. The sod now flaunting the scarlet of petunias, and the crimson of geranium and verbena, has in its day and time been watered with the reddest blood of the vieux carré. It is a lonely-looking spot still; the mouldy bricks lie scattered about the yawning mouth of the tomb, whence, long before any living Allard can remember, the bones of his forebears were removed to a more fitting resting-place; the path leading off with a bit of moss-hung wood is bordered with unmolested wild-flowers; a ribbon of golden brown and purple fleurs-de-lis marks in springtime the winding turns of the hollow hard by.

In the misty gray of early dawn on the morning after the quête at the Cathedral St. Louis and the cup of coffee at The Morning Call, Allard De Gruy crossed the dewy sward and paused beside the old tomb of his family. He was accompanied by Raynal and Le Beau and a boyish-looking surgeon with a leather case under his arm. He stooped and gazed into the open, cob-webbed vault, the funereal moss from an overhanging limb of the oak brushing his bared head. "If I——" he began whimsically, still peering into the gloom.

"But you won't, you know!" cried Raynal, taking the word out of his mouth. "Chavannes is a fine shot, but his hand is not so steady as it was. Here they are."

Chavannes, followed by Desforges and Bergeron, came hurrying in his turn across the dewy turf.

An ineffectual attempt was made by the seconds to adjust the quarrel; the preliminaries were quickly arranged; Le Beau and Desforges scribbled furtively in their betting-books; the principals drew off their coats and tossed them on the old tomb; the ground was paced off and they took their places.

The afternoon of the same day Raynal strolled into his cousin's boudoir. She was sitting by an open window with a trayful of rose petals, mingled red and white, on her knee. She looked up as he entered, and returned his significant glance with a saucy smile.

"Still wearing both colors?" he said. "I thought your War of the Roses had ended!"

Digitized by Google

She lifted the leaves intended for the rose-jar with her white fingers, still smiling at him, but made no reply.

"Why did you do it, Alixe?" he asked seriously.

"Do what?" Mademoiselle Colombe's eyebrows were elevated in innocent curiosity.

"Why did you choose Felix Chavannes yesterday for the quête?"

"Impertinent! And why should I not have chosen Monsieur Chavannes?"

"Poor Allard!"

"Poor Allard, indeed!" Alixe's tone took on sudden indignant energy. "Monsieur De Gruy does not strike me as a subject for pity. His presumption is unpardonable."

Raynal wondered at her, being unaware of the vision which swam before her eyes—of a man and a maid in a moonlit court—of his swift, impassioned, unwarranted grasp of her hand—of the warm pressure of his lips on her wrist——

"Poor Allard!" he repeated with an insistence which startled her into inquiring with impatience what he meant.

He watched her narrowly. "Chavannes and De Gruy fought a duel this morning at daylight," he announced abruptly.

She trembled from head to foot. "Was—was Monsieur Chavannes hurt?" she faltered.

Raynal turned angrily on his heel. "No, coquette!" he shouted from the doorway. "But Allard has paid with a shot in his arm for his quixotic defense of—the coffee Vauthier."

"Oh, is that all!" Her fingers were again busy with the rose-leaves. "Come, tell me about it." And having with feminine adroitness coaxed the alleged reasons for the quarrel out of her cousin, and listened without a shudder to his graphic account of the duel itself, she leaned back and remarked nonchalantly: "Do you know, mon cousin, I find your friend Monsieur De Gruy as inept as he is presumptuous. I have myself tasted the coffee Vauthier. I found it atrocious."

"You are utterly heartless, Alixe," exclaimed Raynal, manlike noticing the smile and not the grayish pallor that had crept into her face.

A fortnight later, on a Sunday morning, Allard De Gruy found himself, in company with Raynal and Le Beau, once more seated on one of the high wooden stools at The Morning Call. His arm was still in a sling, and he was a trifle thinner than usual, but otherwise he showed no trace of the inexplicable accident which had been the talk of the town. As on a former occasion, he had fallen into a revery—induced doubtless by the faint familiar perfume of the roses at his elbow. His foam-capped cup remained untasted before him. He had lost her forever—that he had realized at the moment she had made her choice for the quête. He acknowledged himself vanquished, but for the life of him he could not help going back again and again with bitter-sweet rapture to that never-to-be-forgotten night, when——

This time it was a silvery voice which aroused him. "Good-morning, messieurs." He sprang to his feet and faced about.

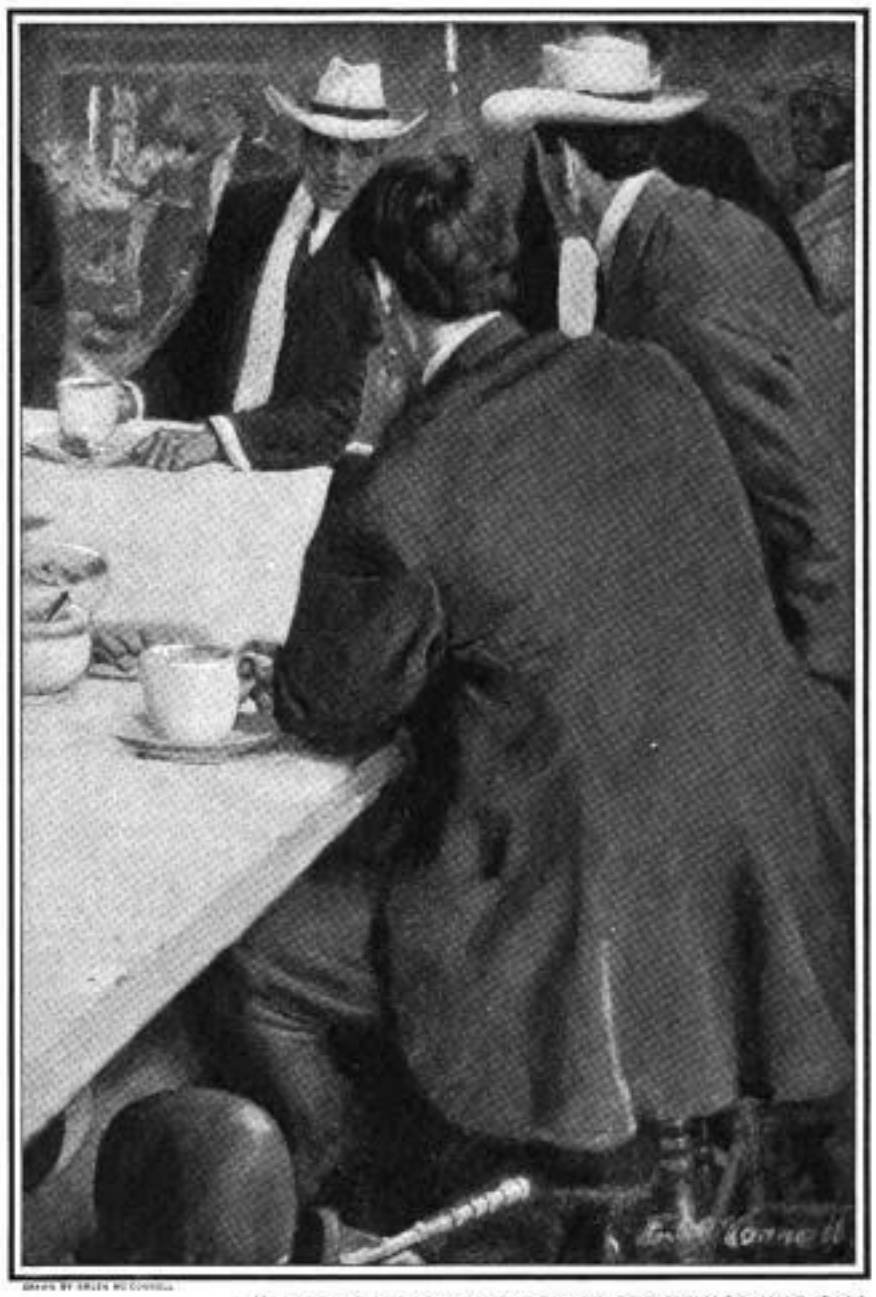
Mademoiselle Colombe had approached unawares. She had, it appeared, taken it into her pretty head to "make the marketing" as the phrase goes in Frenchtown; the waddling negress at her heels carried a heaped-up basket.

At the same moment, by one of those strange chances which are utterly incomprehensible, Felix Chavannes, with his two cronies, had come up from the opposite side and paused, with a formal greeting to his late adversary. He placed himself near the young girl with an air of ownership, which Allard could not but admit was justifiable, but which, in the light of Chavannes' estimate of woman, was intolerable to himself. He returned her quick glance with a smile and stood aside.

Neither had seen her since the memorable quête; she had been, it was understood, making her annual retreat at the Convent du Sacré Cœur. She was more radiant than ever.

"Am I asked to have a cup of coffee?" she demanded gayly. "Thanks, messieurs." Amid a chorus of delighted exclamations she fluttered to the stool just vacated by De Gruy. Old Vauthier, well-nigh dazed by such an apparition, made haste to set before her a freshly filled cup, and under the admiring gaze of half a dozen pairs of eyes she carried it to her lips.

"I find the coffee Vauthier the best that is made—ab—so—lute—ly," she remarked carelessly, putting the cup into the saucer and tapping the marble with her spoon.



Was this intentional? Or but a chance shot? Even Raynal was puzzled. Her lovely eyes were bent on Chavannes with an expression so charmingly innocent that involuntarily he put out his arm, as if to claim his bride then and there: his face glowed with unconcealed triumph.

There was a moment of rather embarrassed silence. "I smell orange-blossoms," observed Le Beau with pretended irrelevance.

"Impossible," said Bergeron in a matter-of-fact tone. "The orange trees ceased blooming a month ago, and more,"

"Nevertheless there are a few belated flowers on the tree in the cathedral garden," said Desforges. "I saw them as I came along. Perhaps," he added with a meaning glance at Chavannes, "if Mademoiselle Colombe has immediate need of orange-blossoms, the old Suisse might be persuaded to give her a handful—enough at least for a certain coronet."

Alixe flushed scarlet to the roots of her hair, but she bowed graciously to the audacious speaker as she rose to her feet. "Merci, Monsieur," she said; "I will go at once to the cathedral garden. Monsieur De Gruy"—she leaned forward and laid her ungloved hand on Allard's bandaged arm—"will you faire la quête—for orange-blossoms—with me?"

—"I MAINTAIN THAT THE COFFEE OF THE MORNING CALL IS THE BEST THAT IS MADE—AB-SO-LUTE-LY"

"What does it mean?" demanded the astounded Desforges as the pair passed arm in arm down the dim aisles of the Market.

"It means," chuckled Raynal, "that everybody has been blind—except Love!"

The Language of the Wire

By EDWARD LEGGETT KEEN

Ld 3—Kevy ws saik tsp by an unkn

THIS is not Russian nor "pidgin" English. Neither is it printers' pi nor a doctor's prescription. It doesn't look very easy to the average citizen, but it is perfectly intelligible to any telegraph operator familiar with the handling of press copy. The operator in a newspaper office who, receiving such an item over the press association wire, should fail to sing it out or demolish three or four chairs getting it to the telegraph editor's desk, would surely lose his job. Assuming that he has heard this message ticking its way over the wire from New York, he has already taken it down on his "machine" in understandable English—and by this time he is probably listening to the bawling of the newsmongers in the street below: "Wuxtre-e-e! All about the horrible assassination of King Edward!"—while the startled public is reading from the still damp sheet:

> London,——3—King Edward VII was shot and instantly killed this afternoon by an unknown anarchist who, it is reported, immediately afterward committed suicide. Great excitement.

This is an exact translation of the alphabetical jumble recorded above. The message was sent in what is known in telegraph circles as the Phillips Code. As transmitted it contained forty-two letters; as translated, one hundred and forty-four letters. It was sent over the wire, therefore, in less than one-third the time that would have been required to tick it off in plain language.

Another example:

> T Scotus tdy dcdd 5 pw f Potus dz n xtd to t Pips, ogt all pst Cgsl xgn q sj is uxl.

This also would be startling if true, and doubtless would create a sensation or two in the editorial and composing rooms, for it conveys the heartrending information that:

> The Supreme Court of the United States to-day decided that the power of the President of the United States does not extend to the Philippines, on the ground that all past Congressional legislation on the subject is unconstitutional.

The code was compiled some twenty years ago by Colonel Walter L. Phillips, sometime General Manager of the now defunct United Press. Since then it has been enlarged and improved until it now contains more than two thousand expressions. These expressions vary in length from one letter, or figure, to groups of five letters. They stand for one word or for phrases composed of as many as eight or ten words. The system was devised for the purpose of both saving time and increasing the capacity of the wire. Its utility for press work became evident upon the introduction of the typewriter. An average operator sending uncoded matter can crowd the very best receiving operator taking it in manuscript; but most any typewriter operator can take that kind of "stuff" with ease and have time to read his morning paper between words. The use of the code brings the speed of the sender more nearly up to that of the receiver, now that press work is almost universally taken on the typewriter. The examples given above are coded more closely than the ordinary press message. The time actually saved in practical work is about one-third over that consumed in sending the same matter in an unabbreviated language.

For almost all the code expressions employed there is an apparent reason for existence, orthographic or phonetic—or otherwise. Thus, "ofs" is easily understood to mean "office." The phrases, "shot and instantly killed," "it is reported," "Supreme Court of the United States," and "President of the United States" are coded by using the first letter of each word; but just why "ckx" should indicate "committed suicide" does not appear. There are some other arbitrary signs in the code, such as "hag" for "in consequence of" and "kaw" for "adjourned sine die," but these are quite limited in number. The code is arranged generally with a view to burdening the memory as little as possible. Expressions for words having the same root vary only as to termination. For instance, "receive" is coded "rc." Naturally, then, "receiving" is "rcg"; "received" is "rcd" and "reception" is "rcn." Thus also, starting with "oj" for "object," we have "ojd, ojg, ojn, ojv, ojt" for "object-ed, -ing, -ion, -ive, -ionable."

Nearly every letter in the alphabet is employed singly as a code expression; thus, "f" for "of the," "g" for "from the," "j" for "by which," etc. The figure "4" means "where"; "5," "that the"; "7," "that is."

The doctrine of expansion is observed in the code. As a system it keeps pace with the times, and new expressions are added as they become necessary. When Dewey discovered the Philippines, and thus a new word was incorporated into current geographical nomenclature, a contraction therefore had to be invented. What could be more euphonious than "Pips"? "Porto Rico" became "Pxo" and "Porto Ricans," "Pxons." Upon the accession of King Edward VII the operators were able to save nine letters by nicknaming His Majesty "Kevy." This can scarcely be considered quite so irreverent, however, as "Sow" for "Secretary of War."

The American Adventures of a Fortune-Hunting Earl

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS

—ACCEPTED WALLINGFORD'S INVITATION TO WALK IN THE FRESH NIGHT AIR TO HIS CLUB

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS — Arthur Gordon-Beauvais, Earl of Frothingham, is on the verge of hopeless financial ruin, and something must be done about it. There seems to be encouragement in the example of his friend and neighbor, George, Duke of Surrey, who has succeeded in capturing an American heiress, and, bolstered up with borrowed courage by his sister Evelyn, he takes his leave of England and the girl he really loves — Lady Gwendoline Ridley, Surrey's sister. On the steamer he meets two American types — Longview, a tuft-hunting nonentity, recently naturalized an Englishman, and Barney, a flamboyant example of sudden wealth. Both have daughters and both have fortunes, but Miss Barney is still in Chicago, and Honoria Longview is much too wide-awake a young woman to make any mistake in understanding Frothingham's errand.

III

NEW YORK, November 6.

My Dear Eve:

I'm just sending you off the newspapers with the accounts of George's wedding. Don't show them about, please, as he's frightfully cut up over them. He swears he'll never set foot in this country again or let his Duchess come. You'll be tremendously amused as you read. You'll never have seen anything so frank and personal. And the illustrations! We've done nothing but dodge cameras when we weren't dodging reporters. I don't agree with George — I think it's great fun.

They let me off easy, as you'll see, and some of the pictures of me are not half bad. But I don't wonder that George is furious. Just read the descriptions of his looks — and really he's looking horribly seedy. And don't neglect the accounts of the new Duchess' papa and how he came by his cash. He must be a gory old vulture — though really he don't look it, and except when he gets to going it hard his English is fairly good, of the nosey, Yankee kind.

George came down to the dock to meet me. He was in a blue fury. It seems the newspapers had been making a fearful row over him from the moment he left the other side. And then by illustrated accounts of his houses, his property, his family and himself, not to speak of what they printed about the Dowies' past and present, they set the crowds to collecting at his hotel and to following him around the streets. They published even what he ate and drank, and the size of the tips he gave the servants. And after the engagement was announced the excitement became something incredible. He couldn't poke his nose out of his rooms that somebody didn't collect the crowd by shouting, "There's his Dooklets, there's the little fellow" — and you know Georgie is a bit sensitive about his size.

Well, the newspapers published everything — his height and weight, the tooth he has out on the left side, every rag in his boxes, pictures of 'em, everything in Miss Dowie's trousseau — columns and columns. And how he did hop round when he found that the Dowies had actually hired a fellow and a woman to give out facts to the press! What do you think of that for a Yankee notion?

You can't imagine the presents. You'd have thought the crown princess was marrying. The newspapers say they alone were worth a million and a half, American money. I and Cleggett went over 'em, and we decided they'd fetch more. You know Cleggett — he's Georgie's solicitor — is over here looking after the settlements. He simply had to put the screws on to old Dowie. I got a good many hints from him on how to deal with these beggars in money matters. Dowie's a shrewd chap. He and Cleggett did all the money talk. Georgie was supposed to know nothing about it. But maybe he wasn't in a blue funk when it began to look as if the whole business were off at the last minute. I had to work hard to keep him up to the mark. Cleggett won out, though — got a hundred thousand pounds more than Georgie expected.

To go back to the presents, her uncle — one of the ha'penny rags here said he's been in the penitentiary, but I hear it's not true — he gave her a yacht, a regular ocean steamer. You'll admire the necklace her aunt sent her — it can't have cost less than fifty thousand, our money. It makes me ill to see these beggars wading and wallowing in money. By the way, I notice that while they talk of spending money, they talk of making it as much as they talk of spending it, if not more.

Wallingford, a fellow I've met here, said to me at dinner the other night, a few minutes after the women had gone: "Shall we stay here with the men and discuss making money, or shall we go up to the women and discuss spending it?"

But to go back to Georgie and his coming down to meet me. I saw him on the pier, his face like a sunset and his arms going like mad. He was haranguing a crowd in which there were several cameras. I shouted to him — I and Miss Longview and her father were at the rail together. As soon as I shouted the crowd looked at us and the cameras were pointed at us. Miss Longview darted away and her father pulled at me.

"Come, come!" he said, all in a flurry and a sweat. "They'll take your picture if you stay."

"Who?" said I. "And why should they take my picture?"

"The reporters," he answered, dragging at me. "You don't understand about American newspapers." I let him drag me away; then he explained. "They know you are coming to the wedding," he said, "and they'll photograph you and interview you and print everything about you — insulting, impudent things. There's no such thing as privacy in this horrible country. Didn't I tell you they haven't the faintest notion what a gentleman is or what is due a gentleman?"

Barney — I'm sure I told you about him in the letter I wrote you on the way over — Barney was standing near us. He burst in with, "I think your friend is unduly alarmed, Earl." (He always calls me Earl. He says he'll be blanked if he'll call any man lord.) "You haven't committed a crime or done what you'd be ashamed to see in print. No honest man objects to having his face published or anything else about him that's true." And he glared at Longview, who sniffed and walked away. Barney sent a jeering laugh after him and said, "The scrawny little chipmunk!"

"What's a chipmunk?" said I.

"A kind of squirrel," said he, "only littler and even easier to scare."

We went to the rail, and there was George with his crowd pushing and jostling him. As soon as the gangway was let down he rushed aboard, the crowd with the cameras on his heels. At the top he turned like Marius, or whoever it was, at the bridge. And he shouted to the officers in a funny, shrill voice, "Drive those ruffians back!" But the officers were smiling at him and only pretended to restrain the reporters and photographers. On they came, reaching us about as soon as George did. They poured round and between us and began to ask me questions. I must admit they were polite, in the Yankee way, and friendly, and good-natured.

I said to one of 'em: "I say, my good fellow, can't you give me time to get my breath?"

"No, I can't, Lord Frothingham," he said, laughing. "What would you do if you were I, and your paper were going to press in ten minutes and you were five minutes from a telephone?"

I got on famously with them. I didn't in the least mind. They must have liked me, as you'll read. But Georgie! How they have been dishing him up!

It wasn't until we got into the carriage that I and he had a chance at each other. "Did you ever see or hear of anything like it?" he said. His hands were shaking and the sweat was rolling down his cheeks. "They act like a lot of South Sea savages when a whale comes ashore. They are savages. I had heard it was a beastly country, but ——" And he actually ground his teeth.

You know, George is very touchy on his dignity and has old-fashioned ideas of what's due a Duke from his inferiors. It seems he got into a huff when he first came because they treated him in an offhand fashion, as they treat everybody. And he tried to snub them. And when they snubbed back, only they had illustrated newspapers to do it in, he went wild and has been making matters worse and worse for himself. Some of the papers have had leaders pitying Miss Dowie and predicting that she'll have him in the divorce court for brutality shortly — think of it — Georgie, quiet Georgie! Every one is hating him, for he assumed that even Miss Dowie's friends were like the newspapers that had slated him, and he snubbed right and left.

He took me to his hotel. He had an apartment that costs him fifteen pounds a day — ain't that 'cruel? But he said he didn't propose that these savages should sneer at his poverty — they're doing it anyhow, and they hint that the Dowies are paying his hotel bill or will have to pay it. However, I think he did well to spread himself. There's something about this country that makes you ashamed to seem poor. You spend money and pretend you've got plenty of it. They call it "throwing a bluff," or "making a front."

George had taken an apartment at a tall price for me, but I wouldn't have it, as I wouldn't saddle him with the expense — he hadn't her money in hand then. Besides, I knew that as soon as he was gone I'd have to come down, and that would have looked bad. After I was installed in a very comfortable little apartment thirteen floors up — think of that! — at three pounds a day, we drove to Dowie's. A crowd saw us off at the hotel, people pointed and stared at us all the way up the street, and there was a crowd waiting for us at Dowie's. They live in a huge graystone castle — there is no end of smart houses here, but a queer jumble — samples of everything. I hadn't known old Dowie an hour before he told me that the house and ground and all cost him six hundred thousand, our money.

The girl — but you'll judge her for yourself. I rather fancied her. Affected, of course, and trying to act a duchess out of one of Ouida's novels. Rather fat, too, and her hair is thin and a mussy shade of yellow. I think she'll waddle in about five years. Still she's sensible and quick, and dresses well. All the women here do that. But the money! It's heartrending to see it parade by. And they seem to be throwing it away, but they don't. Everything is horribly dear here. I must look sharp or I sha'n't last long.

The newspapers will give you all you want to know about the wedding — it was quite a show — perhaps vulgar and overdone, but really gorgeous. I like America and I like the people. They're jolly good-natured, and the nice ones here are much the same as nice people anywhere else. The Longviews have taken a big furnished house and I'm staying with them. Next week a friend of Miss Longview — a Miss Hollister who lives here, but her people are still in the country — is coming to visit her. Her (Miss Hollister's) father owns a lot of railways and mines, and is no end of a financial swell. I'm too sleepy to write another word except

ARTHUR.

How is Gwen? Be good to me, Evelyn — with love — A.

HONORIA took Frothingham to the Grand Central Station to meet Catherine, and he liked the very first glimpse of her as she came striding down the platform. She was tall and narrow, and she wore dresses and wraps that emphasized both these characteristics. She had a long, thin neck and a small, delicately-colored face which she knew how to frame most fascinatingly in her hair, with or without the aid of her hat. She had dreamy young eyes, long and narrow, and her red lips and her slender, nervous fingers made it clear that she lived in her senses rather than in her intellect—that she would neither say nor think anything brilliant, but would feel intensely, and could be powerfully appealed to through her imagination. She was wearing a light brown, brightly-lined coat that trailed to her heels; and she was holding up from the dust and close about her many folds of soft, fine materials, cloth and silk and linen and lace. In her wake came a maid and a porter, each laden with her belongings, an attractive array of comforts and luxuries of travel.

"I'm glad you brought a closed carriage," she said with a shiver as they started for home. "It's raw and the sky seems to weigh upon one's shoulders and head. This is a day to hide in the house, close by an open fire."

Frothingham was surprised by this fairy-princess delicateness in so robust a creature. He thought the day mild, and as for the sky, why bother about anything that far away so long as it sent nothing down to bother one?

"You forget we are English," said Honoria. "We call this good weather. I must confess the closed carriage was a happy accident."

"So like you, Honoria! Isn't it, Lord Frothingham?" Catherine gave him a sweet smile. "She never permits one to keep agreeable illusions. Now, I was loving her for being so thoughtful for me."

As Frothingham only stared, shy and stolid, through his eyeglass, the two girls began to talk each to the other—they had not met in two years, not since Catherine and her mother visited Honoria at Longview's place in Bucks.

"What a beautiful place it was," said Catherine. "I often dream of it. But then, I love England. It is of such a wonderful, vivid shade of green and everything is so cultivated, and refined, and—and—like a fairy garden. Don't you find the contrast very great, Lord Frothingham? We are very new and wild."

"I've seen only people since I've been here. I must say the people—at least those I've met—remind me of home, except that they speak the language differently. As for the city, it's not at all as I fancied. It's much like Paris—more attractive than London, not so gloomy."

"Paris!" Catherine smiled with gently reproachful satire. "Oh, you flatter us."

"I like it better," insisted Frothingham. "It's Paris with English in the streets—I hate Frenchmen."

"No, they're not nice to look at—the men," admitted Catherine. "But I adore what they've done. What would the world be without France?"

"Oh, I don't know," said Frothingham with his cynical enthusiasm-discouraging drawl. "They're hysterical beggars, always exploding for no reason. It makes me nervous. I like quiet and comfort."

"Lord Frothingham isn't so sensible as he pretends," put in Honoria. "He's really almost as sentimental and emotional as you are, Catherine."

"Oh, but I'm neither," replied Catherine. "I don't dare to be. If I find myself the least bit enthusiastic I catch myself up and look all round, frightened lest somebody may have noticed. I'm such a liar—we all are over here. Don't you like sincerity, Lord Frothingham?"

"I—I suppose so." Frothingham looked vague. "What do you mean?" Catherine's "intensity" confused him.

"I mean being true to one's self and not ashamed to show one's self as one is, and never afraid to tell the truth."

"But all of us do that, don't we?" said Frothingham. There was a twinkle in his eye—or was it only the reflection of light from his glass?

Honoria gave him her "candid friend" look. "Nobody does," said she. "That is, nobody who has temperament enough to lead any sort of life above an oyster's."

"But I can see at a glance that Lord Frothingham has temperament." Catherine looked at him with intensely sympathetic appreciation. "Yes, men can be sincere and truthful. But women must always repress their real selves."

Frothingham looked stolid and hopeless. Whenever conversation turned on abstractions he felt like a man fumbling and stumbling about in a London fog. "Really?" he said. "Really, now?"

"I don't know why women fancy they must be liars," said Honoria. "Do you mind dining at Sherry's to-night?" Catherine in her psychological moods bored her. She sometimes ventured on aerial flights, but had no fancy for aerial flounderings.

"Sherry's? That will be delightful! I like dining at restaurants—I'm very American in that respect."

"But so do I," said Frothingham. "That is, in your restaurants here. The people are interesting, and they talk a lot, and loud enough so that one hears every word and isn't annoyed by missing the sense. And how they do waste the food!"

"Food!" Catherine repeated the word with a smile that was half humorous, half pleading. "Please don't use that word, Lord Frothingham. Is always makes me shiver. It sounds so—so animal!"

Frothingham put on the blank look behind which he habitually sheltered himself when he did not know what to say or to do or to think. Honoria was disgusted with him and with Catherine. "They're not going to like each other, not even enough to marry," she said to herself. "And it's a pity, as they're exactly suited. If Catherine only wouldn't pose!"

She was, therefore, somewhat surprised when, immediately she and Catherine were alone, Catherine burst into rhapsody on Frothingham. "What a fine, strong face! So much character! What a sincere, sensitive, pure nature. He's a splendid type of true gentleman, isn't he, Nora? How well he contrasts with our men! Doesn't he?"

Honoria smiled to herself. "She wants to marry him," she thought, "and she's building a fire under her imagination. I might have known it. She's the very person to weave romance over a title and imagine it all gospel. What a poser!" To Catherine she said: "He's a decent enough chap, Caterina. And you'll admire him more than ever when you've read him up in Burke's Peerage and looked at the pictures he's given me of Beauvais House."

"How do you spell it? B-e-v-i-s?"

"No, that's the way you pronounce it. You spell it B-e-a-u-v-a-i-s."

"Isn't that interesting? It's so commonplace to pronounce a word the way it's spelt, don't you think?"

"I never thought of it, my dear. Why not marry him?"

"You are so abrupt and—and practical, Honoria," said Catherine plaintively. "But you are a dear. I should never marry a man unless I loved him."

—HE LIKED THE VERY FIRST GLIMPSE OF HER

Honoria looked faintly cynical. "Certainly not. But surely you can love any man you make up your mind to marry. What is your imagination for?"

At Sherry's that night, besides Honoria, Catherine, Longview and Frothingham, there were at Longview's table Mrs. Carnarvon, of the hunting set, and Joe Wallingford—he hunts and writes verse, both badly, and looks and talks, both extremely well. Honoria devoted herself to Wallingford and so released Catherine and Frothingham each upon the other—she listened for a few seconds now and then to note their progress.

"It's a go," she said to herself with the matchmaker's thrill of triumph, as the cold dessert was served. She saw that Frothingham had ceased to listen and so had ceased to puzzle; his eyeglass was trained steadily and sympathetically upon Catherine's fascinating beauty—why weary the brain when it might rest and enjoy itself through the eyes? Catherine was talking on and on, quoting poetry, telling Frothingham of her emotions, telling him of his emotions—he did not have them, but she was so earnest and convinced that he half believed he did.

"When you said this afternoon that you liked things quiet and comfortable," she said, "I felt that it was splendidly in keeping with your character. I saw that you hated all this noise and display, that you like to get away in your own corner of your beautiful England and live grandly and quietly—near Nature."

If Catherine had not been beautiful and rich he would have said to himself, "What rubbish!" But, as it was, he thought her profound and spiritual. And he said, trying to touch bottom and get a firm stand upon firm earth, "I think you'd like Beauvais."

"I'm sure I should," replied Catherine with enthusiasm. "Honoria was showing me the photographs of it. I admire the great, stately old house. But I liked best of all the picture of the woods and the brook. It reminded me of those lines of Coleridge's—they are so beautiful!—where he speaks of the brook—

> 'In the leafy month of June
> That to the sleeping woods all night
> Singeth a quiet tune.'

Don't you think those lines fine? Do I quote them right?"

"Yes—I think so—that is," stammered Frothingham, "it's a jolly brook, but we call it a river." Then to himself: "What an ass she'll think me!" But the starting sweat stayed, for she asked him no more questions; and he, freed from the anxiety of having to try to soar with her, was able to sit quietly and enjoy her beauty and the murmurous rush of her low, musical voice—"It's like the brook that brute she quoted wrote about," he thought.

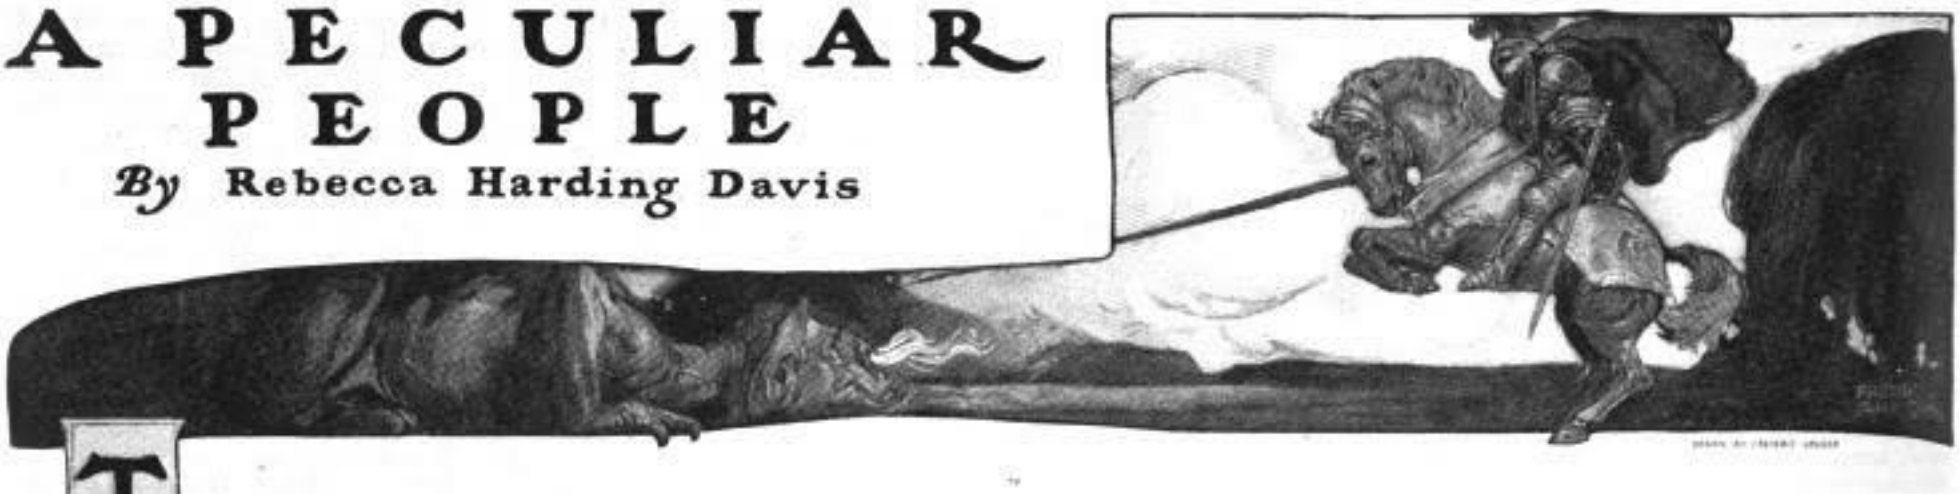
He did not drive home with his party but accepted Wallingford's invitation to walk in the fresh night air to his club. "Your American women are tremendously clever," he said, as they were strolling along. He was feeling dazed and dizzy from the whirl of his emotions, the whirls and shocks Catherine Hollister had given his brain.

"Yes, they're clever," replied Wallingford, "but not in the way they think they are. Take Kitty Hollister, for example. She's all right when she wants to be. She thinks sense. But what a raft of fuzzy trash she does float out when she gets a-going. I pitied you this evening. She laid herself out to impress you. You're staying in the house with her, aren't you? I suppose she whoops it up whenever you're round?"

"I find her very clever—and interesting," said Frothingham somewhat stiffly.

"Of course she is. I've known her for seventeen of the nineteen years she's gladdened the earth—and I ought to know her pretty well. But she's like a lot of the women in this town. They haven't any emotions to speak of—nothing emotional happens. But they think they ought to have emotions such as they read about, and so they fake 'em. Then, they've got the craze for culture. They haven't the time to get the real thing—they're too busy showing off. Besides, they're too lazy. So they fake culture, too. Oh, yes, they're clever. And they look so well that you like the fake as they parade it better than the real thing."

"We have that sort in London," said Frothingham.



"So I've observed. But it's done rather better there—they're older hands at it. If you weren't an Englishman, I'd say it fitted in better among the other shams. I suppose you've noticed that many people here are imitation English or French? You've seen the tags 'Made in England,' 'Made in France,' 'Made in England, finished in France'?"

A PECULIAR PEOPLE

By Rebecca Harding Davis

THE most vehement Abolitionist that I ever saw flamed into our horizon one July morning in '62. No other words will convey the breathless heat of that man's zeal.

I must remind you that by that time the border States were one vast armed camp. The few men here and there who had cried out for arbitration or peace were either dead, or dumb from fear. The whole country now was given over to blood and fury. During the first year of the war there had been a good deal of terrified but friendly scuttling to and fro across the border. Local politicians made journeys to "use their influence on the other side." Southern children were hurried home from Northern schools; helpless women sought shelter with far-off kinsfolk.

But now the lines between the Northern and Southern States were closed and ramparted from end to end by armed men. No passes could be obtained from either Government. The man who tried to steal across the line, no matter what his purpose, was either shot on sight or hung as a spy.

You can imagine my dismay then, when, one sultry morning, I received a letter from an Abolition leader in Boston, saying:

"My friend, M. d'Almeida, of Paris, a man eminent in the scientific world of Europe, has come to this country to aid the slave in gaining his freedom. He is eager to reach the South and begin his God-appointed work. I have sent him direct to you, hoping that your family will use their influence with some of the Southern leaders to enable him to travel safely through the seceded States. If this is not practicable will you assist him to creep through the lines in disguise? No doubt courtesy will be shown to a foreigner on both sides."

Courtesy?

I remember that at that moment terrified cries rose on the street. Some pretty young girls had been arrested for strumming Dixie on their pianos and were being led to jail.

For martial law had been declared in our quiet old town at the beginning of the war. The division of Virginia was planned there and the little city promptly was made the capital of the new State. Nowhere in the country probably was the antagonism between its sections more bitter than in these counties of Virginia which the North thus wrested from the South—"for keeps." Federal troops were hurried into Wheeling. The stately old dwelling across the street from our house was now the headquarters of the Mountain Department, under General Rosecrans. Some of our friends who were secessionists were in an old theatre just in sight which had been turned into a jail. Others were in a prison camp on a pretty island in the river. The change in the drowsy town was like that made in those little vine-decked villages on the flanks of Vesuvius after the red-hot flood of lava had passed over them. Nothing but gloom and suspicion and death were real to us now. The range of mountains just out of sight was alive with rebel guerillas, quite as little minded to peace and mercy as our guards.

And I was asked to send a foreign slave-stealer safely through them!

A Crusader in Distress

At that moment his card was brought up. I found in the drawing-room a large, bearded man, who, in one excited minute, in a torrent of broken English and breathless French, told me that he had come from his own country to the help of mine, that he "had thoroughly mastered the situation in the North and now threw himself upon my compassion, trusting to my hands to open the gates of the South to him." He pulled out packages of commendatory letters from Horace Greeley, Sumner and Lovejoy. It was in vain that my father, whom I called to my help, assured him that if one of these papers were found on him in the South he would be hung to the nearest tree. He laughed complacently.

"Ah! I have my plan!" he cried excitedly. "Zere ees a little river near here—ze Kenny-wah. I go to its shores. I dress in ze costume of ze paysans. You will kindly have taught me zere patois. I buy a bateau. I row. I sing ze chanson of Dixie loudly. Zey welcome me to zeir houses."

Argument was useless. For two days M. d'Almeida fumed and planned. Then one of our friends—a rebel and slave-owner, by the way—took pity on him.

"I am going home to St. Louis, Monsieur," he said. "If you choose to come with me I think you can make your way into the South. The lines are not so tightly drawn in Missouri as here. But I will not answer for your safety when you pass them."

They started for St. Louis together. M. d'Almeida sent his letters back to Boston, assuring us loudly that he would "be silent and wary as a serpent!" He was promptly arrested the day he crossed the lines and spent a year in Southern prisons and camps, but at last was exchanged and sent to a military hospital in Washington. There Lord Lyons, who was appealed to, found him, worn out with want and disease and disappointment. He hurried home to France and sent back grateful souvenirs to every one who had aided him. But he came no more to the land of Freedom.

Frémont the Paladin of His Party

The incarnation of the chivalric and noble side of Abolitionism was John C. Frémont. (It had, like every cause, more sides than one.)

Frémont had the ardent blood of a Frenchman and a South Carolinian. He made of Freedom a religion. I don't know that he had any especial liking for the negro—very few Abolitionists, by the way, had that. But the slavery of the black man—of any man—was abhorrent to him. He fought for the freedom of the negro as he would have fought for the Holy Sepulchre, or for liberty with Kosciusko, or Kossuth, or Garibaldi.

He was so completely the Paladin, the ideal knight, in his figure, his face and his manner, that you took a certain comfortable satisfaction in knowing that he was in the right niche. One man, at least, had the work in hand for which he was born.

His party clung to him with a passionate loyalty.

"My creed is short," I once heard Sidney Gay, the editor of the Tribune, say: "I believe in Almighty God, His Son, and John C. Frémont."

He meant no irreverence. In that time when Americans were dying daily for each other and for ideas their words were apt to be few and hot with meaning.

If the great Pathfinder was the incarnation of the chivalric spirit of his cause, Horace Greeley embodied as fully its exaggerated ridiculous phases.

I saw him first when I was a schoolgirl in a little town in Pennsylvania.

The Lecturer was then in the height of his career; he was the new-found Educator of the whole country: every village waited breathless for him to come and waken its sleeping intellect. He came, incessantly. One week Holmes read poems to us; the next Saxe gave us puns; again we plunged into the mysteries of buried Nineveh. On this night the little church was crowded to the doors and all of the kerosene lamps blazed and smoked joyfully. Every man in the town took the New York Tribune and accepted it as gospel, and Horace Greeley was believed to write the whole of it, down to the death notices.

And now there he was himself, the great Northern prophet and leader! He stood down in front of the pulpit near to us. He bore a dreadful, unspeakable likeness to Humpty Dumpty. Deny it to yourself in horror if you chose—it was there! His head was a round, shining ball, the few hairs struggled wildly over it, his blue, round eyes were those of a baby, his voice was a shrill squeak. He was vehement from the first word. He meant to help these young people and this was his one chance in life to do it. His legs and arms wobbled continuously as though every joint were unhinged. At last, in the height and paroxysm of his argument, when he had clenched you, wrestling with your reason as for life, he suddenly stopped, and taking out a huge yellow bandanna handkerchief held it at length by the two corners, and stooping down sawed it energetically in silence across his legs. That was the end. And yet, so passionate was his appeal, so fine and high the truth which he had forced on us that nobody laughed. The audience dispersed in an awed silence. As you went out of the hall something choked your throat, and the hot tears stood in your eyes.

Anecdotes of Horace Greeley's absurd, childish doings circulated widely during his life. Any vulgar scribbler or cartoonist could point them out with giggles and hisses. Only those who worked under him or knew him well understood how great and sincere was the soul beneath them. It belonged to his temperament to be sensitive and easily hurt as a child. There is no doubt that the malignant ridicule heaped upon him during the campaign in which he was a candidate for the Presidency shortened his life.

After all, as far as the Abolition party was concerned, the war was very like the tourney in Ivanhoe. One famous leader after another came to the front—Frémont, Beecher, Greeley—to be unhorsed by their own party and carried from the field. Frémont, with his chivalric notions and gallant presence, was, let us say, the Disinherited Knight, and the great Plymouth preacher might well take the part of burly Front de Boeuf.

I never saw a human being with a personality more aggressive than that of Henry Ward Beecher. No matter how crowded the room might be you were conscious only of this huge, lumbering man in it who was so oddly unconscious of himself. He had too big a nature for vanity. His brain was eager and grasping. Whether the talk turned on a religion or a bonnet he caught the subject with impatient force and crushed the whole meaning out of it. He was, too, more than other people—human. He was indifferent to nothing. Every drop of his thick blood was hot with love or hate. He was an Abolitionist not so much from love of Freedom as love of the poor black man himself. His humor was that of Dooley, not Lamb. He had the voice of a great orator; if you did not know the language he spoke, the magnetism in it would make you laugh or cry.

He had an enormous following of men and a few women.

But, back of the heavy jaws and thick lips and searching eyes swathed in drooping lids, back of the powerful intellect and tender sympathy, there was a nameless something in Mr. Beecher which repelled most women. You resolved obstinately not to agree with his argument, not to laugh or cry with him, not to see him again.

Perhaps it is ungracious in me to tell this. But I cannot give the impression he made without it. He was always Doctor Fell to me, in spite of his strength and the wonderful charm of his sympathy with every living creature.

I met him first at a large dinner-party in New York. He knew me only as a young girl from the hills in Virginia, a friend of his friends. But he heard me speak of certain forgotten old hymns of which I was fond.

"Bring her to Plymouth Church next Sunday," he whispered to my hostess.

There was an immense audience in the great church that Sunday. The seats rose as in a circus up from the pulpit; they were all full and the aisles were packed with men standing; at the back were the organ and choir. During the service that great congregation sang, one after another, the old hymns that I loved. The vast volume of sound rose to Heaven as one soft, pleading voice. I never shall forget that morning.

When I met Mr. Beecher again he came up to me eagerly. "Well? well? Yes, I knew what it would be to you!"

It shows the tact, the eagerness to be kind, of the man.

The Personal Charm of Wendell Phillips

Wendell Phillips had precisely that indefinable personal dignity and charm which Horace Greeley lacked; perhaps he had a little too much of it for an orator. You were so pleased with the man that you forgot the cause that he urged.

I saw him first when he came to Philadelphia during the war to fan the zeal of the Quaker wing of his party to fiercer heats. The audience was small, mostly made up of gentle, attentive women Friends, who in their white caps and dove-colored garments seemed to make a band around him of moderation and calm—virtuous but stifling. His brief, fiery sentences fell into it and went out as barbed arrows shot into a cushion. When he ended with a passionate appeal they looked mildly at each other, nodded and smiled, and a low "Um—um-m" of approval breathed through the hall.

When the next speaker rose Mr. Phillips found his way to the corner where we sat with the "world's people."

"Did you ever hear," he said abruptly, "of Sarah Siddons' first appearance in Edinburgh? She had heard that the Scotch were a lethargic folk and put forth all her powers to move them. Lady Macbeth was so terrible that night that she shivered with horror at herself; but her audience sat calm and dumb. In the sleep-walking scene she was used, in London, to see the whole house rise in terror; men would shriek and women be carried out fainting. But now there was unbroken silence until an old man in the pit chuckled and said aloud to his neighbor: 'Aweel, Sandy, that's nae so bad!'

"But the Philadelphians," he added with a forced laugh, "do not commit themselves as far as that!"

The Headquarters of the Underground Railroad

Yet these identical dove-colored women had lighted the torch which set the country on fire. The headquarters of the Abolition party was among the Philadelphia Quakers. Here for years was the Northern station of the famous secret Underground Railroad by which thousands of flying slaves escaped. The agent here was William Still, a grave, shrewd negro who died only last year, leaving a large fortune which he had amassed in trade.

The fugitive slaves came to him in every kind of disguise and were hid until they could be sent on to Canada. He published an account of it all after the war was over. No tragedy ever was more dramatic than these records set down from day to day. The slaves always gave him an account of themselves, their masters, their families. One evening came a couple of gray-haired old men, brothers, who had escaped from Alabama. They told him they had been sold when boys by their master in Maryland. Their mother and her baby were not sold. They never had seen or heard of either of them again.

"What was your Maryland master's name?" asked Still. They told him. He waited until the room was clear.

"I am your brother," he said. "I was the baby. But our mother is dead."

Another negro prominent in those days among the Abolitionists was a Mrs. Frances Harper, an able, ambitious woman, who lectured with a strange, bitter eloquence.

Charles Sumner was often in consultation with these Philadelphia leaders, but I never happened to see him. Whittier also came, and James Russell Lowell, whose first wife was a Philadelphia Friend. But Lowell's politics and poetry were, as a rule, kept inside of his books. He himself in every-day life was so simple, so sincere, so human, that you forgot that he had any higher calling than that of being the most charming of companions.

Mr. Whittier, on the contrary, was always the poet and the Abolitionist. He did not consciously pose, but he never for a moment forgot his mission. He was thin, mild and ascetic, looking like a Presbyterian country minister. He gave his views of slavery and the South with a gentle, unwearied obstinacy, exasperating to any one who knew that there was another side to the question.

William D. O'Connor was the most vehement of these reformers. He was a little man who wore a high hat and walked on tiptoe and talked loudly, always in superlatives, and hurled defiance at the Slave Power with every breath. He wrote a novel called Harrington, which he hoped would rout and vanquish it utterly.

After the war was over he took a brief for Bacon vs. Shakespeare, compiled a book which was an altar to Walt Whitman, but subsided at last into the Life-Saving Service Department, and did much quiet good work in the world.

An Efficient Band of Women Workers

Then there were many Quaker women, honest of heart, sweet of face, soft of speech and narrow in their beliefs, as only your gentle, soft woman can be. Chief among them were Mary Grew and Elizabeth Burleigh, who for many years lived and preached and worked together, close as a pair of Siamese twins.

It never occurred to any of this cult that they had come into the world for any other purpose than to reform it.

I remember that I was with Mary Grew and her friend when the news came of the final passage of the Fifteenth Amendment. The hope of their lives was accomplished. But they were silent for a long time.

"What will thee and I do now?" one said to the other drearily. "There is prison reform? Or we might stir up women to vote?"

They could hardly wait until the next day to begin.

The queen bee of this buzzing swarm was Lucretia Mott, one of the most remarkable women which this country has ever produced. Fugitive slaves, lecturers, reformers, everybody who wanted help and everybody who wanted to give help found their way to her quiet little farmhouse on the Old York Road; some were checked and some urged onward, but all were cared for and helped. No man in the Abolition party had a more vigorous brain or ready eloquence than this famous Quaker preacher, but much of her power came from the fact that she was one of the most womanly of women. She had pity and tenderness enough in her heart for the mother of mankind, and that keen sense of humor without which the tenderest of women is but a dull clod.

Even in extreme old age she was one of the most beautiful women I ever have seen. She was a little, vivid, delicate creature, alive with magnetic power. It is many years since that charming face with its wonderful luminous eyes was given back to the earth, but it is as real to me at this moment as ever.

I remember that once a Southern woman met Mrs. Mott at our house. With all slave-holders she had been taught to abhor her as the modern Borgia—the planner of war and murders. When she caught sight of her as she came into the room she gasped out, "Why! she looks like a saint!"

She talked much to her during the evening, and after she had gone said earnestly: "I believe that that woman is one of the saints of God!"

When you were with Mrs. Mott you were apt to think of her as the mother and housekeeper rather than as the leader of a party. She came from Nantucket, and until the day of her death kept up the homely, womanish habits of her youth. She might face a mob at night that threatened her life, or lecture to thousands of applauding disciples, but she never forgot in the morning to pick and shell the peas for dinner. Her fingers never were quiet. She knitted wonderful bed-spreads and made gay rag-carpets as wedding gifts for all of her descendants.

She had, oddly enough, the personal charm, the temperament, the hospitable soul of a Southern woman. I used wickedly to wish that she had been born "on the other side." How they would have appreciated her down there! How they would have exalted her and her memory long after she was dead!

And she——? Would she have preached Abolitionism if she had been born in Virginia?

The question is not foolish. I have known Southern women who abhorred slavery as much as did Lucretia Mott. They said little, they led no party, but they freed their slaves and made themselves poor for life.

We native Americans are all of one kin, whoever we may be. Scratch the skin of the Abolitionist or the slave-holder and you find the same blood—and good, honest, red blood it is!

Tom Reed on Roosevelt

REPRESENTATIVE John Fletcher Lacey, of Iowa, is a staunch supporter of Civil Service standards. In his fidelity to that policy he has the earnest backing of President Roosevelt, who is an admirer of the Iowa statesman.

The acquaintance of the two men began in an interesting way. A few days after Lacey took his seat in the Fifty-first Congress he met the late Thomas B. Reed in the Capitol cloak-room standing before a map of the United States and tracing the outlines of the States with a big cane.

"Figuring out your inevitable majority in the Speakership contest?" asked the Iowan good-naturedly.

"No," said Reed. "A young constituent of mine who has just failed in a Civil Service examination claims that a competitor passed safely by bribing the Examiners to give him a list of the questions in advance. I didn't believe my young friend and have sent him to the headquarters of the Civil Service Commission to tell his story there. While awaiting his return I have been figuring out on this map that if, say, Columbus, Ohio, represented too per cent. in a Civil Service table of markings, my constituent would come out somewhere about Jamaica, Long Island."

"I was amused," continued Representative Lacey, "by Reed's quaint way of stating his belief in his constituent's inability to pass the examination. While we discussed the subject of Civil Service in a general way in walked the young man who had failed and had gone to unburden his conviction to the Civil Service Commission that a rival had been successful through connivance with an agent of that service.

"'Well, what happened when you told your story?' Reed asked.

"'Why,' faltered the youth, 'a very emphatic fellow in charge there whipped out $100 in bills, laid them across his knee and exclaimed:

"'"I'll pay you $100, young man, if you can prove that a single syllable of what you say of corruption is true." That's all the satisfaction I got.'

"'And that's all you deserve,' added Reed.

"Then, turning to me," continued Mr. Lacey, "Reed said: 'We've got an American of blood and iron—a coming man—on the Civil Service Commission. I tell you, Lacey, you want to watch that Civil Service Commissioner, for he's a New World Bismarck and Cromwell combined. He'll be President some day.'

"'What's his name?' I asked.

"'Theodore Roosevelt,' replied Reed.

"Of course I had heard vaguely of Roosevelt, but, never having had any occasion to meet him," continued Mr. Lacey, "I had formed no definite opinion of him. Reed's characterization aroused in me the greatest curiosity to see this Roosevelt. The next day I called and introduced myself, and took the liberty to repeat what the young man had brought back about the $100 guarantee that no turpitude on the part of the Examiner in question existed.

"'I have resolved to purify the Civil Service system,' was Mr. Roosevelt's reply, 'and to that end have placed in charge men whom I trust with my whole heart, and I stand ready, therefore, to pledge my fortune and my honor to the sacredness with which they respect the trust I repose in them.'

"I have never forgotten the thrill of delight that manly utterance gave me," added Mr. Lacey.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE suicide of Charles Cressler had occurred on the tenth of June, and the news of it, together with the wretched story of his friend's final surrender to a temptation he had never outlived, reached Curtis Jadwin early on the morning of the eleventh.

He and Gretry were at their accustomed places in the latter's office, and the news seemed to shut out all the sunshine that had been flooding in through the broad plate-glass windows. After their first incoherent horror, the two sat staring at each other, speechless.

"My God! my God!" groaned Jadwin, as if in the throes of a deadly sickness. "He was in the Crookes' ring, and we never knew it—I've killed him, Sam. I might as well have held that pistol myself." He stamped his foot, striking his fist across his forehead. "Cressler—my best friend—Charlie—Charlie Cressler! Oh, I shall go mad if this—if this——"

"Steady, steady does it, J.," warned the broker, his hand upon his shoulder; "we got to keep a grip on ourselves to-day. We've got a lot to think of. We'll think about Charlie later. Just now, . . . well, it's business now. Mathewson and Knight have called us for margins—twenty thousand dollars."

He laid the slip down in front of Jadwin as he sat at his desk.

"Oh, this can wait," muttered Jadwin. "Let it go till this afternoon; I can't talk business now. Think of Carrie—Mrs. Cressler, I——"

"N—no," answered Gretry reflectively and slowly, 'ooking anywhere but in Jadwin's face. "N—no, I don't think we'd better wait. I think we'd better meet these margin calls promptly. It's always better to keepour trades margined up."

Jadwin faced around.

"Why," he cried, "one would think, to hear you talk, as though there was danger of me busting here at any hour."

Gretry did not answer. There was a moment's silence. Then the broker caught his principal's eye and held it a second.

"Well," he answered, "you saw how freely they sold to us in the Pit yesterday. We've got to buy, and buy and buy, to keep our price up; and look here, look at these reports from our correspondents; everything points to a banner crop. There's been an increase of acreage everywhere because of our high prices. See this from Travers"—he picked up a dispatch and read: "'Preliminary return of spring wheat with two Dakotas, subject to revision, indicate a total area seeded of sixteen million acres, which, added to area in winter-wheat States, makes total of forty-three million, or nearly four million acres greater than last year.'"

"Lot of blamed sentiment," cried Jadwin, refusing to be convinced. "Two-thirds of that wheat won't grade, and Europe will take nearly all of it. What we ought to do is to send our men into the Pit and buy another million, buy more than these fools can offer. Buy 'em to a standstill."

"That takes a big pile of money, then," said the broker. "More than we can lay our hands on this morning. The best we can do is to take all the Bears are offering, and support the market. The moment they offer us wheat and we don't buy it, that moment—as you know yourself—they'll throw wheat at you by the train load, and the price will break, and we with it."

"Think we'll get rid of much wheat to-day?" demanded Jadwin.

By now it had become vitally necessary for Jadwin to sell out his boldings. His "long line" was a fearful expense; insurance and storage charges were eating rapidly into the profits. He must get rid of the load he was carrying, little by little. To do this at a profit he had adopted the expedient of flooding the Pit with buying orders just before the close of the session, and then, as the price rose under this stimulus, selling quickly, before it had time to break. At first this had succeeded. But of late he must buy more and more to keep the price up, while the moment that he began to sell the price began to drop; so that now, in order to sell one bushel, he must buy two.

"Think we can unload much on 'em to-day?" repeated Jadwin.

"I don't know," answered Gretry slowly and thoughtfully. "Perhaps—there's a chance—— Frankly, J., I don't think we can. The Pit is taking heart, that's the truth of it. Those fellows are not so scared of us as they were a while ago. It's the new crop, as I've said over and over again. We've put wheat so high that all the farmers have planted it, and are getting ready to dump it on us. The Pit knows that, of course. Why, just think, they are harvesting in some places. And that Government report yesterday showed that the growing wheat is in good condition."

"Nothing of the sort. It was a little over eighty-six."

"Good enough," declared Gretry; "good enough so that it broke the price down to a dollar and twenty. Just think, we were at a dollar and a half a little while ago."

"And we'll be at two dollars in another ten days, I tell you."

"Do you know how we stand, J.?" said the broker gravely. "Do you know how we stand—financially? It's taken pretty nearly every cent of our ready money to support this July market. Oh, we can figure out our paper profits into the millions. We've got thirty, forty, fifty million bushels of wheat that's worth over a dollar a bushel, but if we can't sell it we're none the better off—and that wheat is costing us five or six thousand a day. Now, old man, where's the money going to come from? You don't seem to realize that we are in a precarious condition." He raised an arm and pointed above him, in the direction of the floor of the Board of Trade.

"The moment we can't give our boys—Landry Court and the rest of 'em—the moment we can't give them buying orders, that Pit will suck us down like a chip. The moment we admit that we can't buy all the wheat that's offered, there's the moment we bust."

"Well, we'll buy it," cried Jadwin through his set teeth. "I'll show those brutes. Look here, is it money we want? You cable to Paris and offer two million at—oh, at eight cents below the market; and to Liverpool, and let 'em have twopence off on the same amount. They'll snap it up as quick as look at it. That will bring in one lot of money, and as for the rest I guess I've got some real estate in this town that's pretty good security."

"What—you going to mortgage part of that?"

"No," cried Jadwin, jumping up with a quick, impatient gesture, "no; I'm going to mortgage all of it, and I'm going to do it to-day—this morning. If you say we're in a precarious condition, it's no time for half-measures. I'll have more money than you'll know what to do with in the Illinois Trust by three o'clock this afternoon, and when the Board opens to-morrow morning I'm going to light into those cattle in the Pit there so as they'll think a locomotive has struck 'em. They'd stand me off, would they? They'd try to sell me down; they won't cover when I turn the screw! I'll show 'em, Sam Gretry. I'll run wheat up so high before the next two days that the Bank of England can't pull it down, and before the Pit can catch its breath I'll sell our long line, and with the profits of that I'll run it right up again. Two dollars! Why, it will be two fifty here so quick you won't know how it's happened. I've just been fooling with this crowd until now. Now I'm really going to get down to business."

Gretry did not answer. He twirled his pencil between his fingers and stared down at the papers on his desk. Once he started to speak, but checked himself. Then at last he turned about.

"All right," he said briskly. "We'll see what that will do."

"I'm going over to the Illinois Trust now," said Jadwin, putting on his hat. "When your boys come in for their orders tell them for to-day just to support the market. If there's much wheat offered they'd better buy it. Tell them not to let the market go below a dollar twenty. When I come back we'll make out those cables."

That day Jadwin carried out his program so vehemently announced to his broker. Upon every piece of real estate that he owned—and for its full value—he placed as heavy a mortgage as the property would stand. Even his old house on Michigan Avenue, even the "homestead" on North State Street was encumbered. But he did more than this. The time was come, he felt, for the grand coup, the last huge strategical move, the concentration of every piece of heavy artillery. Never in all his multitude of operations on the Chicago Board of Trade had he failed. He knew he would not fail now; Luck, the golden goddess, still stayed at his shoulder. He did more than mortgage his property; he floated a number of promissory notes. His credit, always unimpeachable, he taxed to its farthest stretch; from every source he gathered in the sinews of the war he was waging. No sum was too great to daunt him, none too small to be overlooked. Reserves, van and rear, battle-line and skirmish outposts he summoned together to form one single vast column of attack.

It was on this same day while Jadwin, pressed for money, was leaving no stone unturned to secure ready cash, that he came across old Hargus in his usual place in Gretry's customers' room, reading a two-days'-old newspaper. Of a sudden an idea occurred to Jadwin. He took the old man aside. "Hargus," he said, "do you want a good investment for your money, that money I turned over to you? I can give you a better rate than the bank, and pretty good security. Let me have about a hundred thousand at—oh, ten per cent."

"Hey—what?" asked the old fellow querulously. Jadwin repeated his request.

But Hargus cast a suspicious glance at him and drew away.

"I—I don't lend my money," he observed.

"Why—you old fool," exclaimed Jadwin. "How is it—more interest you want? Why, we'll say fifteen per cent., if you like."

"I don't lend my money," exclaimed Hargus, shaking his head. "I ain't got any to lend," and with the words took himself off.

One source of help alone Jadwin left untried. Sorely tempted, he nevertheless kept himself from involving his wife's money in the hazard. Laura, in her own name, was possessed of a little fortune; sure as he was of winning, Jadwin none the less hesitated from seeking an auxiliary here. He felt it was a matter of pride; he could not bring himself to make use of a woman's succor.

But his entire personal fortune now swung in the balance. It was the last fight, the supreme attempt, the final, consummate assault; and the thrill of a victory more brilliant, more conclusive, more decisive than any he had ever known vibrated in Jadwin's breast as he went to and fro in Jackson, Adams and La Salle Streets all through that day of the eleventh.

But he knew the danger—knew just how terrible was to be the grapple. Once that same day a certain detail of business took him near to the entrance of the floor. Though he did not so much as look inside the doors, he could not but hear the thunder of the Pit; and even in that moment of confidence, his great triumph only a few hours distant, Jadwin, for the instant, stood daunted. The roar was appalling, the Niagara was again unchained, the maëlstrom was again unleashed. And during the briefest of seconds he could fancy that the familiar bellow of its swirling had taken on another pitch. Out of that hideous turmoil, he imagined, there issued a strange, unwonted note; as it were, the first rasp and grind of a new avalanche just beginning to stir, a diapason more profound than any he had yet known, a hollow, distant bourdon as of the slipping and sliding of some almighty and chaotic power trembled in the air.

It was the Wheat, the Wheat. It was on the move again. From the farms of Illinois and Iowa, from the ranches of Kansas and Nebraska, from all the reaches of the Middle West, the Wheat, like a tidal wave, was rising, rising. Almighty, blood-brother to the earthquake, coeval with the volcano and the whirlwind, that gigantic world-force, that colossal billow, nourisher of the nations, was swelling and advancing.

There in the Pit its first premonitory eddies already swirled and spun. If even the first ripples of the tide smote terribly upon the heart, what was it to be when the ocean itself burst through, on its eternal way from West to East?

For an instant came clear vision.

What were these shouting, gesticulating men of the Board of Trade, these brokers, traders and speculators?

It was not these he fought. It was the Wheat; it was—as Gretry had said—the very Earth itself. What were those scattered hundreds of farmers of the Middle West who, because he had put the price so high, had planted the grain as never before? What had they to do with it? Why, the Wheat had grown itself; demand and supply, these were the two great laws the Wheat obeyed.

Almost blasphemous in his effrontery, he had tampered with these laws, and had roused a Titan. He had laid his puny human grasp upon creation, and the very Earth herself, the Great Mother, feeling the touch of the cobweb that the human insect had spun, had stirred at last in her sleep and sent her omnipotence moving through the grooves of the world, to find and crush the disturber of her appointed courses.

But Jadwin hurried away from the sound of the near roaring of the Pit. No, no. Luck was with him; he had mastered the current of the Pit many times before—he would master it again. The day passed and the night, and at nine o'clock the following morning he and Gretry once more met in the broker's office.

Gretry turned a pale face upon his principal.

"I've just received," he said, "the answers to our cables to Liverpool and Paris. I offered wheat at both places, as you ordered, cheaper than we've ever offered it there before."

"Yes—well?"

"Well," answered Gretry, looking gravely into Jadwin's eyes—"Well, . . . they won't take it."

On the morning of her birthday—the thirteenth of the month—when Laura descended to the breakfast-room she found Page already there. Though it was barely half-past seven her sister was already dressed for the street. She wore a smart new hat with a red feather, and as she stood by the French windows looking out she drew her gloves back and forth between her fingers with a nervous, impatient gesture.

"Why," said Laura, as she sat down at her place—"Why, Pagie, what is in the wind to-day?"

"Landry is coming," Page explained, facing about and glancing at the watch pinned to her waist. "He is going to take me down to see the Board of Trade—from the visitors' gallery, you know. He said this would probably be a great day. Did Mr. Jadwin come home last night?"

Laura shook her head, without speech. She did not choose to put into words the fact that for three days—with the exception of an hour or two, on the evening of that horrible day of her visit to the Cresslers' house—she had seen nothing of her husband.

"Landry says," continued Page, "that it is awful—down there, these days. He says that it is the greatest fight in the history of La Salle Street. Has Mr. Jadwin said anything to you? Is he going to win?"

"I don't know," answered Laura in a low voice; "I don't know anything about it, Page."

She was wondering if even Page had forgotten. When she had come into the room her first glance had been toward her place at table. But there was nothing there, not even so much as an envelope; and no one had so much as wished her joy of the little anniversary. She had thought Page might have remembered, but her sister's next words showed that she had more on her mind than birthdays.

"Laura," she began, sitting down opposite to her, and unfolding her napkin with laborious precision—"Laura—Landry and I—— Well, . . . we're going to be married in the fall."

"Why, Pagie," cried Laura, "I'm just as glad as I can be for you. He's a fine, clean fellow, and I know he will make you a good husband."

"Well," she said, "I'm glad you think so, too. Before you and Mr. Jadwin were married I wasn't sure about having him care for me, because at that time—well——" Page looked up with a queer little smile. "I guess you could have had him—if you had wanted to."

"Oh, that," cried Laura. "Why, Landry never really cared for me. It was all the silliest kind of flirtation. The moment he knew you better, I stood no chance at all."

"We're going to take an apartment on Michigan Avenue, near the Auditorium," said Page, "and keep house. We've talked it all over, and know just how much it will cost to live and keep one servant. I'm going to serve the loveliest little dinners; I've learned the kind of cooking he likes already. Oh, I guess there he is now," she cried, as they heard the front door close.

Landry came in, carrying a great bunch of cut flowers and a box of candy. He was as spruce as though he were already the bridegroom, his cheeks pink, his blond hair radiant. But he was thin and a little worn, a dull, feverish glitter came and went in his eyes, and his nervousness, the strain and excitement which beset him, was in his every gesture, in every word of his rapid speech.

"We'll have to hurry," he told Page. "I must be down there hours ahead of him this morning."

"How is Curtis?" demanded Laura. "Have you seen him lately? How is he getting on with—with his speculating?"

Landry made a sharp gesture of resignation.

"I don't know," he answered. "I guess nobody knows. We had a fearful day yesterday, but I think we controlled the situation at the end. We ran the price up and up and up till I thought it would never stop. If the Pit thought Mr. Jadwin was beaten, I guess they found out how they were mistaken. For a time there we were just driving them. But then Mr. Gretry sent word to us in the Pit to sell, and we couldn't hold them. They came back at us like wolves; they beat the price down five cents in as many minutes. We had to quit selling, and buy again. But then Mr. Jadwin went at them with a rush. Oh, it was grand. We steadied the price at a dollar and fifteen, stiffened it up to eighteen and a half, and then sent it up again, three cents at a time, till we'd hammered it back to a dollar and a quarter."

"But Curtis himself," inquired Laura, "is he all right—is he well?"

"I only saw him once," answered Landry. "He was in Mr. Gretry's office. Yes, he looked all right. He's nervous, of course. But Mr. Gretry looks like the sick man. He looks all frazzled out."

"I guess we'd better be going," said Page, getting up from the table. "Have you had your breakfast, Landry? Won't you have some coffee?"

"Oh, I breakfasted hours ago," he answered. "But you are right. We had better be moving. If you are going to get a seat in the gallery you must be there half an hour ahead of time, to say the least. Shall I take any word to your husband from you, Mrs. Jadwin?"

"Tell him that I wish him good luck," she answered, "and—yes, ask him if he remembers what day of the month this is—or no, don't ask him that. Say nothing about it. Just tell him I send him my very best love and that I wish him all the success in the world."

It was about nine o'clock when Landry and Page reached the foot of La Salle Street. The morning was fine and cool. The sky over the Board of Trade sparkled with sunlight, and the air was full of fluttering wings of the multitude of pigeons that lived off of the leakage of grain around the Board of Trade building.

"Mr. Cressler used to feed them regularly," said Landry as they paused on the street corner opposite the Board. "Poor, poor Mr. Cressler—the funeral is to-morrow, you know."

"Oh," she murmured, "think, think of Laura finding him there like that. Oh, it would have killed me, it would have killed me!"

"Somehow," observed Landry, a puzzled expression in his eyes—"Somehow, by George! she don't seem to mind very much. You'd have thought a shock like that would have made her sick."

"Oh! Laura," cried Page. "I don't know her any more these days, she is just like stone—just as though she were crowding down every emotion or any feeling she ever had. She seems to be holding herself in with all her strength—for something—and afraid to let go a finger, for fear she would give way altogether. When she told me—about that morning at the Cresslers' house—her voice was just like ice; she said, 'Mr. Cressler has shot himself. I found him dead in his library.' She never shed a tear, and she spoke, oh, in such a dreadful monotone. Oh! dear," cried Page, "I wish all this was over, and we could all get away from Chicago, and take Mr. Jadwin with us, and get him back to be as he used to be, always so light-hearted and thoughtful and kindly. He used to be making jokes from morning till night. Oh, I loved him just as if he were my father."

They crossed the street, and Landry, taking her by the arm, ushered her into the corridor on the ground floor of the Board.

"Now, keep close to me," he said, "and see if we can get through somewhere here."

The stairs leading up to the main floor were already crowded with visitors, some standing in line close to the wall, others aimlessly wandering up and down, looking and listening, their heads in the air. One of these, a gentleman with a tall white hat, shook his head at Landry and Page as they pressed by him.

"You can't get up there," he said, "even if they let you in. They're packed in like sardines already."

But Landry reassured Page with a knowing nod of his head.

"I told the guide up in the gallery to reserve a seat for you. I guess we'll manage."

But when they reached the staircase that connected the main floor with the visitors' gallery it became a question as to whether or not they could even get to the seat. The crowd was packed solidly upon the stairs, between the wall and the balustrades. There were men in top hats and women in silks; while mixed with these one saw the faded and shabby wrecks that perennially drifted about the Board of Trade, the failures who sat on the chairs of the customers' rooms day in and day out reading old newspapers, smoking vile cigars. And there were young men of the type of clerks and bookkeepers, young men with drawn, worn faces, and hot, tired eyes, who pressed upward, silent, their lips compressed, listening intently to the indefinite, echoing murmur that was filling the building.

For on this morning of the thirteenth of June the Board of Trade, its halls, corridors, offices and stairways were already thrilling with a vague and terrible sound. The trading would not begin for another half-hour, but even now the mutter of the whirlpool, the growl of the Pit, was making itself felt.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

℄No man is a hero to his press agent.

℄A banknote's beauty depends upon its figure.

℄When people are absolutely certain, doubt smiles.

℄Man's supreme vanity is his belief that he is less vain than woman.

℄Some hunt trouble; some go to law, and some buy on the installment plan.

The Last Inch

THE difference between ordinary and extraordinary men is not so considerable as many think. The great are only a little greater than their fellows.

Two students in an American university were rivals for the headship of their class. One had a grade of 98.4 and the other 98.5. It was a small difference, only one-tenth of one. At last the student who lacked that necessary tenth to be the equal of his competitor watched the other's window at night. He put out his light and still watched the window. He saw that his opponent studied fifteen minutes longer than he did on the morrow's lessons. He waited until that window was dark, and then lighting his own lamp he studied thirty minutes longer. This he did, night after night, watching the window, and studying only a little longer than he had studied before, and at the close of that semester received a grade of 99.6. He won by virtue of that little more.

It has been said, "The world pays a big price for the last two or three inches." A poet puts it:

A little more, and how much it is;
A little less, and what worlds away!

It is not always a matter of time and application. It is sometimes a question of natural capacity. The great man has been endowed with a little more wisdom, a little more foresight, a little more genius than most men; so he leaves them behind in the race. But in a large number of instances it is a matter of industry, of enthusiasm, of persistence. Many who fail stop only a little short of all that is needed to succeed.

A Sure Investment

AND now comes a professor in a Western university with the glad tidings that humanity's ages-old dream of independence is within reach of every man because under modern conditions $200 a year will keep one fed, clothed and lodged, and leave something over for amusement. And, as if to confirm this good cheer, we have the President of the Steel Trust saying that he has tried living on five hundred a year and on five hundred thousand, and was better off on five hundred.

It is no discredit to the advice to these worthy men to point out that the professor is not living on two hundred a year, but on not less than six times two hundred, and that the President of the Steel Trust is still pushing the work on his three—or is it four?—million-dollar house overlooking the Hudson in New York City. Many's the preacher whose frailties of flesh prevent him from obeying the maxims of mind. If we accepted truth only from those who exemplify it we should not be able to believe even ourselves.

But is it true that a man would be wise to live on two or five hundred dollars a year if he could earn enough to live better than that? Isn't there something wrong with the Western professor's idea of independence? Isn't there something wrong with the President of the Steel Trust's idea of happiness? Would a man, who from choice lived on a few hundred dollars a year and was happy, be desirable as a friend, a father, a brother, a son, a husband, a citizen, a human being?

There is no question that the first aim of every sensible man is to achieve independence; and that undoubtedly means sacrifice to lay by something for the rainy days and the enforced rest of extreme old age. But——

For most of the days of the years of a man's life from twenty until seventy, or, if he takes good care of his health, eighty even, independence does not consist in a bank account or in property of any kind. It consists in a well-trained brain and well-trained hands and good health. Other kinds of capital are subject to countless perils, to endless fluctuations in value. There is never a moment, good times or bad, when the capable brain and capable hands are not in demand. If anything, they are more in demand in bad times than in good. Good times bring employment to all, regardless of capacity; and often the good worker of whatever kind is then relatively least benefited. In bad times the capable man is master of the situation, for he alone can save it from ruin.

The mere "nest-egg" kind of independence has its greatest charm for the lazy fellow who longs to quit work and is always afraid he'll be invited to do so. If an intelligent, capable, energetic man, in the pursuit of that kind of independence, should stint himself body and brain, should follow the miserly prescriptions of the parsimony-preaching professor, where would be his gain? He would go through this fair world like the fellow who rides on the trucks of the car-wheels to save himself the expense of a railway ticket. He would be the man who sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. Instead of expanding, his nature would be ever contracting. Instead of learning, he would be ever fighting against learning—if he should learn, he might acquire expensive tastes and so increase expenses. Friends, wife, children, social connections, he would have none of them—all such are costly. And they would have none of him. He would better go hang than adopt the professor's prescription.

In a day when the greatest capitalists tremble before the superior brain of a man who despises money, what nonsense to dream of independence in any true and noble sense through skimping and skinflinting and starving and self-degradation for the sake of a nest-egg that may be stolen or stale or rotten when the time comes to use it.

As for the Steel President's eulogy of the superior days of five hundred a year, possibly he would not have uttered it had his notion of happiness been a little more respectful of his nerves and his stomach. True, a man who has nothing is in no danger of overeating. But that does not constitute an argument for starvation, nor does it impair the truth that a man who has more than enough is not absolutely bound to try to eat it all at once.

It is easier to refrain from unwise pleasures on five hundred a year than on five hundred thousand. But it is not difficult so to spend five hundred thousand a year that one's own happiness will be great—great especially in the happiness and prosperity of those whom that five hundred thousand, judiciously invested, usefully and honorably employs.

Your Pet Superstition

MR. WISTER proposes to follow his Virginian with a novel centring about the belief in vampires which, he has discovered, survives in its ancient vigor "within sound of New England express locomotives."

At first blush this survival seems astounding. But when Mr. Wister's novel starts the discussion, as it doubtless will, we shall probably learn that there is no part of the country, not even the precincts of our colleges and universities, without its superstitions full as absurd if not so quaint as the belief in vampires. The fact is, science is too new, too modern, to have made the impression upon credulity we commonly credit to it.

Andrew Jackson believed all his life that the world was flat. In his earlier period he believed it aggressively; in later years even his stern moral fibre yielded to dread of ridicule, and he received an assertion that the world was round with a sullen, angry silence almost as eloquent as speech. Beyond question the demonstrations of science have not convinced thousands of intelligent people who have Jacksonian discretion as to concealing their disbelief or are constrained by fear of ridicule to hypocritical profession of belief. If this is true of scientific matters, how much wider-spread must be credulity in matters with which science deals only indirectly. Fortune-tellers, palmists, shell-gazers, mediums, soothsayers do a smashing business—and all of us know that their customers are among our friends, and not among the illiterate. Indeed, how many of us have not a lingering belief, or at least an absence of a clear and positive disbelief, in regard to some superstition—dreams, or ghosts, or posts, or numbers, or ladders? Are you sure that you yourself are convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt of the truth of science's basic theory—the law of causation? Do you understand, as you understand why two and two are four, why palmistry and fortune-telling and thirteen at table and the like are nonsense—are of a piece with the child's belief in Santa Claus and Cotton Mather's belief in witches and King Edward's belief in the Evil Eye?

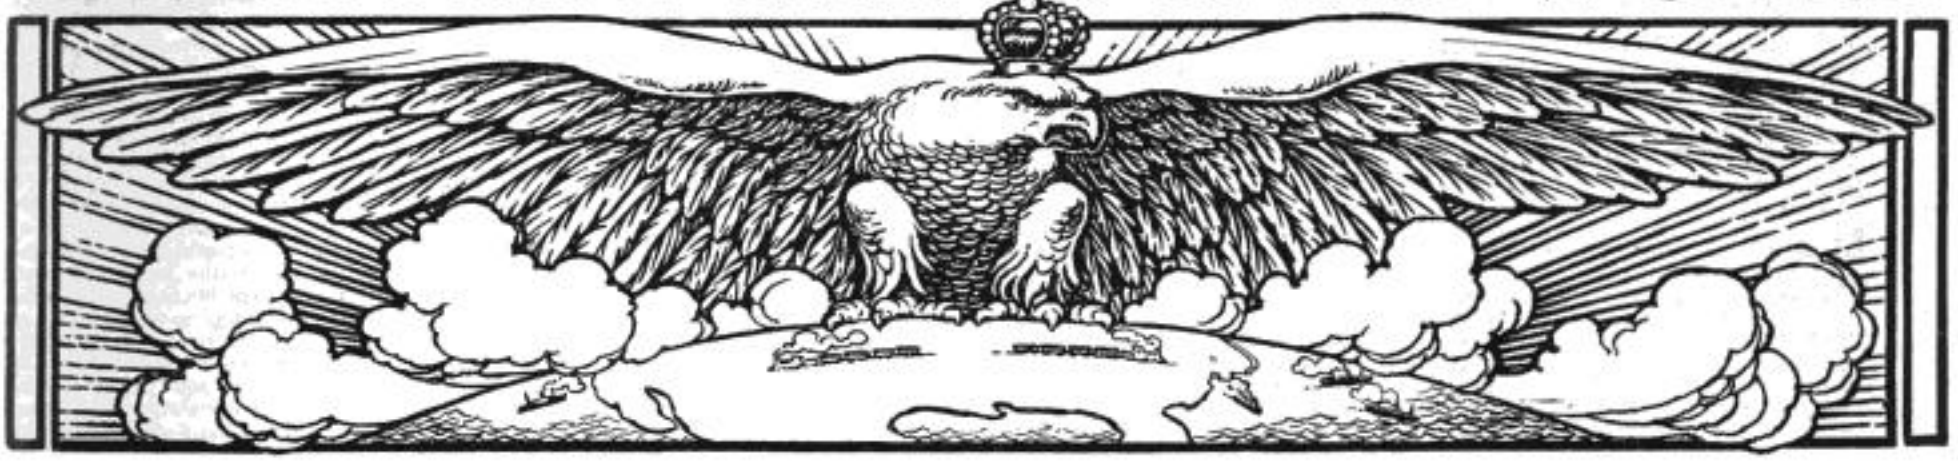
Of all peoples we are the least superstitious—partly because we have been so long and so far away from the folk-lore of Europe, chiefly because we are the best-educated people in the world in the education of modern science. Yet there is by no means so much difference as there should be between our day and that of the assassination of "Great Julius," when—

The sheeted dead
Did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets.

The reason is—imperfect education. Perfect education makes one not only know but also know why he knows. It trains the mind to reason. It takes the child with "why?" ever on its lips and develops its mind naturally by answering its "why?" by encouraging it to reason out the answer. And the result is that to learn becomes a pleasure. Reason is the knife and fork with which proper education cuts up the mass of knowledge into bits that can be digested and assimilated. But unfortunately our education has too much of the quick lunch about it. It rests on the notion that knowledge is the end and aim, whereas the truth is that knowledge is a mere means of developing the reasoning faculty which will enable the man or woman to meet and solve the varied problems life presents to the mind.

When we think how little time is spent in teaching a child to reason, how often its "why?" is "sat upon," we no longer wonder that so many children begin bright and grow steadily less inquiring, less fond of knowledge; and we understand why superstitious credulity dies hard even among the so-called educated, if indeed it be dying. The startling neglect of the simple yet vital science and art of reasoning is wholly responsible for those amazing differences of opinion about matters as to which reasonable people cannot disagree. It explains why so many are ready to believe almost anything, why so few of those who believe right have a clear notion of the grounds of their beliefs. It explains, perhaps more fully than we suspect, the moral vagaries of those who apparently ought to know better—children of educated, affectionate, exemplary parents.

Teaching a child to reason should be as much a matter of course as teaching it to walk or to read and write.



The Passing of the "Strenuous Life"

STRENUOSITY has palled. We have heard so much of it that we skip the phrase just as we grew wearied of the word crank or of the apt innocuous desuetude. Within the present year five college presidents made speeches from the same platform. All but one mentioned the strenuous life. Four Cabinet officials opened the campaign. All were true to the strenuous. But there was so much of it that audiences began to smile, and when ridicule begins strenuosity quits. Even President Roosevelt in one of his latest speeches dropped strenuosity and pleaded eloquently for the simple life, which is only another phrase for the practical life.

Change and not idleness is the only true rest. Edison reads novels. Morgan loves art. District Attorney Jerome is a first-rate carpenter. Lord Salisbury is an expert chemist. President Cassatt is the best road-builder in the United States. In literature—the clearing-house of ability—astonishment is frequent that the best books are not written by professional writers. In the recent unprecedented irruption of fiction there are many business names, and they will increase with the years. We investigate and we find that all great work can be traced back to business and its discipline. The living principle of constant work is based on business. With the experience and variety it gives comes the broader understanding of life and character. When this gets upon the printed page it is real; when it is expressed in dollars and cents it counts mightily; when it shows in men and women it makes for higher and better living; when it is summed up in all its relations it exhibits the credit totals of society and civilization.

The MONEY KINGS of the WORLD

By WILLIAM T. STEAD

Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan

THE last time I saw Mr. Pierpont Morgan was in St. Paul's Cathedral. It was at the funeral service of Cecil Rhodes. Mr. Morgan had arrived in London only the previous day and I hardly expected that he would be able to be present to pay the last tribute of respect to his great predecessor. There he was, however, sitting in the most conspicuous stall in the choir, and looking down upon the sea of faces which filled every nook and corner of the vast cathedral. As Edward VII attended as chief mourner the obsequies of Queen Victoria, so Mr. Pierpont Morgan was properly conspicuous when the last solemn rites were paid to the African Colossus. Cecil Rhodes was dead and Pierpont Morgan reigned in his stead.

Mr. Pierpont Morgan, unlike many of the Money Kings of the present day, was born in the purple. He was the son of a famous banker, in the line of financial succession, an heir-apparent from his birth, whereas most of the Money Kings, like Cecil Rhodes, have forced their way to the front ranks from the outside, as American Presidents have made their way from log cabin to White House. Physically Mr. Morgan bears some resemblance to Mr. Rhodes in that both were men above the average stature and of commanding physique. But there the resemblance ceased. Pierpont Morgan, although sixty-five years of age, is a man of physical vigor and robust vitality. Cecil Rhodes died of heart disease before he reached his fiftieth year. If Mr. Morgan, like Mr. Rhodes, had died before he had completed his half-century his name would long ago have been forgotten. Before then he was merely a banker in a good way of business, intelligent, trustworthy, with a wide range of interests outside Wall Street. But that was all. His present commanding position in the world was achieved after he had passed his sixtieth year. In this he differs from most of his countrymen, whose signal victories have often been achieved at an age when a European considers that his career is only beginning.

The Achievements of the Great Amalgamation

Mr. Rhodes' great financial reputation arose from his skill in amalgamating the various diamond companies which now form the colossal trust known as the De Beers Consolidated Mines. Mr. Pierpont Morgan has consolidated nearly every kind of business in the world excepting the mining for diamonds, in which he has up to the present shown little interest.

But, whereas Mr. Rhodes used his financial amalgamations chiefly, if not solely, for the purpose of acquiring political power, Mr. Pierpont Morgan, like the proverbial cobbler, sticks to his last. His domain is in the world of business. His operations necessarily involve political questions, but indirectly. We have as yet no indication that the American Money King, when he has consolidated his financial position, will use it as a throne from which to influence the policy of nations. Mr. Rhodes for many years was regarded, even by his intimate associates, as a mere financier and millionaire. It was only those in his intimate confidence who were aware of the far-reaching designs which he cherished in the inner recesses of his secret mind. It may be the same with Mr. Pierpont Morgan, who may yet carry out on a vaster scale projects which, although based on finance, will be distinctly political. This, however, is merely a speculation. No such horrifying idea has yet dawned on the sluggish imagination of the Englishman. He is quite sufficiently scared already by the spectre of Pierpont Morgan as the master of the financial resources of the world. If he were seriously to contemplate the idea of Mr. Morgan following in Mr. Rhodes' footsteps and using his wealth for political ends, his existence would become a waking nightmare. Even as it is, Mr. Morgan is regarded in the Old World as the uncrowned King of America. His personality overshadows even that of the masterful occupant of the White House, and it struck no one with surprise that Mr. Roosevelt did not succeed in bringing about a settlement of the coal strike until Mr. Morgan intervened, and by inducing the operators to consent to arbitration saved the Atlantic seaboard from the imminent horrors of a coal famine in the depths of winter.

Editor's Note—This is the fourth paper on this subject by Mr. Stead. The next will appear in an early number.

Mr. Rhodes, it used to be said, thinks in continents. But his successor, it might be said with equal justice, seems to meditate in hemispheres. Mr. Rhodes was the Colossus of Africa; Mr. Pierpont Morgan is the Colossus of two worlds. With the right foot planted in Wall Street, the left in Capel Court, he bestrides the Atlantic, and prepares for the economic conquest of the world. Such is, at least, the vision of Mr. Morgan which affrights and fascinates the imagination of dwellers on one side of the Atlantic.

Last summer Mr. Gates declared that Mr. Morgan was but in his infancy, and that what he has done is nothing to what he means to do. His schemes, according to Mr. Gates, embrace the entire world. Whether this be so or not Mr. Morgan has realized sufficient of his schemes to satisfy the ambition of a financial Napoleon. It is not the place here to enter with detail into the great financial combinations by which he has dazzled everybody. The financial assistance he has rendered from time to time to the American Government does not differ materially from that which the Rothschilds have rendered to other governments. His fame broadly rests upon three great achievements. The first was the great amalgamation of the railroads, the second the great combination known as the Steel Trust, and the third, and by far the most sensational from the European point of view, is the great combination of the Atlantic steamship lines. Around these three great "Things Done" in the career of the great Amalgamator there are crowded an infinity of minor undertakings, any one of which would have made the fortune of an ordinary man, but which constitute a mere background of detail important only as showing up in broader relief the great achievements of his life. I shall not trouble the readers of this sketch with elaborate statistics as to the number of dollars controlled by this or that combination which Mr. Morgan has brought into being. If, as I have said, Mr. Morgan meditates in hemispheres, the figures of his financial operations need to be stated in figures which are usually reserved for describing the distances between the fixed stars.

Morgan's Nine-Billion-Dollar Kingdom

People talk a great deal about millions, but none of us realizes what is a million, much less a billion. Even the possessor of a million has but a vague realization of the amount of his investments. To attempt a catalogue of all the enterprises which Mr. Morgan has touched with his Midas finger would occupy all the space of this article, and the only effect of a rapid summary of all the capital of the various trusts and combinations with which Mr. Morgan has been concerned would be to confuse the mind by a vast jumble of figures. What with millions here and millions there and billions round the corner the reader feels as bewildered as Alice in Wonderland. He is hopelessly lost. He acquires only a vague sense of vast resources all centring in Mr. Morgan's office in Wall Street, and stretching out to infinity. Suffice it to say that, according to the statement current at the time when Mr. Morgan intervened to settle the coal strike, the associated capital of the enterprises with which he was connected in one shape or another was stated to have mounted up to $9,000,000,000, a sum which is easily written down on paper, but whose full meaning transcends the human imagination. To invert Mr. Carlyle's phrase concerning the man who owns sixpence being the master of the world to the length of that sixpence, Mr. Morgan's monarchy and mastery may be measured by the nine thousand million dollars over which he exercises more or less control. That may be regarded as the limit of his kingdom.

It is not generally believed that Mr. Morgan is himself a very rich man when compared with such a Crœsus as Mr. Rockefeller. As one of his friends declares, if he is allowed to boss the show he does not care who gets the money—a statement that is true only with limitations. That he is a multi-millionaire in his own right is, of course, admitted; but the millions over which Mr. Morgan has the right of ownership are as nothing compared with the millions he is able to influence by the ascendency which he has obtained over the imagination of mankind, and the confidence with which he is regarded by the millionaires of London and New York. Just as the German Emperor is King over the comparatively small area of Prussia, but possesses more or less sovereign rights over the wider area of the German Empire, and is able by virtue of his alliances to control the whole naval and military resources of Austria-Hungary and Italy, so Mr. Morgan, from the nucleus of his own fortune as a banker, exercises over other fortunes power in very much the same way as that wielded by the German Emperor in varying degrees over different properties.

A Comparison with the German Kaiser

If the position of Mr. Morgan resembles that of the German Emperor in the varying degrees of control which he exercises in the one case over territory and in the other case over capital, there is also considerable similarity between the two men. Yet if current report may be believed the Kaiser was considerably disappointed in Mr. Morgan owing to his lack of interest and total indifference to such a phenomenon as the growth of modern Socialism.

"Try as I could," the Kaiser is reported to have said, "his conversation failed to reveal to me that he had any clear comprehension of the vast harmonies and conflicts of the commercial universe. I was amazed to find him not well informed regarding the historical and philosophical development of nations. His political economy leaves him unconcerned regarding Socialism, which undoubtedly will soon constitute the most stupendous question everywhere. Mr. Morgan confessed that he had never been sufficiently interested to study into exactly what Socialism means."

Although the Kaiser has fêted Mr. Morgan almost as a brother monarch he has always regarded him somewhat askance. Some two or three years ago, meeting a party of French tourists in Norway, the Kaiser expressed grave misgivings as to the impalpable, unassailable power which Mr. Morgan might exercise in the control of the mercantile marine of the world. Mr. Morgan's exploit in securing the lion's share of the transatlantic shipping was not calculated to diminish the uneasiness with which he is watched by his contemporary sovereign. The old saying of Frederick the Great that there could be no war between England and Prussia because it was impossible for a lion and a whale to fight, as they are creatures of different elements, may be applied to this case, for it is still more impossible for the Kaiser with his millions of trained soldiers to fight Mr. Morgan who dwells in the empyrean of finance. The men are quite sufficiently akin in temperament to understand each other. Both are distinctively men of the century, vibrating in keenest sympathy with all the excitements and sensations of their time. Both are active and energetic, constantly in evidence, touching life at a thousand points. The Kaiser is always making speeches, and Mr. Morgan makes none, but both live continually in the glare of publicity. The fierce light which beats upon a throne in Europe is nothing to the light of publicity which the American newspaper throws upon the master of many millions. The Kaiser is ambitious, and his ambitions point, like those of Mr. Pierpont Morgan, to the acquisition of power upon the sea. But it is probable that the older man entertains vaster schemes than any of those in which the Kaiser dares to indulge. The Continental monarchies are confined within their rigid limits, and the range of their activity for good or for evil is necessarily very circumscribed. In the world of finance the Money King knows no frontiers. He can roam at will over the whole planet.

But therein, in the absence of limitation, is the great temptation which may yet lure Mr. Morgan as it has lured others to destruction. When Verestchagin exhibited his pictures of the retreat from Moscow at Berlin the Kaiser is said to have remarked to the artist after going through his gallery, "And yet, notwithstanding this, men dream of universal empire." Therein the Kaiser put his finger upon one of the sins which most easily beset human beings when from any cause they are exalted above their fellows. Swelled head was the malady to which both Napoleon and Cecil Rhodes succumbed. Happy will be Pierpont Morgan if he escapes from the delusion which has been the ruin of all world-conquerors. Mr. Rockefeller is credited or debited with having made the remark that "Mr. Morgan had bitten off more than he could chew," and financiers, like empires, may perish of indigestion.

At present, however, the star of Mr. Pierpont Morgan appears to be in the ascendent — as a millionaire friend of his remarked, "Mr. Morgan's friends are more numerous than man ever had before. He makes money for them all"— which is indeed a very solid foundation for friendship, gratitude and loyalty. Looked at from that distance which lends enchantment to the view, Mr. Morgan appears in a much more attractive light than some of his great compeers in the world of finance. He has striven for peace, for the consolidation of mutual interests which were endangered by ruinous rivalry. He has never been a wrecker, but has evolved from the wreckage of warring interests a great and prosperous combination which so far has never deceived its shareholders or oppressed the public. 'Tis excellent to have a giant's strength but tyrannous to use it like a giant, and so far Mr. Morgan has not been tyrannous. Temptation, however, is always present with power. Absolute sovereignty has usually depraved its possessors, and it is difficult to contemplate with serene complacency the ascent of any human being to a position in which his will or caprice may be the ruin of millions of his fellow-men, who would neither have chance of remedy nor hope of appeal.

A Good Instance of the Morgan Method

To observers in England Mr. Morgan's attitude in business affairs is as eminently reasonable and conciliatory as his personal manners are brusque, if not rough. Like Mr. Rhodes he ever preferred a dicker to a fight. His dealings with the British Government with regard to the Atlantic traffic supply admirable illustrations of what may be called the Morgan method. He first secured his position so as to be ready for war or peace with the companies that were left out of the great combine. Then, finding that the British Government was disposed to back up his rivals, he promptly hauled down the signal for battle, and entered into an arrangement with Great Britain with which both parties profess themselves to be entirely satisfied. He had previously disarmed the opposition of the German Emperor by the arrangement which he made with the two great German steamship companies. If Mr. Morgan were to die now it is possible that a future historian might idealize him into the great peacemaker of his time, the man who, like a more fortunate Falkland, was continually "ingeminating peace." His great maxim to unite in order to conquer, and its related saying that competition is criminal which deprives shareholders of their dividends, might lead him after a time to be regarded as the John the Baptist of a new and happier era in which cooperation will take the place of opposition, and the social millennium will dawn upon the world.

That Mr. Morgan sees himself in this light is very much to be doubted. He is a shrewd business man, a banker who saw the capital of his friends and customers wasted by a policy of cut-throat competition on the part of the various industrial concerns in which they were engaged. In order to check this he came forward as the advocate of the principle of combination and coöperation, and so far he has unquestionably achieved a great success. He was the first banker who leaving his counting house went to his clients, and instead of merely consenting to receive and invest their money, suggested to them methods by which they could employ it to better advantage than they were doing. It was he who approached Mr. Carnegie and induced him to make the deal which led to the foundations of the great Steel Trust. He has been described as a glorified commission agent, the greatest in the world, who is constantly on the look-out for business, not for the sake of money so much as for the joy of action and the consciousness of power.

Mr. Morgan is distinctly a survival of the old-time Americans. He is said to be a thorough-going American of the newest school, believing in the Americanization of the world, but he is almost as much European in his culture as American. Though he was born in 1837 in Connecticut, he finished his university career in Germany. He went into business about the same time as Lincoln was elected to the Presidency of the United States, and soon established his reputation as a man of great intelligence and financial ability. Ten years later he became a member of the firm of Drexel, Morgan & Co. In 1878 Drexel dropped out, and Mr. Morgan became head of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. in London and New York. Although he has handled almost every kind of business, and is solidly interested in all manner of undertakings all over the world, he has stuck to his own profession. He is a banker and a commission agent. He is at the head of railroads, steamship companies, and all manner of enterprises, but he is personally concerned with the management of none. In England he has not yet made any appearance in the political arena, and no one knows what view he takes of the questions which divide English parties. In the United States his only effective intervention so far as it was visible arose when he used his influence, and used it decisively, in favor of the gold standard. This, however, might be regarded as a legitimate exercise of money-power in politics, the financier employing his resources in order to secure the defeat of a party which threatened to depreciate the value of his securities. This principle, however, might carry a man very far.

The Legitimate Direction of His Ambition

In foreign politics and international relations Mr. Morgan has not yet loomed before the world as one of the new Great Powers which must be reckoned with in the redistribution of territory and the making of war. Various rumors are current as to his intentions as to the Isthmus and in South America, and his interests in the Trans-Andean Railway which is to connect Valparaiso with Buenos Ayres may lead him to take as keen an interest in South American politics as Mr. Rhodes took in the politics of South Africa. This, however, is doubtful, for South America can never be more than a mere subsidiary interest in the vast sum of Mr. Morgan's enterprises. But if Money Kings are subject to the same laws as those which govern other sovereigns nothing will be more easy than for him to find himself involved in a dispute in some outlying region in which he has only a minor interest. This might compel him to use all his resources to vindicate his position, though the game might not be worth the candle.

The great political rôle which seems reserved for Mr. Morgan, if he lives and his star does not begin to wane, would seem to be the promotion of a great coubine between the British Empire and the American Republic. Very few men are better placed than he for undoing the results of the folly of George III. Mr. Morgan has already taken in hand the financial annexation of the old country. He is behind the great Electrical Trust which is endeavoring to control the street railways of Great Britain, and for that end is waging war against the development of municipal Socialism. He aspires to supply London with quick transit, and is believed, probably without reason, to be behind a great movement for transforming the Upper Thames into a gigantic dock. As he bought up the British steamships, and then entered into an arrangement with the British Government for the joint working of the remaining vessels, so he may go on buying up controlling interests in British and Colonial railways until at last he is in a position to compel the Governments at London and Washington to enter into a combination corresponding in the political sphere with those which he has already engineered in the world of finance. A combine of the whole English-speaking world would be an enterprise worthy even of the American Napoleon.

It is a curious illustration of the extent to which the personality and achievements of Mr. Morgan dominate the English imagination that the English papers some time ago published a curious story to the effect that Mr. Morgan, who is well known as a devout member of the Episcopalian Church, was meditating schemes of Christian reunion on a scale which would dwarf all the puny efforts that have heretofore been made in that direction. Being himself a very liberal-minded man he has never concealed his admiration for the work of the Roman Catholic Church as a factor making for morality and progress. It was said that he did not see why there should not be a great Christian Combine, in which the Pope on the one hand and all the Protestant Churches on the other might form a trust for the Christianizing of the world. I do not suppose that Mr. Morgan ever entertained such a scheme, but to the shrewd, practical, business instincts of the American financier the formation of such a trust would seem to be inevitable if the Christian Churches were as keen for salvation of souls as business men are for dividends.

Unlike many Money Kings who atrophy all their faculties by their exclusive concentration upon the pursuit of money, Mr. Morgan has always been, and remains to this day, a very human man. He enjoys the material pleasures of life, and plunges eagerly into all manner of pursuits. Whether he is breeding fancy dogs at his famous kennels, taking the collection on Sunday, sitting among the Bishops in conference of the American Episcopal Church, entertaining Sir Thomas Lipton after the defeat of Shamrock as Commodore of the New York Yacht Club, buying pictures on which he is said to have spent $5,000,000 this year, or whether he is cruising all alone on his yacht, The Corsair, he is intensely alive. "I have seen Mr. Morgan many times," said a friend, "under all sorts of circumstances and in many varying moods, but I never saw him calm. He is always more or less excited about something, and always tremendously in earnest about whatever he may happen to be doing."

Considering Mr. Morgan's qualifications for the great part which he is playing in the world it must be admitted, even by himself, that he has one fatal defect. The man who aspires to be the great Amalgamator of the world, and who has set himself to establish dominion over all the great industrial and financial interests of the planet, ought not to be sixty-five years of age. His expectation of life is too short to justify the belief that he will be able to consolidate the dominion to which he is believed to aspire. Supposing Mr. Morgan were to die — who would succeed? The Rothschilds founded a dynasty, but the Rothschilds of to-day bear little resemblance to the shrewd and energetic founder of the family. Sufficient, however, to the day is the evil thereof, and while Mr. Morgan lives we must well make the most of him, and after he is gone remember him with respect, possibly with gratitude, as a man of supreme financial genius, who used his talents for the purpose of avoiding strife and of promoting peace, and whose fame is not sullied by a resort to any of the methods by which some of his contemporaries built up their great fortunes on the ruin of their fellow-citizens.

Like Another Carlyle

"I WENT to President Roosevelt recently," said a man of some prominence, "and submitted to him a problem in my career which had all but discouraged me. A few minutes in the presence of the President, who is a philosopher as well as man of action, rekindled my determination to conquer in spite of every obstacle.

"The President told me that whenever he heard of any one inclined to shrink from obstacles or to sink under catastrophe he liked to call attention to a case which came to his notice when he was a member of the Civil Service Commission.

"It was in regard to General W. W. Duffield, formerly chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. For a quarter of a century, the President informed me, that scientist had been engaged on a formidable and immensely valuable mathematical work devoted to ten-place logarithms.

"These calculations of half a lifetime filled about five thousand pages of foolscap. The intricate and exhaustive tables and equations were of such value and the prospect of their publication of such a constant hope to their author that he carried them about with him in an old-fashioned carpet-bag.

"The scientist's obvious concern on all occasions for his carpet bag finally attracted the attention of professional thieves, who suspected that it contained a hoarded fortune in bills and bonds. Watching their opportunity one of the criminals engaged the venerable scientist in conversation while a confederate decamped with the bag. To the thief the contents were doubtless regarded as worthless. Nothing was ever heard of the manuscript.

"It was a tragic blow to the scientist, and would have been a serious loss to mathematicians in general had General Duffield given up. On the contrary, he did not waste a day in despair but grimly set to work at once reproducing his tables.

"They were finally published by the Government in a volume of 800 pages. In astronomy and in the daily calculations of actuaries in the United States Treasury and other large financial institutions it is regarded as indispensable.

"The history of this book was a mighty instructive lesson to me," added the narrator, "and I am grateful to the President for calling my attention to it."

THE LITERARY SENSE

The Second Best—By E. NESBIT

THE letter was brief and abrupt. "I am in London. I have just come back from Jamaica. Will you come to see me? I can be in at any time you appoint."

There was no signature, but he knew the handwriting well enough. The letter came to him by the morning post, sandwiched between his tailor's bill and a catalogue of Rare and Choice Editions.

He read it twice. Then he got up from the breakfast-table, unlocked a drawer and took out a packet of letters and a photograph.

"I ought to have burned them long ago," he said. "I'll burn them now." He did burn them, but first he read them through, and as he read them he sighed more than once. They were passionate, pretty letters, the phrases simply turned out, the endearments delicately chosen. They breathed of love and constancy and faith, a faith that should move mountains, a love that should shine like gold in the furnace of adversity, a constancy that death itself should be powerless to shake. And he sighed—no later love had come to draw with soft lips the poison from this old wound. She had married Benolick, the West Indian Jew. It is a far cry from Jamaica to London, but some whispers had reached him. The kindest of them said that Benolick neglected his wife, the harshest that he beat her.

He looked at the photograph. It was two years since he had seen the living woman. Yet still, when he shut his eyes, he could see the delicate tints, the coral, the rose, and pearl, and gold that went to the making of her. He could always see these. And now he should see the reality. Would the two years have dulled that bright hair, withered at all that flower-face? For he never doubted that he must go to her.

He was a lawyer; perhaps she wanted that sort of help from him, wanted to know how to rid herself of the bitter, bad bargain she had made. Whatever he could do he would, of course, but ——

He went out at once and sent a telegram to her.

"Four to-day."

And at four o'clock he found himself on the doorstep of a house in Eaton Square. He hated the wealthy look of the house, the footman who opened the door, and the thick carpet of the stairs up which he was led. He hated the soft luxury of the room in which he was left to wait for her. Everything spoke—decorously and without shouting, but with unmistakable distinctness—of money, Benolick's money: money that had been able to buy all these beautiful things, and, as one of them, to buy her.

She came in quietly. Long, simple folds of gray trailed after her; she wore no ornament of any kind. Her fingers were ringless, every one. He saw all this, but before he saw anything else he saw that the two years had taken nothing from her charm, had indeed but added a wistful, patient look that made her seem more a child than when he had last seen her.

The meaningless contact of their hands was over, and still neither had spoken. She was looking at him questioningly. The silence appeared silly; there was, and there could be, no emotion to justify, to transfigure it. He spoke.

"How do you do?" he said.

She drew a deep breath and lifted her eyebrows slightly.

"Won't you sit down?" she said. "You are looking just like you used to." She had the tiniest lisp—once it had used to charm him.

"You, too, are quite your old self," he said. Then there was a pause.

"Aren't you going to say anything?" she said.

"It was you who sent for me," said he.

"Yes."

"Why did you?"

"I wanted to see you." She opened her pretty child-eyes at him and he noted, only to resent bitterly, the appeal in them. He remembered that old appealing look too well.

"No, Madam," he said inwardly, "not again! You can't whistle the dog to heel at your will and pleasure. I was a fool once, but I'm not fool enough to play the fool with Benolick's wife." Aloud, he said, smiling:

"I suppose you did, or you would not have written. And now what can I do for you?"

She leaned forward to look at him.

"Then you really have forgotten? You didn't grieve for me long! You used to say you would never leave off loving me as long as you lived."

"My dear Mrs. Benolick," he said, "if I ever said anything so thoughtless as that I certainly have forgotten it."

"Very well," she said, "then go!"

This straight hitting embarrassed him mortally.

"But," he said, "I've not forgotten that you and I were once friends, for a little while, and I do beg you to consider me as a friend. Let me help you. You must have some need of a friend's services or you would not have sent for me. I assure you I am entirely at your service. Come, tell me how I can help you ——"

"You can't help me at all," she said hopelessly; "nobody can, now ——"

"I've heard—I hope you'll forgive me for saying so—I've heard that your married life has been—hasn't been ——"

"My married life has been hell," she said, "but I don't want to talk about that. I deserved it all."

"But, my dear lady, why not get a divorce—or at least a separation? My services—anything I can do to advise or to ——"

She sprang from her chair and knelt beside him.

"Oh, how could you think that of me? How could you? He's dead—Benolick's dead. I thought you'd understand that by my sending to you. Do you think I'd ever have seen you again as long as he was alive? I'm not a wicked woman, dear; I'm only a fool."

She had caught the hand that lay on the arm of his chair, her face was pressed on it, and on it he could feel her tears and her kisses.

"Don't," he said harshly, "don't." But he could not bring himself to draw his hand away otherwise than very gently, and after a decent pause. He stood up and held out his hand. She put hers in it, he raised her to her feet and put her back in her chair, and artfully entrenching himself behind a little table, sat down in a very stiff chair with a high seat and gilt legs.

She laughed. "Oh, don't trouble! You needn't barricade yourself like a besieged castle. Don't be afraid of me. You're really quite safe. I'm not so mad as you think. Only, you know, all this time I've never been able to get the idea out of my head ——"

He was afraid to ask what idea.

"I always believed you meant it—that you always would love me, just as you said. I was wrong—that's all. Now go! Do go!"

He was afraid to go.

"No," he said, "let's talk quietly and like the old friends we were before we ——"

"Before we weren't—well?"

He was now afraid to say anything.

"Look here," she said suddenly, "let me talk. There are some things I do really want to say, since you won't let it go without saying. One is that I know now you're not so much to blame as I thought, and I do forgive you. I mean it, really, not just pretending forgiveness. I forgive you altogether ——"

"You—forgive me?"

"Yes; didn't you understand that that was what I meant? I didn't want to say 'I forgive you,' and I thought if I sent for you you'd understand."

"You seem to have thought your sending for me a more enlightening move than I found it."

"Yes—because you don't care now. If you had you'd have understood."

"I really think I should like to understand."

"What?"

"Exactly what it is you're kind enough to forgive."

"Why—your never coming to see me. Benolick told me before we'd been married a month that he had got my aunt to stop your letters and mine, so I don't blame you now as I did then. But you might have come when you found I didn't write."

"I did come. The house was shut up and the caretaker could give no address."

"Did you really? And there was no address. I never thought of that."

"I don't suppose you did," he said savagely; "you never did think!"

"Oh, I was a fool! I was!"

"Yes."

"But I have been punished."

"Not you!" he said. "You got what you wanted—money, money, money—the only thing I couldn't give you. If it comes to that, why didn't you come and see me? I hadn't gone away and left no address."

"I never thought of it."

"No, of course not."

"And besides, you wouldn't have been there ——"

"I? I sat day after day waiting for a letter."

"I never thought of it," she said again, and again he said:

"No, of course you didn't; you wouldn't, you know ——"

"Ah, don't—please don't. Oh, you don't know how sorry I've been ——"

"But why did you marry him?"

"To spite you—to show you I didn't care—because I was in a rage—because I was a fool! You might as well tell me at once that you're in love with some one else."

"Must one always be in love then?" he sneered.

"I thought men always were," she said simply. "Please tell me."

"No, I'm not in love with anybody. I have had enough of that to last me for a year or two."

"Then—oh, won't you try to like me again? Nobody will ever love you so much as I would—you said I looked just the same ——"

"Yes, but you aren't the same."

"Yes, I am. I think really I'm better than I used to be," she said timidly.

"You're not the same," he went on, growing angrier to feel that he had allowed himself to grow angry with her. "You were a girl, and my sweetheart. Now you're a widow—that man's widow! You're not the same. The past can't be undone so easily, I assure you."

"Oh," she cried, clenching her hands, "I know there must be something I could say that you would listen to—oh, I wish I could think what. I suppose as it is I'm saying things no other woman ever would have said—but I don't care—I won't be reserved and dignified—and leave everything to you, like girls in books. I lost too much by that before. I will say every single thing I can think of. I will! Dearest, you said you would always love me—you don't care for any one else. I know you would love me again if you would only let yourself. Won't you forgive me?"

"I can't," he said briefly.

"Have you never done anything that needed to be forgiven? I would forgive you anything in the world! Didn't you care for other people before you knew me? And I'm not angry about it. And I never cared for him."

"That only makes it worse," he said.

She sprang to her feet. "It makes it worse for me! But if you loved me it ought to make it better for you. If you had loved me with your heart and mind you would be glad to think how little it was, after all, that I did give to that man."

"Sold—not gave ——"

"Oh, don't spare me! But there's no need to tell you not to spare me. But I don't care what you say. You've loved other women. I've never loved any one but you. And yet you can't forgive me!"

"It's not the same," he repeated dully.

"I am the same—only I'm more patient, I hope, and not so selfish. But your pride is hurt, and you think it's not quite the right thing to marry a rich man's widow. And you want to go home and feel how strong and heroic you've been, and be proud of yourself because you haven't let me make a fool of you."

It was so nearly true that he denied it instantly.

"I don't," he said. "I could have forgiven you anything, however wicked you'd been—but I can't forgive you for having been ——"

"Been a fool? I can't forgive myself for that, either. My dear, my dear, you don't love any one else, you don't hate me. Do you know that your eyes are quite changed from what they were when you came in? And your voice, and your face—everything. Think, dear, if I am not the same woman you loved, I'm still more like her than any one else in the world. And you did love me—oh, don't hate me for anything I've said. Don't you see I'm fighting for my life? Look at me. I am just like your old sweetheart, only I love you more, and I can understand better now how not to make you unhappy. Ah, don't throw everything away without thinking. I am more like the woman you loved than any one else can ever be. What shall I say to you! Oh, God help me!"

She had said enough. The one phrase, "If I am not the same woman you loved, still I am more like her than any one else in the world," had struck straight at his heart. It was true. What if this—the second best—were now the best life had to offer? If he threw this away would any other woman be able to inspire him with any sentiment more like love than this passion of memory, regret, tenderness, pity—this desire to hold, protect and comfort, with which, ever since her tears fell on his hand, he had been fighting in furious frenzy? He looked at the huddled gray figure. He must decide—now, at this moment, he must decide for two lives.

But before he had time to decide anything he found that he had taken her in his arms.

"My own, my dear," he was saying again and again, "I didn't mean it. It wasn't true. I love you better than anything. Let's forget it all. I don't care for anything now I have you again."

"Then why ——"

"Oh, don't let's ask each other questions—let's begin all over again at two years ago. We'll forget all the rest—my dear—my own!"

Of course neither has ever forgotten it, but they always pretend to each other that they have.

Her defiance of the literary sense in him and in her was justified. His literary sense—or some deeper instinct—prompted him to refuse to use Benolick's money. But her acquiescence in his decision reversed it. And they live very comfortably on it to this day.

The odd thing is that they are extremely happy. Perhaps it is not, after all, such a bad thing to be quite sure, before marriage, that the second-best happiness is all you are likely to get in this world.

Editor's Note—This is the first of three stories, each complete in itself—three examples of attempts to order life by the sense of artistic fitness. The next will appear in a February issue.

Habit of Healthy Europeans

The sturdy Scotch, Germans, French and Italians seldom or never eat meat for breakfast.

Long experience has taught that the breakfast should be simple and not include meat.

Many Americans suffer with weak stomachs and more or less illness because they fail to understand the simple and healthful plan of a breakfast somewhat like the following:—

A little fruit.
A dish of Grape-Nuts and cream.
One or two soft eggs.
A cup of Postum Food Coffee and perhaps a piece of hard toast.

A man says, "I couldn't go on that until noon."

One or two days' trial will teach him a big volume of facts and make him feel "fit as a lord." There is a deep underlying and scientific reason. The best argument, however, is the actual experience with such breakfasts.

LETTERS BY THE WAY

By Charles Battell Loomis

Author of A Man of Putty, Etc.

ON THE ROAD.

Dear Reader: Don't you feel sorry for the man who attracts babies? I do. Not that there isn't something very alluring in a nice, clean baby, but as a general thing, when a benignant bachelor goes along the aisle and a baby stretches out his hands and cries "Papa" and "goos" at him, the baby is covered with cracker-crumbs and is not pleasant to handle. And as a matter of fact the man so addressed seldom handles the baby, but retires precipitately into the smoker, not realizing what a great compliment has been paid him.

Then there's the man who is very neat, not to say Miss Nancyish, and who detests babies. It is often his fate to sit in front of a stupid baby who does not realize that the man in front is opposed to all babies in general and any baby in particular, and when the moist hands clutch his immaculate collar, or sticky up his hair with candy, he, too, flees to the smoker, that haven of refuge.

But once in a while there is a real father of a family who enters a train and the babies in all parts of the car rise up and call him "Papa," and he takes them into his arms one after another and acts on them like valerian on a cat. He is not abashed at the paternal term, for he is a father to everything that can say "la," nor do social conditions nor even a certain amount of dirt affect his affection. It does one's heart good to see the way of such a man with a babe, although most of us are perfectly willing that he should do the fathering and baby-holding quite unaided.

But after all what is nicer than a nice, clean, rosy little baby with blue eyes and golden hair and a bubbling laugh and clutchy little hands—unless it's a kitten or a puppy? The latter are more responsive and intelligent, but your baby isn't to be sneezed at by any means. Still there's no excuse for the cracker-crumb kind of infant as long as handkerchiefs are so cheap and mothers have hands.

Have you ever noticed the passenger who takes every one into his confidence? There was one who got on the cars the other day at Schenectady and when we reached Utica he said, so loudly that every one in the car could hear: "I guess I'll get out and stretch my legs."

I don't know whether he expected some one else to offer to stretch his legs for him or just what his motive was. For the matter of that, there wasn't a leg in the car that didn't need stretching, but there was no one else in the car who gave voice to his desires.

When he came back a baldheaded old man in the front seat—how natural that sounds, by the way—said, "Well, did you stretch 'em?"

Everybody in the car knew what he meant excepting the communicative man, and he said in a mystified tone, "Stretch what?"

"Your legs," said the baldheaded man.

"Oh, yeah," laughed the other, "I stretched 'em, and I had a cup of coffee that went to the right spot. My doctor says that I ought to stop drinking coffee and take one of the substitutes, but I'd rather live while I live than make believe live with all these infernal substitutes for food and drink. Next thing they'll be giving us artificial sleep." Every one in the car heard him and he knew it, but it seemed to come natural to him to take all into his confidence, and not a soul resented it.

Along about the time that we came to Rochester and every one had forgotten all about him, for he had been reading a Utica paper and keeping quiet, he suddenly slapped his leg and said, "Jerupiter! If I didn't come away without a change of linen!" Then he went on reading, but he had added to the gayety of the car. We didn't know which to admire more—his frankness or his patent ejaculation. It is respectfully offered to the laborious gentlemen who are collecting artificial swear-words. Jerupiter—seems to be a portmanteau word.

Just as we were coming into Buffalo our friend broke silence once more with another confidence addressed to no one in particular, but addressed with unusual distinctness: "If we were half an hour earlier I believe I'd go to see some play, but this getting to a play late isn't what it's cracked up to be. I'm sure I don't know what I'll do with myself till bedtime."

I hope that there were no bunco-steerers on the train, because I think that they would have done something with the old gentleman after such an exhibition of naiveté.

I was sorry he left us at Buffalo and I've often wondered whether he always took people into his confidence wherever he was. I couldn't quite make up my mind whether his confiding way came from an arrogant superiority to the common herd or a childlike simplicity. He looked like a keen business man, but it isn't the habit of keen business men to say, as he did when he left the car:

"Well, good folks, I wish you were all going to stop off here if you hate traveling as much as I do. Good-night."

To the credit of human nature every man in the car and at least half the women said "Good-night" in return, and there was no touch of mockery in it. I guess he was genuine or they wouldn't have answered him.

Did you ever get into a sleeper at a way station, a sleeper that was not due to leave for an hour or two? Well, did it make you angry? If you've been there you know what happened. They waited until you were undressed and anticipating two hours of blissful repose before the train started and then the fun began.

Luckily I had my head on the pillow or it would have been knocked off my shoulders. The car was bumped by a locomotive and set rolling about fifty feet, and then the engine tugged it in the opposite direction. Well, as soon as I saw what the game was I just sandwiched my head between two pillows and defied 'em to do their worst. And they did it. They waltzed that car all over the yard. Up this siding and down the other and bump into this car and bunk into another until the engineer tired of the sport.

But he couldn't get me angry. I got so that I knew which way he was going to lunge, and I'd lunge the other way and so neutralize the shock, and I believed I slept the better when sleep did come for the rough and tumble horse-play—or rather locomotive play—of that engine-driver. I suppose some hot-headed, choleric old fellows rush out in their pajamas and address words to him, and he is tickled to death, for that's what he's after; but I never turned a hair although I nearly turned a somersault several times before he quieted down.

Did you know that that rustling that wakes you up in the morning about two hours before you've reached your destination is deliberate? Well, I'm told it is. I used to suppose that a porter happened through the car and that his portly or porterish form accidentally brushed the heavy curtains and produced the frou-frou that acts like an alarm clock, but I am reliably informed that the porter walks back and forth on purpose to waken every one betimes, as he wants to get the beds all made up good and early. Of course, now that you know it is done with malice prépensé, you can give your subconsciousness a pointer and sleep serene through it all. But if you dare to sleep too long, a hand, a dusky hand, will come and clutch your ankle, and that will waken you, I'm sure.

When I was setting out on this journey I crossed the Hudson River by one of the numerous ferries, and half-way over there was a great commotion in the cabin. People ran to the windows and peered with wide eyeballs at something that was happening in the river.

It proved to be a sailboat that had upset and dumped its four occupants into the icy water.

When it happened we were so near that we could have almost thrown a life-line to them, but for some reason our boat did not stop; probably because a more serviceable and manageable tug was seen approaching.

The excitement on our boat was at first quite intense. Several women wore very white faces and one or two hands worked convulsively: for those people in the water were in danger of their lives. They grabbed the slippery keel with numbing fingers and their faces showed abject fear. They were plainly not watermen.

As help came nearer and nearer we steamed farther and farther, and at last we were so far from them that it was only the keenest-eyed among us who were able to say positively that now one and now another was being rescued.

If we had kept close by I think there is no doubt that the rescue of each man in turn would have been greeted with a cheer, but as soon as they became pin-pricks on our vision our sympathy became as small as pin-pricks, and when by the sudden chuffing of the tug we knew that all had been saved our passengers calmly walked back into the cabin and took up their papers or their conversation where they had left off.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Michigan Ave., Madison and Washington Sts., Chicago

Now if that scene had taken place in a novel what a wild huzzaing there would have been, and how some of the women would have fainted, and the hero would have plunged into the water with his overcoat on and would have rescued each man in turn with wild cries from his friends on the ferry-boat. But the real thing brought not a suggestion of heroics. Of course the people on the tug may have strained each man to their hearts when he came up the side, over the side, but I fancy that as a matter of fact the captain used genuine swear-words for having had to interrupt his work to rescue four duffers who ought never to have been trusted with a boat in such crowded waters.

But I must say that I was disappointed. I was getting my fingers ready to pull off my hat and wave it, and I was inflating my lungs to cheer, because I do like an honest bit of sentiment either on the stage or—on a ferry-boat, but these prosaic people were too far off actually to see the rescue, and they had not heart and imagination enough to wax enthusiastic over a thing that they could scarcely see.

Johnny's cut finger before your eyes is a far worse affair than the engulfing of a whole population in the Indian Ocean, and it is well it is so or our tears would give us no time for laughter.

What a pity it is that we do not know the histories of the people we pass. It would save the reading of books and thus save the printing of them, and that would give the printers lots more time with their families. So it would be a good arrangement all round. Because there is no boatload nor yet any carload of passengers that does not contain more than one person whose life history would push the very latest best-book-of-the-century for interest.

We'll call the place Perry, Illinois. Anyway, it was the name of a naval hero. When our train stopped there I hopped off to stretch my legs, like the gentleman for Buffalo, and a man came up and offered me buttered popcorn at five cents the package.

Beyond the fact that he was rather well dressed I did not notice anything unusual in him, and I bought a package and came back to eat it and promptly forgot what manner of man he was.

But in a few minutes the brakeman, who had also bought a bag of the engrossing stuff, came into the smoking compartment and said, "Notice that fellow who sold you the popcorn?"

"Not particularly," I said.

"Well, last year he was one of the engineers on this road, but he had his head hurt in an accident and lost his job, and now he's suing the company for $15,000. For ten years he's been drawing his $200 a month, and now the poor chap is peddling popcorn."

I wished then that the train would back down a few miles and let me have another look at this man who had shifted so readily from the sublime to the ridiculous. His popcorn took on a new relish.

Pop goes the engine and suggests a new form of livelihood to the honest engineer. May he win his suit.

A Double Blunder

THERE are persons in every community who in the social circle have an astonishing talent for saying and doing the wrong thing. One of these unfortunate gentlemen, at a reception in London, once said to Lord North, "Who is that uncommonly ugly lady opposite to you?" "That uncommonly ugly lady, sir, is my wife." "No, my lord," said the querist, "I mean the one at her right." "That, sir, is my daughter."

DO YOU WANT A LIFE INCOME?

A Saving of $5 per Month May Help Secure It

DO YOU save your money each month? Would you save it if you were protected in your investment and sure of at least 6 per cent. on your money from the time of your first payment? Would you save it if, in addition to interest, you thought your principal would be returned to you in 10 years, you still retaining a paying interest in the Company? A saving of a few dollars each month may insure a steady income. Let us tell you how.

THE CONSOLIDATED UBERO PLANTATIONS COMPANY is a consolidation of Eighteen (18) very profitable plantations engaged in the growing and marketing of tropical products, including Oranges, Lemons, Grape Fruit, Yucca, Coffee, Rubber, Pineapples, etc., etc. The property is located in one of the richest agricultural districts of Mexico, on the Tehuantepec National Railroad, equi-distant from the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean.

The management of this Company are among the leaders and pioneers in this most profitable Mexican industry. No other Company is better fitted financially or has greater experience in this business.

This Management has made a financial success of several similar companies; notable among which are the Ubero Plantation Company, of Indianapolis, and the Ubero Plantation Company, of Boston, now paying respectively 20 per cent. and 10 per cent. yearly dividends. We have hundreds of clients in the United States who are receiving dividends from investments made in these companies and to whom we can refer. Our offer to you is liberal and honest, and is worthy of your closest investigation.

The securities of the Consolidated Company are in the form of bonds in denominations of $500 and in FIRST MORTGAGE SINKING FUND GOLD NOTES in denominations of $5 each. You can invest in one of two ways: on the monthly payment plan or for cash. If you can afford to pay $5 per month for any luxury you are now enjoying, you can afford to buy one of these bonds. Let us tell you how.

Suppose you subscribe for one bond on the monthly payment plan. For each $5 you put in, you receive a FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD NOTE bearing 6 per cent. interest, which is secured by a first mortgage given to the International Trust Company, of Boston, by the Consolidated Ubero Plantations Company on all the assets of the Company, real and personal, including developed properties, pineapple canneries, starch mills, bank, warehouses, tin-can factories, general store, merchandise, live stock, machinery, buildings, etc., amounting to over one million dollars. Aside from this, the mortgage covers the Company's coffee harvests and distributing station in the United States, together with all moneys on deposit, both in the United States and Mexico. (Cash balance January 1st, 1905, $100,000.)

The International Trust Company pays 6 per cent. interest on these notes, payments being 3 per cent. semi-annual, payable on July 1 and January 1. Money invested begins to draw interest from date of purchase. When you have accumulated $500 in gold notes, they can be exchanged for a $500 bond (drawing 6 per cent. interest) and at the same time $500 of the capital stock will be paid as a bonus.

Seventy (70) per cent. of the net earnings each year are deposited with the International Trust Company for the redemption of these notes and bonds, which it is believed can be done in ten years or less. Thus you should receive 6 per cent. interest on all the money you put in, plus whatever your stock earns, which should give back your entire principal in about ten years, and still allow you to have your investment represented by holdings of stock that have cost you nothing. The stock should earn and pay a large dividend each year on each bond purchased, so that the saving of a few dollars each month will go toward securing you a regular income as long as you hold the Ubero securities. On the other hand, if you buy for cash you pay $500 for each bond. You receive in addition to your bond or bonds an equal amount of capital stock for each bond purchased. 6 per cent. yearly interest on the bond and the earnings of the stock, which you receive as a bonus, should in ten years or less, pay you back your entire original investment. The cash purchaser receives a special privilege, as he obtains his capital stock immediately, and receives dividends equal in amount to those received by the purchaser on the monthly payment plan—only he receives them more quickly.

With a directorate composed of men of integrity and unquestioned ability; with an advisory board composed of twenty-one representative business men; with an honest, experienced and competent management; and with the probability of your money being returned to you in ten years through dividends and interest, can you fail to appreciate the advantage of this offer!

The only thing we ask of you is that you give this proposition a careful and thorough investigation. Ask us to send you our illustrated booklet entitled "Six Per Cent. First Mortgage Sinking Fund Gold Bonds." It is plain, convincing and interesting. Address all correspondence and make all remittances payable to

All Due to Advertising

The above is briefly the experience of a Michigan man who saw the possibilities for advertising two articles that were not in themselves new. His case is typical of the many we see about us of men who are rapidly building up big fortunes through advertising, which has come to be the dominant factor in the commercial world today.

And specialists who make advertising a profession are becoming more and more in demand. Business men who are investing their money in advertising must have the services of professional advertising men who will see that their money is well spent, and they must pay well for such services, either in salaries or in fees.

With this in view, the Chicago College of Advertising was organized with a corps of instructors, themselves experienced specialists, who have drawn and are still drawing large fees for their advice to big advertisers. The College affords an opportunity for a young man to fit himself under this expert instruction by mail for a new profession which seems to have the biggest financial future before it of any profession existing today.

Write in for details of the plan of instruction.

The eddies were gathering; the thousands of subsidiary torrents that fed the cloaca were moving. From all over the immediate neighborhood they came, from the offices of hundreds of commission houses, from brokers' offices, from banks, from the tall, gray buildings of La Salle Street, from the street itself. And even from greater distances they came; auxiliary currents set in from all the reach of the Great Northwest—from Minneapolis, Duluth and Milwaukee. From the Southwest, St. Louis, Omaha and Kansas City contributed to the volume. On the Atlantic seaboard, New York and Boston and Philadelphia sent out their tributary streams; London, Liverpool, Paris and Odessa merged their influences with the vast world-wide flowing that bore down upon Chicago, and that now began slowly, slowly to centre and circle about the Wheat Pit of the Board of Trade.

Small wonder that the building to Page's ears vibrated to a strange and ominous humming. She heard it in the distant clicking of telegraph keys, in the echo of hurried whispered conversation held in dark corners, in the voice of rapid footsteps, in the trilling of telephone bells. These sounds came from all around her; they issued from the offices of the building below her, above her and on either side. She was surrounded with them, and they mingled together to form one prolonged and muffled roar, that from moment to moment increased in volume.

The Pit was getting under way, the whirlpool was forming, and the sound of its courses was like the sound of the ocean in storm, heard at a distance.

Page and Landry were still half-way up the last stairway. Above and below the throng was packed dense and immobilized. But, little by little, Landry wormed a way for them, winning one step at a time. But he was terribly anxious; again and again he looked at his watch. At last he said:

"I've got to go. It's just madness for me to stay another minute. I'll give you my card."

"Well, leave me here," Page urged. "It can't be helped. I'm all right. Give me your card. I'll tell the guide in the gallery that you kept the seat for me—if I ever can get there. You must go. Don't stay another minute. If you can, come for me here in the gallery when it's over. I'll wait for you. But if you can't come, all right. I can take care of myself."

He could but assent to this. This was no time to think of small things. He left her and bore back with all his might through the crowd, gained the landing at the turn of the balustrade, waved his hat to her and disappeared.

A quarter of an hour went by. Page, caught in the crowd, could neither advance nor retreat. Ahead of her, some twenty steps away, she could see the back rows of seats in the gallery. But they were already occupied. It seemed hopeless to expect to see anything of the floor that day. But she could no longer extricate herself from the press; there was nothing to do but stay where she was.

On every side of her she caught odds and ends of dialogues and scraps of discussions, and while she waited she found an interest in listening to these as they reached her from time to time.

"Well," observed the man in the tall white hat, who had discouraged Landry from attempting to reach the gallery—"Well, he's shaken 'em up pretty well. Whether he downs 'em or they down him he's made a good fight."

His companion, a young man with eyeglasses, who wore a wonderful white waistcoat with queer glass buttons, assented, and Page heard him add:

"You know what they say Calvin Crookes has done? They say he's been going round to every one of his friends and telling 'em to sell wheat to Jadwin. Crookes says to them he knows Jadwin is going to bust, and he, just to show he knows what he's talking about, he lets each of his friends have his check for twenty-five thousand, provided they'll sell July wheat. If they win, of course they're all right, and if they lose their twenty-five thousand, why, they've got Crookes' money to reimburse them."

Jadwin's name was upon every lip. On all sides Page heard it.

"Big operator, that Jadwin."

"They're doing for him now, though."

"I ain't so sure. He's got another fight in him."

"He'll pull through."

"Well, I hope so—by Jingo! I hope so. Say, by the way, how did you come out?"

My old Aunt Sophia says most of these girls are in a fix. If they don't use rouge they're pale, if they do use it they're beyond the pale. And so there they are. Well anyway lots of famous beauties didn't have a mite of color and what's the difference so long's they had a nice clear complexion. Any girl can have that if she uses BORAX.

COMPLEXIONS AND PORES AND SOAP

After washing your face and hands it is very difficult to rinse the soap out of your pores. Nine times out of ten it is not thoroughly rinsed out and the effects on the skin can be imagined. If you use a pinch of BORAX in the cleansing water, the soap becomes much more soluble and is quickly rinsed out of the pores. The BORAX makes the cleansing much more thorough and has in itself a decidedly beneficial effect on the skin. After the cleansing by this method is completed rinse the face with clear water.

Ask your grocer or druggist for "20 Mule Team BORAX" in packages

It will pay you well to send a two-cent stamp for our quaint booklet, "Borax—Come In." This gives some valuable hints. Address Department E, Pacific Coast Borax Company, Chicago.

"Me! Ho! Say, my boy, the next time I get into a wheat trade you'll know it. I was one of the merry paretics who believed that Crookes was the Great Lumtum. I tailed on to his clique. Lord love you! Jadwin put the knife into me to the tune of twelve thousand dollars. But say, look here, aren't we ever going to get up to that blamed gallery? We ain't going to see any of this, and I —hark! —there goes the gong. They've begun. Say, say, hear 'em, will you! Holy Moses—say —listen to that! Did you ever hear—Lord! I wish we could see—could get somewhere where we could see something."

His friend turned to him and spoke a sentence that was drowned in the sudden vast volume of sound that all at once shook the building.

"Hey—what?"

The other shouted into his ear. But even then his friend could not hear. Nor did he listen. The crowd upon the staircases had surged irresistibly forward and upward. There was a sudden outburst of cries. Women's voices were raised in expostulation, and even fear.

"Oh, oh—don't push so!"

"My arm! oh!—oh, I shall faint; . . . . please."

But the men, their escorts, held back furiously. Their faces purple, they shouted imprecations over their shoulders.

"Here, here, what you doing?"

"Don't crowd so!"

"Get back, back!"

"There's a lady fainted here. Get back you! We'll all have a chance to see. Ain't there a policeman anywheres?"

"Say, say! It's going down—the price. It broke three cents just then at the opening, they say."

"This is the worst I ever saw or heard of."

"If Jadwin can only hold 'em."

"You bet he'll hold 'em."

"Hold nothing!—oh, say, my friend, it don't do you any good to crowd like that."

"It's the people behind; I'm not doing it. Say, do you know where they're at on the floor? The wheat, I mean. Is it going up or down?"

"Up, they tell me. There was a rally; I don't know. How can we tell here? We—hi, there they go again. That must have been a smash. I guess the Board of Trade won't forget this day in a hurry. Heavens, you can't hear yourself think!"

"Glad I ain't down there in the Pit."

But at last a group of policemen appeared. By main strength they shouldered their way to the top of the stairs, and then began pushing the crowd back. At every instant they shouted:

"Move on now; clear the stairway. No seats left!"

But at this, Page, who by the rush of the crowd had been carried almost to the top of the stairs, managed to extricate an arm from the press and hold Landry's card in the air. She even hazarded a little prevarication:

"I have a pass. Will you let me through, please?"

Luckily one of the officers heard her. He bore down heavily with all the mass of his two hundred pounds, and the majesty of the law he represented, to the rescue and succor of this very pretty girl.

"Let the lady through," he roared, forcing a passage with both elbows. "Come right along, Miss. Stand back, you, now. Can't you see the lady has a pass? Now then, Miss, be quick; I can't keep 'em back forever."

Jostled and hustled, her dress crumpled, her hat awry, Page made her way forward, till the officer caught her by the arm and pulled her out of the press. With a long breath she gained the landing of the gallery.

The guide, an old fellow in a uniform of blue, with brass buttons and a visored cap, stood near by, and to him she presented Landry's card.

"Oh, yes; oh, yes," he shouted in her ear after he had glanced it over. "You are the party Mr. Court spoke about. You just came in time. I wouldn't 'a' dared hold your seat a minute longer."

He led her down the crowded aisle between rows of theatre chairs, all of which were occupied, to one vacant seat in the very front row.

"You can see everything now," he cried, making a trumpet of his palm. "You're Mister Jadwin's niece. I know, I know. Ah, it's a wild day, Miss. They ain't done much yet, and Mr. Jadwin's holding his own, just now. But I thought for a moment they had him on the run. You see—my, my, there was a sharp rally. But he's holding on yet."

Page took her seat, and leaning forward looked down into the Wheat Pit.

GOLDEN FLEECE

"I've noticed similarities," replied Frothingham tactfully.

"It's all imitation stuff—the labels are frauds. We over here don't know how to be gracefully idle and inane, as your upper classes do. It's not in us anywhere. We haven't the tradition—our tradition is all against it. Whenever we do produce a thoroughly idle and inane person, he or she goes abroad to live or else loses all his money to some sharp, pushing fellow, and drops out of sight. All this aristocracy you see is pure pose. Underneath, they're Americans."

"What is an American?" asked Frothingham. "Every time I think I've seen one, along comes some native and tells me I'm wrong. Are you an American?"

"Underneath—yes. On the surface—no. I used to be, but now I'm posing with the rest of 'em. You'll have to get out of New York to see Americans. There are droves of 'em here, but they're so scattered in places you'll never go to that you couldn't find them. You'd better go West if you wish to be sure of seeing the real thing."

"It's very confusing. How shall I know this American when I see him?"

"When you see a man or a woman who looks as if he or she could do something honest and valuable, who looks you straight in the eyes, and makes you feel proud that you're a human being and ashamed that you are not a broader, better, honester one—that's an American." And then he smiled with his eyes so queerly that Frothingham could not decide whether or not he was jesting.

At the club Wallingford introduced him into a large circle of young men, seated round two tables pushed together and covered with "high balls" and bottles of carbonated water and silver bowls of cracked ice. He said little, drank his whisky and water and listened. "It's the talk of stock-brokers and tradesmen," he said to himself. "Yet these fellows are certainly gentlemen, and they don't talk business in the least like our middle-class people. It's very confusing."

After he left the others were most friendly and even admiring in their comments upon him.

"He's monotonous, and poor, and will never have anything unless he marries it," said Wallingford. "If he were a plain, poor, incapable, rather dull American, is there one of us that would waste five minutes on him?"

There was silence, then a laugh.

The Thirsty Sapsucker

DOCTORS Beal and Judd, of the Department of Agriculture, have been studying woodpeckers with results valuable to farmers. Six varieties of these birds came under detailed inspection. Five of them were found to be undeserving of the maledictions that have been hurled at the woodpecker family.

But the damage wrought by the sixth is so great that the virtues of the other birds of his feather have been ignored.

This offending bird is the yellow-bellied sapsucker (sphyrapicus varius), of which Maurice Thompson sang:

I heard the sapsucker sing;
I turned and looked out of the window,
And lo! it was spring.

No tribute of verse can atone for its depredations. The Washington scientists have been making observations from year to year of the assaults of sapsuckers upon an apple orchard near Mount Vernon. During a period of three hours one bird took thirty drinks of sap; another forty-one.

The result of such a drain upon the vitality of the apple trees is that most of them are dying. A strip of bark seven inches long and two inches wide torn from a dead tree disclosed eighty-four sapsucker drills, an average of six to the square inch.

Even if the thirst of these birds for fruit-tree sap was not in itself sufficient to destroy orchards, the openings they make for flat-headed apple-borers and other beetles would fully warrant all the denunciation heaped by farmers upon this variety of woodpeckers.

It was hoped by the ornithologists that the sapsuckers engaged on apple-tree trunks would soften suspicion by feeding on ants and other insects running over the bark. During all the time these birds were under inspection, however, only one seized an ant. Another snapped once at a beetle.

The Winton

No shock or bump, no vibration or jar. The greatest luxury of automobile travel. The new 1903 model Winton has a 20 horse-power, double cylinder motor which can make you shoot over the roads or will let you "just crawl along," according to the pressure put upon the spring governor button, which is conveniently placed beneath the right foot. It is so simple to operate, yet as sensitive and effective as the throttle control of a railroad locomotive.

The Winton double cylinder motor, of the opposed type, has behind it an unparalleled success, demonstrating beyond cavil the correctness of the principles on which it was designed. The 1902 car, with its 15 horse-power motor, is the foundation of our present model, which has fulfilled our most sanguine expectations. The intensely gratifying results shown by this new model give added strength to our position as leaders in the world's automobile-building industry.

Price of the 20 horse-power 1903 Winton Touring Car, including detachable tonneau, two full brass side lamps, tools, etc., $2500. Visit any of our branch or agency depots and the many features of Winton excellence will be fully demonstrated.

IF YOU COULD MAKE $5,000 FOR $6. A MONTH

TILL YOU'D PAID $510—WOULD YOU DO IT?

WE PUT the above startling headline at the top of our advertisement for two purposes—one to induce every reader of The Saturday Evening Post to at least read the advertisement through. Second, in the hope that at least half of them will let us tell our story and endeavor to prove that we have an investment in New York real estate which we believe will actually give you $5,000 in return for your investing $10 down and $6 a month until you have paid $510. We know we have the greatest proposition in real estate ever offered in the history of cities, and our difficulty is not to convince you, but to get the chance of presenting the fact to you.

$500 invested for a child may put him through college; $500 invested for a young married couple may come close to making them independent in their old years; $500 invested by a young man or a young woman will, in our opinion, pay them five times better than any life insurance they can possibly take out, and this $500 can be invested at $6 a month.

4,000 Investors Bought $3,461,000 Worth of our New York Lots During the Past Year

Nearly three and a half million dollars! that's the forceful story of our real estate sales during the year just ended. We ask you to dwell on these figures long enough to realize—to understand what they really mean. These three and a half million dollars actually represent the confidence which the thousands who have invested in our New York City lots have in us. You, perhaps, have not yet invested—not even investigated our wonderful proposition:—

"$10 Secures a $510 Lot in Greater New York"

COPYRIGHT, 1901, UNDERHILL.

Within 35 Minutes of These Skyscrapers, by Trolley, 5c.

This is a high class and strictly honest proposition, or you may be sure The Saturday Evening Post would not permit our announcement to appear. Nor would we have the privilege of referring to twenty odd National Banks, the Commercial Agencies, and over 30,000 customers all over the United States.

Doesn't it seem fair to presume that the same reasons which convinced so many thousands of practical thinking men and women everywhere of the undoubted value of our proposition, would convince YOU? Isn't it worth the time at least to send us your name to-day—and learn how you may possibly make $5,000 by paying $10 down and $6 a month until your payments amount to $510?

This may sound extravagant—yet every statement we make is based upon a fact. It is in evidence—it can be verified—it can be SEEN. Naturally we will be accused of being biased in our opinions—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

HERE'S THE OPINION AND ADVICE

OF ONE OF THE

World's Greatest Investors and Financiers, RUSSELL SAGE

(From the New York World of September 28th, 1902.)

"I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year.

"Young man, buy real estate, especially acre property, in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable." RUSSELL SAGE.

Our property is located in Brooklyn—it is therefore a very significant fact when Mr. Sage says "Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year." Think of it! That means three-fourths of all of New York's enormous yearly increase of population.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK

As a guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return, if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation; or in case you buy, we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away we will pay a proportion equal to round-trip Chicago ticket.

25% GUARANTEED INCREASE

For $10 down and $6 per month until paid for, we sell you a regular New York City lot, full size, subject to the following guarantees from us: If, at the expiration of the year 1903, this $510 lot is not worth $638—or 25 per cent. increase—based on the price at which our corps of salesmen will then be selling similar lots, we will refund all the money you have paid us, with 6 per cent. interest additional. If you should die at any time before payments have been completed, we will give to your heirs a deed of the lot without further cost. If you should lose employment or be sick, you will not forfeit the land.

"There is no doubt the property offered by Wood, Harmon & Co. in the 29th and 31st Wards, represents one of the best investments a man of limited income can possibly make within the corporate limits of Greater New York. It can be said without hesitancy that Wood, Harmon & Co. are perfectly reliable, and are worthy the fullest confidence of the investor, whether he resides in Greater New York or any other section of the United States. THE NASSAU NATIONAL BANK OF BROOKLYN."

We feel that we are the trustees of the thousands who invest with us, and as such we shall see that every dollar YOU invest with us shall bring you many fold. You have absolutely nothing to lose by writing at once for full particulars, or better still—mail us $10, the first payment on a lot, with the distinct understanding that we must return it to you if we have misrepresented our proposition in the slightest particular. Write under all circumstances. You would not be fair to yourself if you failed to look into this matter. Fill out the coupon and mail it to us to-day.

THE "IVORY" is a favorite shaving soap, because it makes a profuse, rich lather, which softens the beard to be removed and leaves the skin unharmed.

It costs about one-fifth as much as the so-called shaving soaps, and many who have used it for this purpose for years will not have any other. The vegetable oils of which Ivory Soap is made fit it for many special uses, for which other soaps are unsafe or unsatisfactory.

Tales of a Country Town

The Identification of "Bronco Jim"

By GEORGE ADE

JAMES TIBBETTS went away from Musselwhite in 1873 as a well-behaved agriculturist, seeking the cheap lands and boundless opportunities advertised in the railway stations. He came back in 1883 as "Bronco Jim," wearing the white hat of the Western cavalier. For nearly twenty years thereafter he picked out the soft spots in Musselwhite and sat upon them, sighing for the wild life of the West.

Except for the ten years during which he was the scourge of the border, James Tibbetts' career was an open book to all of Musselwhite. He had grown up in the hazel brush away back in the muskrat days. He had a war record, to which he seldom reverted, inasmuch as there were remaining in Musselwhite three men who distinctly recalled the circumstances under which he was drafted. The story was one that shed no glory upon the name of Tibbetts. It ran to the effect that Jim, by happy coincidence, went fishing on the very day that drafting began at the court-house. Fishing was so good that he remained in the woods for a week. When they finally sought him out, in order to give him an opportunity to serve his country, he was found in an improvised teepee two miles above the Sewell ford, subsisting on catfish and blackberries. Some people were sufficiently cruel to say that Jim tried this aboriginal mode of life in order to harden himself for his Indian fighting, which came along some ten years later.

His brief service at the front, which won for him the title of "hospital inspector," and his uneventful years in and about Musselwhite were matters of record, but his ten years in the West were enveloped in mystery, which Jim sometimes sought to deepen rather than dispel. It was known that during the greater period of his absence the Weekly Messenger had been mailed to a town in Northern Nebraska, but Jim explained that this town was merely a starting point for numberless excursions fraught with danger—a base of supplies, as it were, from which he radiated in all directions at the stern call of duty.

The tantalizing part of it was that no one in Musselwhite could successfully contradict any of the tingling narratives with which Jim whiled away the long winter evenings and the long summer days at Talbot's store. There was no denying that Jim had been "out West" somewhere for ten years and that he came back with a white hat and a revolver of prodigious size, and immediately installed himself as chief story-teller. It was well enough for the envious to suggest that he had bought the hat and the revolver at a Chicago department store on his way back, but they had no proof to back up their doubts.

HE WAS THE SCOURGE OF THE BORDER

For fully a month after his return, in 1883, "Bronco Jim" chafed and champed for the open range, the swish of the lariat and the cheerful bark of the six-shooter. He felt himself confined and cramped in Jefferson County, for there was a fence every half mile or so, and the clumps of soft maple trees shut out the sweep of horizon which, at the best, would have shown as a ragged fringe of cornstalks. No doubt the nomad of the plains would have returned to the hunting-grounds had it not been for two large and restraining circumstances. He was called home to assist in the settlement of his father's estate. In the division of the property he found himself possessed of a good quarter-section. Then he married a quarter-section owned by the Widow Evans. The revenues from three hundred and twenty acres were sufficient guarantee of a living that would be free from toil or worry. So he moved into the Widow Evans' cottage and became one of the fixtures of Musselwhite, a domesticated warrior who dwelt musingly upon the dangers that he had encountered in gulches and foothills, holding the younger generation spellbound for hours at a time.

Sometimes the fever would get into his blood and he would have to go into the vacant lot back of the Fredericks' livery stable and shoot at a mark. This blazing away at inanimate objects was but a poor imitation of the royal sport of killing redskins, and usually he went at it with an apologetic and half-hearted lack of enthusiasm. To the boys on the fence it had the semblance of real warfare, inasmuch as "Bronco Jim" would make believe, in order to revive happy memories, that the target was a skulking Indian.

Very often he would say to the line of admirers perched behind him, "Boys, s'posin' that door was a Sioux." Then he would fire six shots in rapid succession at the inoffensive door propped up about fifty feet distant, each shot taking immediate effect.

Only the fervid imagination of a small boy could transform a discarded door into a painted savage, yet this dramatic performance had a wonderful charm for the boys of Musselwhite. They, at least, were free from the doubts and small jealousies which pervaded the adult portion of the community. Every one of them believed that Jim Tibbetts had left his full quota of chiefs mouldering on the plains, while his half-guarded and rather modest admissions as to the taking of life suggested many harrowing adventures in which he had taken part, but which, for some mysterious reason, he did not choose to relate.

Conceding that he may have left much untold, there is no denying the fact that what he told, in detail and fortified by the records at Washington, if they could be examined, made up a series of perilous events worthy of being put together in an epic poem. For instance, think what it must be to win the passionate affection of a chief's daughter, thereby incurring the deadly hatred of the chief, and being compelled to make a desperate ride for life right through the hostile country with bullets zipping all about!

Could any one blame "Bronco Jim" for repeating many times certain words spoken to him by Nelson A. Miles: "I want this here dispatch to git through on time, Jim, and you're the only one I can trust to git 'er through."

Those who sought to belittle the achievements of "Bronco Jim" said that he claimed to have been present at every engagement during the 'seventies with the exception of the Custer massacre, and the only reason he missed that was that all the whites were killed. However, it came out at Talbot's store one evening that he had warned Custer. Sitting Bull he had known intimately, but he had always mistrusted him, and whenever he had an interview with him, in the Sioux language, he invariably sat with his back to a tree and his faithful Winchester laid across his knees. Bill Gunning, who had the gift of cross-examination, wanted to know what he did if there was no tree handy. "Doc" Clevison volunteered an explanation—no tree, no interview.

MERELY A STARTING POINT FOR NUMBERLESS EXCURSIONS FRAUGHT WITH DANGER

One name studded most of the narratives—the name of Choctaw Bill. Jim did not say that he and Choctaw Bill had slept under the same blanket every night for five years, but that such a degree of intimacy existed was to be inferred from the easy and familiar manner in which he made reference to the famous scout. As, for instance: "Whenever I started out on a ticklish job, it allus made me easier in my mind if I could have Bill along, an' Bill didn't much care to tackle anything out o' the ordinary unless I'd agree to stay by him."

Jim had purchased from a traveling agent Choctaw Bill's book, sold by subscription only, entitled Personal Recollections of Life on the Border. He had made marginal notes all through the work, mostly corrections. He did this in no spirit of carping criticism, but with a friendly desire to make the book accurate. For instance, Choctaw Bill, in telling of the massacre at Butler's ranch, writes: "The Indians approached from the east just at sunrise, in full paint and feathers, chanting their battle-song." Jim had underlined this passage and then written on the margin, "Wrong, Bill; they come from the west." It was a small point, to be sure, but why not get everything right while you're about it. So argued James Tibbetts.

When Jim was not present at the daily gathering in Talbot's store or on the store boxes in front, "Doc" Clevison, the town homœopath, frequently would express the conviction that Jim was a liar. Not an ordinary garbler of facts, but a colossal liar, all of whose operations were in the realm of pure fiction. "Doc" Clevison remarked upon the fact that "Bronco Jim" often told of the breaking of Indian ponies that went ten feet into the air at every buck, and yet no one in Musselwhite had ever seen him riding horseback. Jim told of desperate missions right into the heart of the hostile territory, and yet the Grand Army veterans were witnesses to the fact of his eating soap the day before Chancellorsville and being carried to the hospital, groaning audibly. He loved to tell about hitting a silver dollar two times out of three at a hundred paces, and yet when he indulged in target practice back of Fredericks' livery barn, he invariably selected the old door as a target.

"Doc" Clevison had but few ambitions in this life. One of them was to expose "Bronco Jim"—to show him up to all of Musselwhite as a fraud and a pretender. This desire was somewhat actuated by an intense personal jealousy. "Doc" Clevison had a private stock of narratives. He had killed two hundred brant and geese in one day with a common muzzle-loader and he had landed the largest blue cat ever taken out of the Kankakee River. But what were fishing and hunting stories when measured alongside of scalpings and tomahawkings? Why should a company listen to duck stories when it could get bear stories from a man who was willing to remove most of his clothing, if necessary, in order to show the scars?

On various occasions "Doc" Clevison had tried to trip up Jim and cover him with confusion. One evening (again at Talbot's store), after Jim had concluded a story regarding Rain-in-the-Face, "Doc" Clevison looked across at him seriously and asked, "Jim, did you ever run across a Sioux chief by the name of Blue Thunder?"

"Never knew him very well," replied Jim. "Saw him once or twice in the Snake River country. I bought a buckskin pony once from Blue Thunder for eight dollars and afterward sold it to Cap Dillon for forty."

"What kind of a lookin' fellow wuz he?" asked Doc.

"Tall and light-complected," said Jim. "I think he wuz a half-breed."

"It's funny that you'd remember him so well," said "Doc" deliberately, "becuz there never wuz any chief of that name. I thought the name out myself."

A painful silence ensued, with "Bronco Jim" looking very hard at "Doc" Clevison.

"There wuz a chief by that name an' I knew him as well as I know you," said Jim; "but he wuzn't a Sioux—he wuz a Brule."

How was "Doc" Clevison to demonstrate, being put upon the defensive, that there never had been a chief named Blue Thunder? The victory lay clearly with "Bronco Jim."

At last "Doc" Clevison's opportunity came. Choctaw Bill's Wild West Show and Traveling Exposition of Life on the Plains was billed to appear at Logansport. Excursion rates were being offered on all converging railway lines. "Doc" Clevison's plan was to take Jim Tibbetts into the presence of Choctaw Bill and demand verification and corroboration. When Jim learned that Choctaw Bill was to appear in Logansport and that the Pan Handle had made a round-trip rate of $1.50, including a ticket for the grandstand, he did not manifest the keen enthusiasm that might have been expected of one who had the opportunity to renew hallowed associations.

"Goin'?" asked Bill Gunning.

"Nope—don't believe I will," replied Jim. "It's an old story to me. Besides, it's a mighty poor imitation of what we went through out there. I don't see no particular fun in gallopin' around in front of a lot of women and children, an' breakin' glass balls an' so on."

"Won't Choctaw Bill be expectin' you?" asked "Doc." "He knows you live here, don't he?"

"Last time I saw Bill we had a few words," said Jim; "nothin' very serious, but I don't know as I'd care to make up with him unless the first move come from him."

"Jim, he'd be tickled to death to see you," said "Doc." "I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll pay your way over an' take you into the show if you'll agree to go."

"I'll think it over," said Jim cautiously; and that evening, for the first time in years, he seemed disinclined to tell of Choctaw Bill and life in the Indian country.

By diplomatic persistency, "Doc" induced Jim to promise to go to Logansport. But when the fateful morning came and "Doc" stopped in to get Jim and escort him to the station, the veteran scout and trapper was found to be indisposed, with a sort of a dizzy feeling and a strong conviction that it was duty to remain at home and "take it easy."

"Git out! You're all right!" exclaimed "Doc," hitting him on the back. "Never seen you lookin' better. Le' me examine you." The examination showed that pulse and temperature were normal and digestion unimpaired. Jim put on his Sunday suit, as in a waking dream, and permitted "Doc" Clevison to lead him to the station. Jim made no outward sign of being happy. Not even when he arrived at the station platform and was loudly greeted by Bill Gunning and Henry Talbot and Baz Williamson, all of whom seemed to be in a condition of almost hysterical gayety. They were overjoyed at the prospect of being witnesses to the meeting of "Bronco Jim" and "Choctaw Bill." Jim stood apart from them and gazed meditatively at the long line of freight cars on the siding. He had the appearance of a man who lacked a plan of campaign.

Fortunately for James Tibbetts he had a nephew—a ripening attorney with a local reputation for shrewdness and the deft use of the English language. Some of his more hopeful friends were predicting that he would develop into a Beveridge or a Voorhees. Homer Tibbetts was at the station to take advantage of the excursion rate. He overheard the gleeful comments of the conspirators and saw the unmistakable look of gloom on his uncle's face and understood the situation.

All the way to Logansport "Bronco Jim" evinced a pensive interest in the growing crops, but was in no mood for conversation. They arrived at eleven o'clock and the show did not begin until two.

At 11:30 the great Choctaw Bill, seated in his private tent, received the card of Mr. Homer Tibbets, attorney-at-law. He suspected that Mr. Tibbetts wanted two free tickets, but he consented to see the gentleman.

The future U. S. Senator seated himself on the camp-stool pointed out by the remarkable character with the overflow of hair and the eagle eye.

"I'll come right to the point," said Homer Tibbetts. "Did you ever know a man named Jim Tibbetts?"

"Tibbetts? Tibbetts?" repeated Choctaw Bill. "It seems to me that a fellow by that name used to work on my ranch in Nebraska."

"He's my uncle Jim and he knows you a good deal better than you know him. He has talked you up for years and he sleeps every night with your book under his pillow. I don't suppose that any other man in the United States has given you half the free advertising that you've got out of my Uncle Jim. We will admit, Mr. Choctaw Bill, that my uncle is the infernallest liar that ever drew the breath of life. But he has been a good liar—a consistent liar, and in all of his lies you have appeared to advantage. Well, he's up here today and he's got with him a lot of doubting Thomases who expect to bring him around to see you and thereby show him up. So I'm appealing to you to be a good fellow. I want you to recognize him when you see him. Call him by name. Recall a few incidents of the Sioux war and then offer to give him a ticket to the show. It's all right. He's got his ticket."

Choctaw Bill smiled a grim and sympathetic smile.

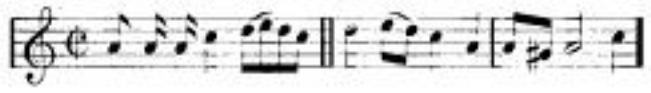
"I never went back on a friend," he said.

"Uncle Jim is getting on in years," continued Homer. "His whole future as a liar is now in your hands. You can save him from disgrace and humiliation."

"Give me a few pointers," said Choctaw Bill, picking up a pad of paper.

While Homer was giving the renowned scout and buffalo-killer a few hitherto unsuspected facts concerning his own career, "Bronco Jim" was standing in front of a large billboard, making a most important discovery. He was gazing at a colored three-sheet poster of "Choctaw Bill" and shaking his head doubtfully.

"'Doc,' do you know what," he asked, "I don't believe this is the real Choctaw Bill at all. The one that I seen out West had a knife-mark down one side of his face an' allus wore a goatee."



"Well, if this one's a fake, you ought to face him and tell him so," said "Doc." "But I don't believe he is. Anyway, we'll go out and hunt him up."

They loaded "Bronco Jim" on to a trolley-car and he rode out to the show lot, overburdened with the dull

A Ballad of White Water Men—By HOLMAN F. DAY

A Driving Camp "Deacon-Seat Come-All-Ye"

COME all ye good White Water Men, come listen unto me,
'Tis all about Mike Corrigan, as ye shall plainly see;
'Tis all about thot Blue-Nose chap they call Mike Corrigan,
Who made his fame and got the name of the best White Water Man.

(Yis, sor, I do think I can make so bold as to say thor' worn't a man bechune Caucomgomoc and Sunkhaze thot would take to white water like thot same P. I. (Prince Edward Islander), Mike Corrigan. The boss he says when Mike hired, "And be ye a white water man?" "Yis, sor," says Mike; "at t'ree ye'r old I lived in Pugwash and I wor doin' drivin' stunts wid clothes-pins in the soapsuds where me mither wor washin'. I've been in white water iver since.")

I tell ye now and I tell ye true, thor' niver wor a hitch
Or dam or jam he wouldn't ram in a freshet drivin' pitch.
He'd take his pick-pole in his hands, his life bechune his teeth,
And down he'd go in the hullabaloo churned white by the rocks beneath.
He broke the jam at Sourd-as-hunk and he done it with a saw—
A cross-cut gashin'-fiddle that he yanked ur-r rick, ur-r raw!
The jig he played with that rusty blade it worn't no op'ry tune,
But a bustin' bind-log's good to hear when behind ye's Drouth and June.

(Yis, sor, I do figger that Mike saved the comp'ny from havin' the whole drive hung up right thor' in Sourd-as-hunk Rips. Wouldn't no one else take the chances thot Mike did. How did he git back to shore, do ye ask? He had us bend down a big ash tree, clear over to the ground. The rope thot wore hitched to Mike's waist wor hitched to the top of the tree. When the jam busted we let the tree go whish-h-h! Snapped Mike right up into the air more'n a hundred feet.)

Now listen, all White Water Men, oh, have ye ever heard
Of how Mike played he beaver once, then went to playin' bird?
He ris' so high he jabbed the sky and scratched across the blue
With the old pick-pole thot saved his soul when down to ground he flew.
He braced himself right out arms' length and speared the solid ground,
The pole stuck slantin'-dicular and Mike went whizzin' round—
A-whizzin' round and round and round until The Old Cat Died—
And Mike's red hair it scorched the air till hunks of wind were fried.

(Yis, sor, and after all he'd done for the comp'ny, when the boss come to settle with Mike, as soon as the drive wor down, he see'd thot Mike wor slow in figgers like ither men that take leanin's to great doin's. He charged Mike with t'ree pair of rubber boots from the wangan store. "And I niver had but the one pair, bless ye," said Mike. "Thin ye admit the one pair ye had?" said the boss. "Yis," says Mike. "Well, thot's one pair and we'll set down the figger right here where ye can see it. Then there's the pair ye didn't have, ain't there?" "Yis," says Mike, "there was thot pair." "There's another figger t for them. Then there's the pair as ye's ought to have had, eh? Ye can't deny it." "No more can I," says Mike. "Well, there's three ones, and, me good man, iv'ry schoolbye knows thot three ones make three. Ye owe for three pairs of rubber boots, 'cause figgers don't lie.")

Oh, 'twor all on Ambejejus Falls where the waters they be wild,
And a pile of hemlock jack-strawed up wor criss-crossed, slewed and piled,
And thor' worn't no man but Corrigan would take the job to do,
For he was the best White Water Man e'er sawed a bind-log through.
He left his pole and his peavy too, and he only took his ax,
And smooth and slick he chopped thot stick with a dozen hefty whacks,
We 'lowed he wor caught and we diver thought we'd see Mike any more,
But he took and he kicked a bubble up and he rode all safe to shore.
So it's whoop, men, all for Corrigan—he wor the kind for me;
He always spent his season's pay in one night, good and free.
Of all the boys thot bucked the broth the best White Water Man
Wor the Blue-Nose who had grit for two—(final words are always spoken)—the brave Mike Corrigan.

How Roosevelt Got His First Second-Term

THEODORE, why don't you go into politics?"

This question marks the literal beginning of a political career which has brought Mr. Roosevelt, still in what Victor Hugo calls "the old age of youth," to the Presidency, and to extraordinary popularity with the masses of the people, irrespective of party. It was addressed to him at a man's dinner at the house of one of his friends in Madison Avenue, New York City, in the first week of September, 1881. He was not yet twenty-three years old; graduated from Harvard in 1880 he had been writing a book—his History of the Naval War of 1812, which was about to be published; he had not chosen a profession, but was strongly inclined to historical writing and had invested a part of his small inheritance in a publishing house.

The conversation at that dinner had been on politics. One of the young men was assisting William Waldorf Astor to manage his campaign for Congress, and Roosevelt was interested in and amused by the description of the methods of that famous canvass which was to end in Mr. Astor's ludicrous failure after weeks of abhorrent self-degradation to handshaking and backslapping with all manner of low persons. Finally, the young campaigner, having told how easy it was to "break into" politics if one had the right sort of "pull," put the question which begins this article.

Young Roosevelt shook his head. The profession wasn't alluring, he said; he didn't like the methods or the early associations. New York City was overwhelmingly Democratic; there were local and legislative conditions of hopeless yet black corruption; besides, he had no "pull." No, he would not go into politics—at least, not just yet.

If the conversation had turned to other subjects, in all human probability, as will presently appear, Roosevelt would never have been President. But his friend persisted, no doubt having seen in his earnestness of thought, look and speech a valuable aid to Mr. Astor's canvass, should he consent to take part in the campaign. The upshot of a long talk was that Roosevelt promised to go with Mr. Astor's lieutenant to the headquarters of the assembly district in which he lived—called the "Diamond-back district" because it included the residences of the richest New Yorkers of that day.

Roosevelt went to the Republican headquarters in Fifty-ninth Street near Lexington Avenue, was introduced to the leader, Jake Hess, and "the boys," liked them, was liked by them. They were casting about for a candidate for the Legislature who might have a chance against the Tammany candidate. Roosevelt was of an old New York family of excellent reputation—that meant "silk stocking" votes; he was a natural democrat and "mixer"—that meant votes from the "plain people"; he had ideas of purifying politics and public affairs, and talked as if he believed what he said—that meant support from the independents, whom the rascality of both machines had made numerous. The hard-pressed Republican heelers went over the situation thoroughly and at last offered him the forlorn hope—the Republican nomination for the lower house of the Legislature—the Assembly.

He took it; he made a "strenuous" house to house, "liquor store" to "liquor store" campaign; he was elected by 1528 plurality, though Astor lost that district.

If there is one public position that more than another is likely to discourage a young aspirant for a political career and drive him from politics in disgust, it is member of the lower house of a Legislature. And in those days in New York State, although they were the days before the Bosses, the conditions were much worse than to-day. The corruption, instead of being concentrated, secret and adroitly disguised as it is now, was open and shameless and personal. Now, corrupting corporations traffic with the Boss for the delivery of the majority en bloc to the support of a measure, and the Boss divides the "campaign contribution," less his liberal "rake off," among his followers; at that time each legislator sold his own vote for a flat bribe, paid by a lobby. A majority of the members of the Assembly to which Roosevelt was elected were baldly for sale—enough Republicans easily purchasable to piece out the purchasable Democrats into a majority. And the venal members "sold out" cheap—a lot of piffling rogues. But they were, most of them, good-natured withal, full of natural wit and the spirit of mutual helpfulness, and curiously unconscious of their own depravity; and they liked Roosevelt and he liked the many decent qualities there were in the least repulsive of them. It is not hard to guess why he was put on the Militia Committee—in the photographs of him in those youthful days he looks much as he looks to-day.

There came before that Assembly in March, 1882—less than three months after he took his seat—the opportunity for him to be President of the United States twenty years later.

The inside ring of New York City's elevated railroad company had in the summer and fall of 1881 perpetrated a flagrant criminal swindle with the aid of the Attorney-General of the State and a Justice of the Supreme Court. The facts were notorious and included such corrupt audacities as the Attorney-General's deliberately arranging a suit so that the inside ring of the railroad company could not but win it, and as the Judge's holding court in bedrooms and in the offices of the ringsters there to legalize and bulwark their corrupt acts. Every one in the State who took the slightest interest in public affairs or in New York City's conspicuous financial gamblers was talking of the scandal, was wondering whether there was really any decency or respect for decency left in the State's administration, any limit to the impudence or the power of rich rascals.

What Roosevelt Did When the Assembly Yawned

Up from New York City came a delegation of indignant citizens with all the facts properly arranged to back up their formal demands that the accused Attorney-General be punished and that the Assembly impeach before the Senate the Judge who not merely had smirched the ermine but had worn it while he wallowed in the mire. Some Assemblymen yawned over petition and petitioners, some laughed, some said that the scandal was infamous but shrugged their shoulders. And it did look as if to attempt to punish the judicial tool of the ring would be more futile than throwing straws at the wind. The Assembly was corrupt, naturally sympathetic with all corruption; the ringsters were powerful with the machines of both parties and had silenced or discouraged all the influential newspapers; both of the officials involved were Republicans. The petition was "referred"—that is, was sepulchred in the mortuary pigeonholes of the Judiciary Committee; the petitioners went sadly home. The "incident" seemed closed.

Young Roosevelt waited and watched and wondered. In his simplicity, in his newness to politics, he was amazed by such dealing with grave, practically undisputed charges against a judge. Every day he talked privately of the matter, insisted that the committee must and would report, that the Assembly must and would act. It seemed to him that if the Judiciary could be openly corrupt with impunity, the dissolution of society was at hand. When he saw that none of the older members purposed doing anything, that the leaders of his own party were resolutely for suppression, he announced to his acquaintances that he himself was going to make a fight.

Without an exception his friends begged him to be silent. "You will accomplish nothing," they said, "except your own certain destruction. Nobody will listen to your speeches—you won't even get newspaper notoriety. And you will be quietly dropped from public life because you attacked men high in your own party. Don't touch it, Teddy; it's loaded!"

This was obviously the counsel of experienced wisdom. So far as the clearest judgment could see it was not the moment for attack. Indeed, it looked as if attack would strengthen the hands of corruption by exposing the weakness of the opposition to it. Never did expediency put a temptation to conscience more insidiously.

It was on April 6, 1882, that young Roosevelt took the floor in the Assembly and demanded that Judge Westbrook, of Newburg, be impeached. And for sheer moral courage that act is probably supreme in Roosevelt's life thus far. He must have expected failure. Even his youth and idealism and ignorance of public affairs could not blind him to the apparently inevitable consequences. Yet he drew his sword and rushed apparently to destruction—alone, and at the very outset of his career, and in disregard of the pleadings of his closest friends and the plain dictates of political wisdom.

That speech—the deciding act in Roosevelt's career—is not remarkable for eloquence. But it is remarkable for fearless candor. He called thieves thieves regardless of their millions; he slashed savagely at the Judge and the Attorney-General; he told the plain, unvarnished truth as his indignant eyes saw it.

When he finished the veteran leader of the Republicans rose and with gently contemptuous raillery asked that the resolution to take up the charges be voted down. He said he wished to give young Mr. Roosevelt time to think about the wisdom of his course. "I," said he, "have seen many reputations in the State broken down by loose charges made in the Legislature." And presently the Assembly gave "young Mr. Roosevelt time to think" by voting not to take up his "loose charges."

Ridicule, laughter, a ripple—apparently it was all over, except the consequences to the bumptious and dangerous young man which might flow from the cross set against his name in the black books of the ring.

It was a disheartening defeat—almost all of his own party voted against him; the most earnest of those who ventured to support him were Democrats; perhaps half of those who voted with him did so merely because their votes were not needed to beat him.

That night the young man was once more urged to "be sensible," to "have regard to his future usefulness," to "cease injuring the party." He snapped his teeth together and defied the party leaders. And the next day he again rose and again lifted his puny voice and his puny hand against smiling, contemptuous corruption. And day after day he persevered on the floor of the Assembly, in interviews for the press; a few newspapers here and there joined him; Assemblymen all over the State began to hear from their constituents. Within a week his name was known from Buffalo to Montauk Point, and everywhere the people were applauding him. On the eighth day of his bold, smashing attack the resolution to take up the charges was again voted upon at his demand. And the Assemblymen, with the eyes of the whole people upon them, did not dare longer to keep themselves on record as defenders of a Judge who feared to demand an investigation. The opposition collapsed. Roosevelt won by 104 to 6.

On that day, April 13, 1882, his fame was established beyond the power of machine politicians to discredit it.

For the next six weeks the main matter of public interest was the investigation of the charges by a Legislative Committee—Francis Lynde Stetson, then a young Assemblyman, afterward Mr. Cleveland's law partner, laid the foundation of his reputation by his keen, merciless cross-examination of the witnesses. The revelations were shocking, were discussed everywhere, were the means of ending open corrupting and corruption of the Judiciary in the State of New York. And when corruption which has been open is driven to secrecy a great moral victory has been achieved; for, though secret corruption is dangerous, open corruption tolerated is mortal, rotting public conscience at its very roots.

The testimony triumphantly vindicated young Roosevelt. The Assembly Committee and afterward the Assembly half-heartedly whitewashed the men he accused. Nominally, the final vote was a defeat for him; actually it was a triumph. For, although the corrupt majority of the Assembly voted as its owners commanded, it visibly writhed with shame and guilt under the scathing denunciations he and his lieutenant poured upon it; and the next morning's newspapers showed that Roosevelt was the hero of the hour.

An early start, and a good one. It is worth recalling to a short-memoried public that thinks Roosevelt dates from San Juan four years ago, or from Civil Service Reform ten years ago. It is worth recalling to a generation of politicians that has forgotten the lesson of Cleveland and preaches and practices the gospel of expediency.

Indeed, it can do Mr. Roosevelt himself no harm vividly to recall it in these days of longing for a second term. For it got him a second term in the Legislature in a year when the Republican party was split in twain and was overwhelmingly defeated, losing the Twenty-first Assembly District except for member of the Assembly.

THE ADMIRABLE TINKER

By Edgar Jepson

Tinker's Foundling

THERE was on the face of Hildebrand Anne Beauleigh a sad, far-away look which gave him more than ever the air of a strayed seraph. It seemed to him that his wits had come to a standstill; for three days no new mischief had come the way of his idle hands, and his regular, daily mischievous practices had grown so regular as almost to have acquired the tastelessness of duties. The peculiar brightness and gayety of Monte Carlo life had begun to pall upon him. Loneliness was eating into his soul, for of the French boys who paraded the gardens of the Temple of Fortune he could make nothing. Their costumes, which were of velvet and satin and lace, revolted him; their lack of spirit, their distaste for violent movement, their joy in parading their revolting costumes filled him with wondering contempt. As for the little French girls, he was at any time uninterested in girls; and these spindle-shanked precocities walked on two-inch heels, and tried to fascinate him with the graces of mature coquettes. His politeness was hard put to it to conceal his distaste for them. Possibly he was hankering after a healthier life, but, at any rate, he who was generally so full of energy had mooned listlessly about all the morning.

During his mooning about he had passed several times a little girl who looked English. She sat on a seat in the far corner, a strange, shy, timid child, watching with a half-frightened wonder the strikingly-dressed women and children who strolled up and down chattering shrilly. He gave her but indifferent glances as he passed; but thanks to his father's careful training of his natural gift of observation the indifferent glance of that child of the world took in more of a fellow-creature than most men's careful scrutiny. He saw that she was frail and big-eyed, that her frock was ill-fitting and shabby, her hat shabbier, her shoes ready made, that she wore no gloves, and that her mass of silky hair owed its unsuccessful attempt at tidiness to her own brushing. He summed her up as that archetype of patience, the gambler's neglected child.

Just before he went to his déjeuner he saw that she was sitting there still. He took that meal with his father, Sir Tancred Beauleigh, and Lord Crosland; and instead of hurrying off directly he had eaten his dessert to some pressing and generally mischievous business, he sat listening to their talk over their coffee and cigars and only left them at the doors of the Casino. He strolled along the terrace moody again and disconsolate, able to think of nothing to amuse him, and as he came to the end of the gardens he saw a group of French children gathered in front of the seat on which the little girl was sitting, and coming nearer he heard jeering cries of "Sale Anglaise! Sale Anglaise!"

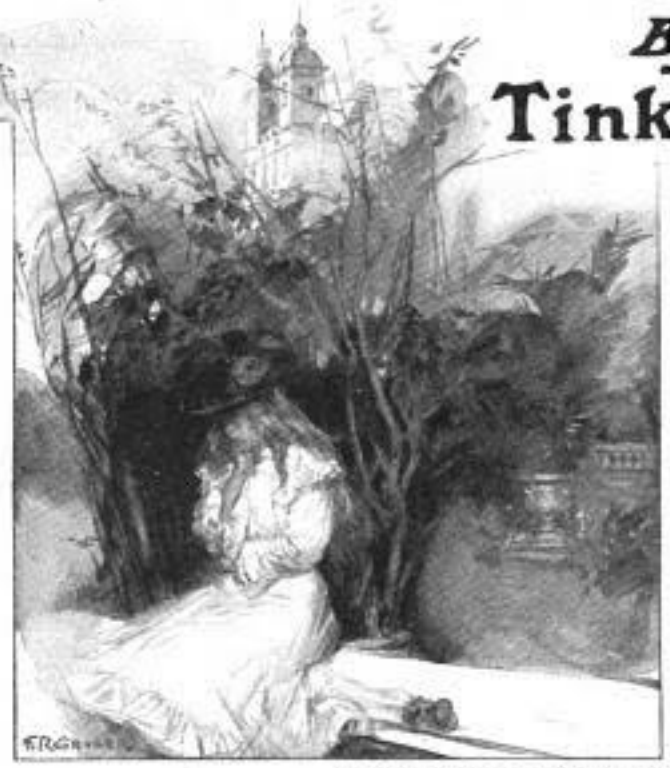
In a flash Tinker's face shone with a very ecstasy of pure delight; and he swooped down on the group. The child was clutching the arm of the seat, and staring at her tormentors with parted lips and terrified eyes. For their part they were enjoying themselves to the full: they had found a game which afforded them the maximum of pleasure with the minimum of effort; and just as Tinker swooped down a cropped and bullet-headed boy in blue velvet threw a handful of gravel into her face. She threw up her hands over it and burst into tears; the children's laughter rose to a shrill yell; and with extreme swiftness Tinker caught the bullet-headed boy a ringing box on the right ear and another on the left. The boy squealed; turned clawing and kicking on Tinker; and in ten seconds of crowded life had learned the true significance of those cryptic terms: an uppercut on the potato-trap, a hook on the jaw, a rattler on the conk, and a buster on the mark. He lay down on the path to digest the lesson, and his friends fled squealing away.

The little girl slipped off the seat and said "Thank you" between two sobs.

Tinker's flushed face was one bright, seraphic smile as he took off his hat, and with an admirable bow said, "May I take you to your people?"

The bullet-headed boy rose to his feet and staggered away.



"Uncle's still in that big house," said the little girl, striving bravely to check her sobs.

"That's a nuisance," said Tinker thoughtfully, "for we can't get at him."

"I think he's forgotten all about me. He often does," said the little girl without any resentment.

"I might bolt in and remind him."

"They won't let us in, only grown-ups," said the little girl. "Uncle tried ever so hard to get them to let me in; but they wouldn't."

A STRANGE, SHY, TIMID CHILD

"They're used to letting me in," said Tinker—"and hauling me out again," he added. "It brightens them up. You tell me what he's like."

Being a girl, the child was able to describe her uncle accurately; but when she had done Tinker shook his head: "He must be like a dozen other Englishmen in there," he said. "And they wouldn't give me time to ask each one if he were your uncle."

The little girl sighed, said "It doesn't matter, thank you;" and sitting down again on the seat resumed her patient waiting, drooping forward with eyes rather dim.

Tinker studied her face, and his keen eye told him what was wrong.

"Have you had déjeuner?" he said sharply.

"No-o-o," said the little girl reluctantly.

"Then you've had nothing since your coffee this morning!"

"No; but it doesn't matter. Uncle is rather forgetful," said the little girl; but her lips moved at the thought of food as a hungry child's will.

"This won't do at all! Come along with me; it's rather late, but we'll find something."

Her face brightened for a moment; but she shook her head and said, "No, I mustn't go away from here. Uncle might come back, and he would be so angry if he had to look for me."

Tinker shrugged his shoulders, turned on his heel and was gone. She looked after him sadly; she would have liked him to stay a little longer; it was so nice to talk to an English boy after ten days in this strange land; and he seemed such a nice boy. But she only drooped a little more, and stared out over the bright sea with misty eyes, composing herself to endure her hunger.

Tinker went swiftly to the restaurant of the Hotel des Princes, where the waiters greeted him with affectionate grins, and addressing himself to the manager set forth his new friend's plight and his wishes. The manager fell in with them on the instant, only too pleased to have the chance of obliging his most popular customer; and in five minutes Tinker left the restaurant followed by a waiter bearing a tray of dainties, all carefully chosen to tempt the appetite of a child. They took their way to the gardens, and the little girl brightened up at the sight of the returning Tinker; but when the waiter set the tray on the seat she flushed painfully, and though she could not draw her hungry eyes away from the food, she stammered, "Thank you very m-m-much. B-B-But I haven't any money."

Tinker gave the waiter a couple of francs and bade him come for the tray in half an hour. Then he said cheerfully, "That's all right. The food's paid for; and whether you eat it or not makes no difference. In fact, you may as well."

The child girl looked from his face to the food, and back again wavering, then said with a little gasp, "Oh, I am so hungry!"

Tinker took this for a consent, put some aspic of pâté de foie gras on her plate, and watched her satisfy her hunger with great pleasure, which was not lessened by the fact that, for all her hunger, she ate with a delicate niceness; for he had feared from her neglected air that her manners had also been neglected. After the aspic he carved the breast of the chicken for her, helped her to salad, and mixed the iced water with the sirop to exactly the strength he liked it himself; after the chicken he helped her to meringues, and after the meringues lighted the kirsch of the poires au kirsch, which he had chosen because it always pleased him to see the kirsch burn, and ate one of the pears himself while she ate the others. When she had finished her little sigh of content warmed his heart.

He put the tray behind the seat and settled down beside her for a chat. Now that she was no longer hungry she was no longer woebegone, and her laugh, though faint, was so pretty that he found himself making every effort to set her laughing. They talked about themselves with the simple egoism of children; and he learned that her name was Elsie Brand, that she was ten years old, two years younger than himself, that her mother had died many years ago, and that she had lived with her father in his Devonshire parsonage by the sea till last year, when he, too, had died. Then her Uncle Richard had taken her away to live with him in London. Her story of her life in London lodgings set Tinker wondering about that Uncle Richard, and piecing together the details Elsie let fall about his late rising, his late going to bed, his morning headache, and distaste for breakfast, he came to the conclusion that he was a bad hat who lived by his somewhat inferior wits.

At the end of her story he tried to persuade her to come down to the sea with him and seek amusement there. But he failed; she would not leave the seat. He gathered, indeed, from her fear of vexing her uncle, that that bad hat was in the habit of slapping her if she angered him, and for a breath he filled with a fierce indignation which surprised him: she looked so frail. But he did not ask her if it were so, for his delicacy forewarned him that the question would provoke a struggle between her loyalty and her truthfulness. He entertained her, therefore, with his reminiscences, and enjoyed to the full the admiration and wonder which filled her face as he talked. Absorbed in one another they paid no heed to the passing hours; and the sudden fall of twilight surprised them.

They began to speculate whether Uncle Richard had had enough of play, and would come and fetch her. But even now Elsie was not impatient, so inured had she been to neglect; she only looked anxious again. Tinker, on the other hand, was impatient, very impatient, with Uncle Richard, whom he was disposed to regard as a gentleman in great need of a kicking. Moreover, the chill hour after sunset, so dangerous on that littoral, was upon them; and he considered with disquiet the thin stuff of the child's frock.

Presently he said abruptly, "I've promised my father to wear an overcoat during the fever hour. I must be off and get it, and a wrap for you. You won't be frightened if I leave you alone?"

"No," said Elsie bravely, but her tone belied the word.

"Well, walk up and down quickly, so that you don't get a chill. If you keep near the seat your uncle can't miss you if he comes."

"Very well," said Elsie rising obediently. "Only, only—if you could get back soon."

"I will," said Tinker, and he bolted for the hotel.

Elsie walked up and down, trying to feel brave, but the odd shapes which the bushes assumed in the dim light daunted her not a little, and she strove to drive away the fancy that she saw people lurking among them. Tinker was gone a bare seven minutes; but to the timid child it seemed a very long while, and she welcomed his return with a gasp of relief.

He wore a smart, close-fitting, brown, racing overcoat which reached to his ankles; and for her he brought his fur-lined ulster.

"Here I am," he cried cheerfully; "get into this!" And he held out the ulster. She put her arms into the sleeves, and he drew it round her and buttoned it up.

"You are a kind boy," she said with a little break in her voice. A sudden, strong, but inexplicable impulse moved Tinker; he bent forward and kissed her on the lips.

While you might count a score the children stood quite still staring at one another with eyes luminous in the starlight. Elsie's face was one pink flush, and Tinker's was scarlet.

"That—that was a very funny kiss," she said in a curious voice.

"Oh, what's a kiss!" said Tinker with forced bravado, consumed with boyish shame for the lapse.

"I—I—liked it," said Elsie. "No one has kissed me since father died." And her breath seemed to catch.

"Girls like kissing," said Tinker in the tone of a dispassionate observer. Then he seemed to thrust the matter away from him with some eagerness; and slipping her arm through his he said, "Come on; let's walk up and down."

They walked up and down, chattering away till eight o'clock. Then he said, "My father will be expecting me; he dines at eight. Won't you come, too?"

"No, no: thank you. I must wait for Uncle Richard; I must really." But her arm tightened round his involuntarily.

Tinker thought a while. The gardens were brighter now. The stars were shining with their full radiance, and the lamps were alight, so that even their retired corner was faintly bright.

"Well, you go on walking up and down. You won't feel so lonely as sitting still; and I'll be back as soon as I can," he said, and off he went.

He found Sir Tancred Beauleigh and Lord Crosland beginning their soup, and sitting down he told them of Elsie's plight. They were duly sympathetic; and his father at once gave him leave to take some dinner to her and dine with her. Thereupon, after a brief, but serious, conference with the manager, Tinker departed, again followed by a waiter with a tray. Elsie had not looked for his return for a long while; and she was indeed pleased to be so soon freed from the struggle against her timidity. They ate their dinner with great cheerfulness and good appetite, and for an hour after it they chatted away happily. Then Elsie grew drowsy, very drowsy indeed, and presently, nestled against Tinker, she fell asleep. Fortunately, the southern night was warm, and in the fur-lined ulster she could take no harm. He sat holding her to him, listening to her breathing, looking out over the sea, and revolving many memories and more schemes, till at last the lights began to dance before his eyes, and he, too, fell asleep.

He knew no more till he was awakened by some one shaking his arm and found his father and Lord Crosland standing over them. The lamps of the Casino and the gardens were out, only the dim starlight lighted the scene. The two children sat up and stared about them, Elsie sleepily, Tinker wide-awake.

"We've found you at last. Hasn't your little friend's uncle come for her?" said Sir Tancred.

"No one has come," said Tinker. Sir Tancred and Lord Crosland looked at one another.

"Desertion," murmured Lord Crosland softly.

"Well, come along," said Sir Tancred cheerfully; "we must put her up for to-night."

The children slipped off the seat; Tinker put Elsie's arm through his, and holding her up when she stumbled over the long ulster followed his father and Lord Crosland. There were some empty bedrooms in their corridor; and Elsie was settled for the night in one of them.

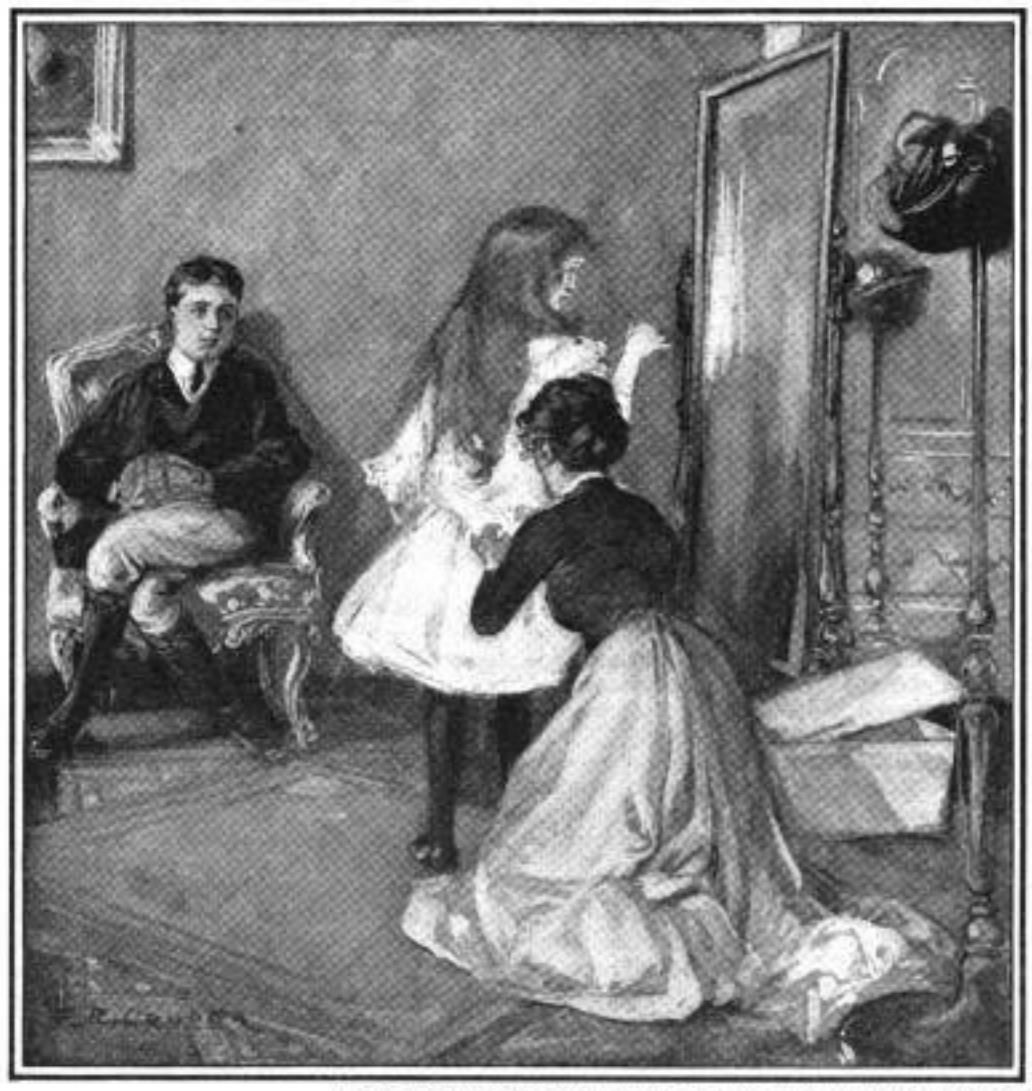
Tinker awoke next morning very cheerful at the thought of having a companion to join in his amusements. He made haste to knock at Elsie's door and bid her come out for a swim before their coffee. She was soon dressed, and found him waiting for her. She flushed a little as she greeted him; and he greeted her with his seraph's smile.

"I thought you'd like a bath before our coffee," he said.

"It would be nice," said Elsie wistfully. "But my hair; it is such a trouble even without being wetted with sea-water."

Tinker looked at the fine silky mass of it, and said with sympathetic seriousness, "I saw it was beyond you; but we'll manage." He caught her hand, they ran down the stairs, out of the hotel, and most of the way to the beach. There he took Elsie to a ladies' bathing tent, and instructed the attendant to provide her with the prettiest costume she had; changed himself; and in five minutes they were in the sea. To his joy he found that she could swim nearly as well as he. But he was very careful of her; and the moment she looked cold he took her ashore.

They came back to the hotel very hungry; and Tinker led the way through the passages at the back of the hall, down into the hotel kitchen, where he was welcomed with affectionate joy by the kitchen staff. The end of a long table had been laid with the finest napery and plate of the hotel; they sat down at it, and were forthwith served with an exquisitely cooked dish of fresh mullet, wonderful hot cakes, and steaming cups of fragrant café au lait. As he breakfasted Tinker conversed with the chattering staff with a cheerful kindliness and a thorough knowledge of all their private concerns, keeping Elsie informed of the matters under discussion by such phrases as "It's Adolphe's wife; she beats him," or, "Lucie has consulted a fortune-teller, who says she is going to marry a millionaire," or, "Jean's eldest daughter has just made her first communion; they say she looked like a pretty little angel." But he did not tell her of the chaffing, but polite, congratulations heaped on him on the prospect of his settling down with his beautiful blonde demoiselle; he accepted them with a smile of angelic indulgence.



When they had done they went upstairs; and on the way Tinker said, "I must have a shot at that hair of yours; it—it really gets on my nerves."

"It's no use," said Elsie with her ready flush. "I brush it as well as I can. But I can't do it very well. There is such a lot of it."

"Well, I'll do what I can," said Tinker; and he measured with thoughtful eye the silken mass, tangled and matted by the sea-water.

He led the way into his room and set her in a chair, turned up his sleeves, took his hair-brushes, and began upon it. It was his first essay as coiffeur, but his natural and trained deftness stood him in good stead. He kept a watchful eye on her face in the glass, and whenever it puckered brushed more gently; but at times, in his absorption in his task, he so far forgot himself as to hiss like a groom cleaning a horse. In the middle of it Sir Tancred came in, and it was significant that he saw Tinker's occupation without a smile, made no joke upon it, but seemed to take it as the most natural thing in the world that his son should be discharging a function of the lady's maid. He greeted the children gravely, sat down, and watched the brushing with a respectful attention. Now and again he asked Elsie a question which seemed too idle to be impertinent, but her answers told him all he wished to know; and presently he felt with Tinker that her uncle was a gentleman in great need of kicking.

At last Tinker had finished; Elsie rose with a luxurious sigh and he looked at his work with fond pride; it was very beautiful, fine hair, and its sheen of changing lights well repaid him for his trouble. Sir Tancred proposed that they should stroll down to the Casino and find her uncle. Lord Crosland joined them in the hall and went with them. When they came to the Casino they found a little crowd already gathered about its doors, waiting for them to open. But Richard Brand was not in it, and at once Elsie's face grew anxious. As soon as the doors opened Sir Tancred went in to ask if her uncle had made any inquiries about her or left word where she might find him. In ten minutes he came out again and said, "No; he has made no inquiries. Suppose you stroll with Elsie along toward the Condamine, Crosland; that is the way he would come. Tinker and I will wait here." Lord Crosland looked at his face and said, "Come along, missie," and strolled off with the anxious child.

SET ABOUT MEETING HIS TASTE WITH THE LIVELIEST ENERGY

When they were out of hearing Sir Tancred said: "I'm afraid the child is in a bad mess. This disgusting uncle of hers lost every penny at roulette last night, and the authorities, with their usual kindness, took his ticket to London, and put him in the train with twenty-five francs in his pocket. He did not even mention the child."

"What a cad," said Tinker shortly.

"Well, she is on our hands, and we must look after her till we can make arrangements—deposit her in a home or something."

Tinker said nothing for a while; he seemed plunged in profound thought. He kicked a little stone ten yards away; then raised his eyes to his father's, and said in the firm voice of one whose mind is made up, "I should like to adopt her."

"Adopt her?" said Sir Tancred with some surprise.

"Yes; I should like to very much."

"Well, thanks to your industry in the matter of abducted children, you have a nice little income, so we needn't consider the question of expense. You can afford it. But in what capacity would you adopt her—as father, uncle, guardian, or what? The formalities must be observed."

"I think as brother," said Tinker.

Sir Tancred thought a while; then he said, "You will find it a great responsibility."

"Yes; but I don't mind. I—I—like her, don't you know."

Sir Tancred's stern face relaxed into one of his rare and charming smiles: "Very good," he said. "You shall adopt her."

"Thank you, sir," said Tinker; and his smile matched his father's. "And may I have some money to dress her? Her clothes are dreadful."

"They are," said Sir Tancred; and taking out his note-case he gave him a thousand-franc note.

"Thank you," said Tinker, beaming. "I'll break it to her about her uncle."

He hurried off toward the Condamine, and overtaking Elsie and Lord Crosland told her that it was all right, that they had arranged to take care of her for a few days, and carried her away to fetch Blazer, his bulldog, for his morning walk. It is to be feared that he gave her the impression that her uncle had been a party to the arrangement; but by a flood of talk he successfully diverted her mind from the matter. From an unworthy jealousy Blazer was at first disposed to sniff at Elsie; but when he found that she joined heartily in the few poor amusements the place afforded an honest dog, he became more gracious. The children made their déjeuner with Sir Tancred and Lord Crosland; and after it, having restored the reluctant Blazer to his lodging in the basement of the hotel, they took the train to Nice.

Tinker hired the largest commissionaire at the station, and bought a small trunk which he gave him to carry. Then he went straight to Madame Aline's, and having insisted on seeing Madame herself, explained that he wanted frocks for Elsie, and at once, but that the bright and elaborate fashions affected by the little French girls would not suit her. Madame agreed with him, said that she had them, but added, "Simplicity is so expensive."

Tinker waved away the consideration, and showed Madame the thousand-franc note. At once she fell a victim to his irresistible charm and set about meeting his taste with the liveliest energy, with the result that in less than an hour Elsie was provided with an evening frock of an exquisite shade of heliotrope, an afternoon frock of a no less exquisite shade of blue, and a hat, stockings and gloves to match. They were packed in the trunk; and with them two pairs of shoes which Madame sent for from a no less expensive bootmaker, and various other garments.

When they came out of her shop Tinker considered for a while the hole he had made in the thousand-franc note, and said, "The time has come to be economical."

He examined the shops with a keen eye till he came to one which seemed more of the popular kind, and there he bought a frock of serge and three of dark blue linen, stouter shoes, slippers, and two hats. Here he waited while Elsie changed; and when she came out, looking another creature, he said with a sigh of satisfaction, "I knew you'd look all right if you had a chance."

They had ices at a café, and caught a train back to Monte Carlo. Elsie seemed dazed with her sudden wealth, while

The American Adventures of a Fortune-Hunting Earl

"MOTHER, I'M GOING TO THROW HIM OVER"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS — The Earl of Frothingham has come to America a-wooing — fortune wooing. At home he leaves his sister, Lady Evelyn Gordon-Beauvais, anxious and expectant, and Lady Gwendoline Ridley, the girl who would be his sweetheart if either of them could afford the luxury of the other, disconsolate but resigned. On the steamer he has met Honoria Longview, who, with good-humored shrewdness, has seen through his mission and yet sympathizes with his necessities. His title possesses no attraction for her, but she agrees, out of friendship, to introduce him where it will bring the best price. Through her he meets Catherine Hollister, a young girl of charm and wealth, who is much taken with his distinguished bearing. Joe Wallingford is an old friend of hers.

V

WALLINGFORD and Frothingham developed a warm friendship. Wallingford was extremely suspicious of himself in it, but after a searching self-analysis decided that his liking for the Earl was to a certain extent genuine. "He doesn't know much — at least he acts as if he didn't. But he's clever in a curious way and a good listener, and not a bit of a fakir. No doubt he's on the lookout for a girl with cash, but English ideas on that subject are different from ours — that is, from what ours are supposed to be. He's a type of English gentleman, and not a bad type of gentleman without any qualification."

When he expressed some such ideas to Catherine Hollister at a dance given for her by Mrs. Carnarvon, she went so much further in praise of Frothingham that he laughed. "So that's the way the wind blows, eh?" he said, grinning at her satirically.

She colored and put on the look of an offended saint.

"Countess of Frothingham," he went on, undisturbed. "That would sound romantic, wouldn't it? Catherine, Countess of Frothingham!"

"How can you be so coarse-fibred in some ways, Joe, and so fine in others?" she said reproachfully.

"I don't know, dear lady. I suppose because I'm human — just like you."

"Let us dance," was her only reply. She had known Joe so long that she couldn't help liking him, but he certainly was trying.

Later in the evening, remembering Joe's cruelty and sordidness, she said to Frothingham: "You don't know what a pleasure it is to the finer women over here to meet foreign men. They are so much more subtle and sympathetic. They are not coarsened by business. They are not mercenary."

She raised her dreamy eyes to his as she spoke the word "mercenary." He reddened and stumbled — they were dancing the two-step. "I wish you wouldn't look at me like that," he said with an ingenuousness wholly unconscious. "It reminds me of my sins, and — and — all that."

She trembled slightly, as he could plainly feel in his encircling arm. He looked down at her — she always was ethereally beautiful in evening dress. In his admiration he almost forgot how rich she was, he quite forgot how oppressively intellectual she was. "Do you — do you ——" he began. Then he stopped dancing and led her into the hall, through the hall to the library. Two other couples were there, but far enough from the corner to which he took her.

"May I smoke?" he asked.

"I love the odor of a cigarette," she replied in a voice that encouraged him to resume where he had abruptly left off.

"Perhaps you will smoke?"

"No," she said in a tone that was subtly modulated to mean apology or reproach according as he liked or disliked women smoking.

"Do you really like England?" he began nervously, seeing to it that his glass was firmly adjusted.

"I adore it." Usually she would have gone on into poetical prose unlimited. But this, she felt, was a time for short answers.

"Would you — mind England — with — with ——"

He halted altogether and she slowly raised her heavy lids until her eyes met his.

"Catherine!" He seized her hand, and the thrill of her touch went through him. "You are so lovely. I — I'm horribly fond of you."

She sighed. "Isn't it beautiful?" she said. "This lovely dance — these fascinating surroundings — the music — the dim lights — and — and ——" She lifted her eyes to his again.

He murmured her name, threw away his cigarette, looked round to see where the other eyes in that room were, then clasped her round the waist for an instant. "Will you? Will you?" he exclaimed.

"Yes," she replied in a tone so faint that he barely heard.

"You have made me happy." And he meant it.

"How satisfactory she is in every way," he was saying to himself. "Looks, money, everything. I'm a lucky dog." And she was saying to herself, "Countess of Frothingham! How strong and fine and simple he is. I love him!" But when he suggested speaking to her father at once she would not have it. "No — I want it to be just our secret for a little while," she pleaded. "Don't you?" He did not see any reason for it, but he said "Yes" with a surface reflection of her earnestness.

"It's a pity the world ever should know anything about it, don't you think so?" she went on.

"I'm very impatient to claim my countess," he answered.

She liked the "countess," but the "my" jarred slightly in her sensitive ear — she was "acquiring" an earl, not he a countess.

"Not too long," he remonstrated. It was all very well for her to be romantic — he wouldn't have liked it if he had not inspired some romance. But why should either of them wish to delay ratifying the bargain that was the real purpose in view? Certainly he wished no delay. And there was much to be arranged — settlements, a trousseau, a host of time-consuming preliminaries. Not a day should be lost in getting under way. His creditors, impatiently awaiting the event of his American adventure, might become ugly. He hated ugly letters and cablegrams almost as much as he hated ugly "scenes." No, he felt strongly on the subject of long engagements.

His heart was full of her beauty — he had drunk a good deal at supper half an hour before; his head was full of her dowry — he never drank so much that he forgot business. "How could I evade if any one should congratulate me?" he asked. And then he wished he had not said it, but had made that the excuse for not obeying her wishes.

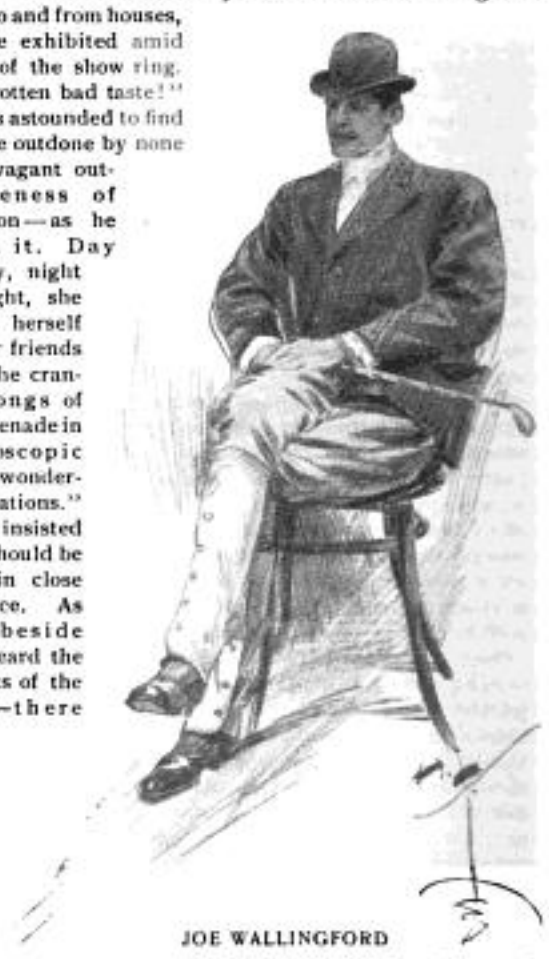
"You must deny it, as I shall. You know, we're not really fully engaged until I'm ready to have it announced. Besides, as Joe Wallingford says, a lie in self-defense isn't a lie. And self-defense isn't either a crime or a sin, is it? I think self-defense against prying is a virtue, don't you?"

A man came to claim her for a dance. She smiled sweetly at him, plaintively at Frothingham, and went back to the ballroom. Frothingham stood in the doorway watching her for a few minutes, then went away from the dance to walk and think and enjoy. But his mind was depressed. "Too much supper," he grumbled. "I ought to be tossing my hat. I don't deserve her and my luck. Her cash will put us right for the first time since my great-grandfather ruined us by going the Prince Regent's gait. We shall restore Beauvais House and take the place in Carlton Terrace again. Gad, what a relief it will be to feel free in my mind about cab fares and not to claim commissions from my tailor when I send him customers. I shall be able to live up to the title and the traditions ——" He painted vividly, but in vain. He caught himself looking away from the glowing pictures and sighing. "Yes, she's pretty — devilish pretty — a high stepper, but — Gwen would be so comfortable."

Honoria suspected their secret, yet doubted the correctness of her intuitions. "She'd parade him," she reflected, "if she were really engaged to him. There must be a hitch somewhere." And her wonder grew as the report of their engagement spread only to be strenuously denied by Catherine.

Catherine was almost tearful in lamenting this "impertinent gossip" to her. "Isn't it hateful, Honoria," she said, "that a young man and a young woman can't be civil and friendly to each other when they're visiting in the same house without all the busybodies trying to embarrass them? Did you see the papers this morning? How dare they print it!"

Honoria smiled at this mock indignation. "Where's the injury to you in crediting you with landing an earl?" she asked.



Catherine gave her a look of melancholy reproach. "Do you know," she said dreamily, "I don't think of him as an earl any longer? His character makes everything else about him seem of no consequence. Don't you think he's a remarkable man?"

"A little less remarkable than a marquis, a little more remarkable than a viscount — and in comparison with a baronet or a plain esquire, a positive genius!" replied Honoria.

Frothingham was more and more uncomfortable. Catherine took him everywhere in her train and, with seeming unconsciousness of what she was doing, fairly flaunted him as her devoted attendant. Yet only when they were alone did she ever betray that she had more than a polite, friendly interest in him. He would have got angry at her, would have made vigorous protest, but how was it possible to bring such sordidness as mere vulgar appearances to the attention of so innocent and high-minded a creature? He restrained himself, or, rather, was restrained — until Horse Show week.

Those five afternoons and six evenings of dragging at the divine Catherine's chariot wheels before the eyes of the multitude were too much for him. It was one of the years when the Horse Show was the fashion for the fashionable. Not only the racing set and the hunting set, but also the dancing and the dressing and the literary and artistic sets, and the fadless but none the less frivolous set, flocked there day and evening to crowd the boxes with a dazzling display of dresses, wraps, jewels and free-and-easy manners. At first Frothingham gaped almost as amazedly as the multitude that poured slowly and thickly round the promenade, eyes glued upon the occupants of the boxes, never a glance to spare for the ring from the cyclorama of luxury and fashion. "And at a horse show!" he muttered as he noted the hats and gowns made to be shown only in houses or in carriages on the way to and from houses, but there exhibited amid the dust of the show ring. "What rotten bad taste!"

He was astounded to find Catherine outdone by none in extravagant out-of-placeness of ostentation — as he regarded it. Day after day, night after night, she showed herself off to her friends and to the craning throngs of the promenade in a kaleidoscopic series of wonderful "creations." And she insisted that he should be always in close attendance. As he sat beside her he heard the comments of the crowd — there was always a crowd in front of Longview's box: "That's the girl."—"Yes, and the fellow beside her, with the eyeglass, he's her Earl."—"I don't know how much—some say a million—some say two or three."—"He looks dull, but then all Englishmen look that."—"I'll bet he could be a brute. Look what a heavy jaw he's got."—"She'll be sick of him before she's had him a year."

Did Catherine hear? he wondered. Apparently not. He never surprised in her face or manner a hint of consciousness of self or of being stared at and commented upon. "But she can't avoid hearing," he said to himself. "These asses are braying right in her ears. And why should she get herself up in all these clothes, if it isn't to be stared at?"

And, between performances, the performers in the Longview box dined in the palm garden at the Waldorf, with their acquaintances at the surrounding tables, and gossip of their engagement flying, and curious glances straying toward them over the tops of wine-glasses, and whispers and smiles—and Catherine soulful and unconscious. On Friday night, as they drove from the Waldorf to the Garden—she had given him her hand to hold under cover of the lap-robe—she said with a sigh: "I'm so glad it's nearly over. Only to-night and to-morrow night."

"Not to-morrow afternoon?" asked Frothingham. "Why do we miss a chance to exhibit?"

"Only the servants and the children go to-morrow afternoon," replied Catherine sweetly. "I'm worn out and sick of it all. So many go merely for self-display; so few of us, not to speak of those dreadful people in the promenade, care anything about the dear, beautiful, noble horses."

"Why look at horses," said Honoria, "when there's a human show that's so much more interesting? It may be vulgar, but it's amusing. I'm afraid my tastes are not refined."

Frothingham looked at her with the expression of a thirsty man who has just had a glass of cold water. "That's what I think," said he. "And I'm fond of horses." A faint sneer in his satirical drawl made Catherine give him a furtive glance of anxiety—was the worm thinking of turning?

When they were in the box and the others were busy she said to him in her tenderest tone: "You're dreadfully bored by all this, aren't you? And I thought it would give you pleasure for us to be together so much."

The surliness cleared from his face somewhat. "No, I'm not bored. But I hate to be shown off. And, while you've been unconscious of it, the fact is that you and I have been sitting here in this cage five or six hours a day, being gaped at as if we were a pair of new chimpanzees in a zoo." As he remembered his wrongs his anger rose upon the wine he had freely drunk at dinner. "It's what I call low—downright rotten, Catherine," he finished energetically.

"I wish you wouldn't use that dreadful word," she said, tears in her eyes, but a certain sting in her voice. "I know it's all right in England—some of us use it here. But it—every time you or any one says it I feel as if some one had thrust a horrid-smelling rag under my nose. You don't mind my saying so, do you, dear?"

"Beg pardon," he said. "We do use rowdy words nowadays. I'm so accustomed to it I don't notice."

Just then up to his ears from the promenade and the crowd gaping at the "new chimpanzees" came a voice: "They're fighting—look! look! Hasn't he got an ugly scowl? And she's almost crying."

He flushed scarlet and sent a glowering glance down into the crowd. He turned upon Catherine: "Just hear that! They think I'm rowing you. By—beg pardon, but—well—I sha'n't endure it another instant." And he rose, brushed past Catherine's mother and Longview, Honoria and two men hanging over her, and stalked along the aisle down into and through the recognizing crowd, and out of the Garden.

The boxes ate greedily of this sensation, and the crowd in the promenade scrambled frantically for the crumbs. It was presently noised round that the Englishman had become angered, had struck some one. Rumor at first said it was Catherine; but the crowd by the use of its legs and eyes, and the boxes by the use of their glasses, learned that this was false. There sat Catherine, calm, absorbed in the ring, applauding the jumpers, and turning now and then to her companions with outbursts of ladylike enthusiasm for some particularly clever performance. However, crowd and boxes saw that the Englishman was gone, felt that he must have gone in anger.

The Longview party stopped at the Waldorf for supper, and Frothingham, calmer and a little embarrassed, joined them. Catherine received him as if nothing had taken place, and the next night they appeared together at the Garden as usual.

Late in the evening she said to him: "I've told mother of our engagement. Do you mind, dear?"

His face lighted up.

"She wishes you to come down to the country with us on Sunday to stay a week or two. It is beautiful there, and we shall be very quiet. Shall you like that?"

"And I may speak to your father?" he asked. "In my country it wouldn't be regarded as honorable for me to act as I've been acting with you. I can't help feeling uncomfortable because I've said nothing to your father."

"I'll speak to him first, Arthur. He lets me do as I please. And he'll be contented with whatever makes me happy. He's such a dear!"

Frothingham looked faintly annoyed. It was not in his plan to include "father" in their romance. Romance with daughter, business with father—that was the proper and discreet distribution of the preliminaries to the formal engagement. He had, deep down, a horrible, nervous fear that he might be drawn into matrimony without definite settlements—the father might be as difficult to pin down in his way as was the daughter in her way. "I must take this business in hand," he said to himself, "or it will be a ghastly mess."

DAY AFTER DAY, NIGHT AFTER NIGHT, SHE SHOWED HERSELF OFF

Catherine, her mother and he went down on the one o'clock train. The Hollisters' country place—Lake-in-the-Wood—was a great pile of brick and stone, impressive for size rather than for beauty, filled with expensive furnishings and swarming servants in showy livery, and surrounded by a handsome, well-ordered park with winding walks and drives and romantically bridged streams flowing to and from a large lake. They lived with more ceremony that did Surrey at Heath Hall—but there was an air of newness and stiffness and prodigal profusion about it all, a suggestion of a creation of yesterday that might find a grave to-morrow. This impression, which had often come to him in the palaces of New York, began to form as the porter opened the huge gates between the park and the highway. It grew stronger and stronger as he penetrated into the gaudy, if tasteful, establishment. Everything was too new, too grand, too fine. The daughter alone was at her ease; the mother was not quite at her ease; the father was distinctly, if self-mockingly, ill at ease.

The two women left Frothingham alone with him, and the old man soon vented his dissatisfaction. "I suppose you like this sort of thing," he said with a wave of the arm to indicate that he meant the establishment. "But I don't. If I had my way we'd be simple and comfortable—no, I don't mean that, exactly. I suppose at bottom I'm as big a fool as the women. But, all the same, French cooking gives me indigestion. That infernal frog-eater in the right wing has it in for me. He's killing me by inches. And I'm so afraid of him and the butler and all the rest of 'em that I don't kick the traces more than once a week." He laughed. "My wife and daughter have got me well trained. Whenever they tell me to, I sit up on my hind legs and 'speak' for crackers and snap 'em off my nose."

Frothingham liked him at once—he was a big, handsome old fellow with keen, steel-gray eyes and the strong look of the successful man of affairs. "I fancy he's almost one of those Americans Wallingford talked about," he thought.

After a smoke with Hollister he went to his rooms—a suite of vast chambers, like the show rooms of a palace, with a marble bathroom that had a small swimming pool sunk in the middle of it. He looked out upon the drive and the park and the half-hidden streams glittering in the sunshine. "These people will beat us out at our own game when they get used to the cards," he said.

There was the sound of wheels and horses—many wheels and many horses. He looked down the drive—one after another came into view a three-seated buckboard, a stylish omnibus, a wagon with the seats taken out to make room for a huge pile of luggage. In the buckboard and the omnibus he recognized men and women whom he had met in New York—the Leightons, the Spencers, the Farrells, the Howards, Mrs. Carnarvon, Wallingford, Gresham, Browne, a man whose name he could not recall, Miss Lester, Miss Devenant. "I thought Catherine and I were to be 'very quiet,'" he muttered.

There were thirty-two people at dinner that night, sixteen of whom, including himself, were guests in the house for stays of three days, a week, ten days. "You said we were to be alone," he said to Catherine with ironic reproach.

She gave him her pathetic, helpless look. "I did hope so. But I asked some, and mamma asked others, and the rest asked themselves."

The days passed, and he had only fleeting glimpses of her. Everybody was hunting, riding, driving, going to luncheons, teas, dinners, through a neighborhood ten miles square. Every moment from early until late was more than occupied—it was crowded, jammed. His idea of country life was the quiet, lazy ease of England; a week of this rushing about fagged him, body and mind. He ceased to try for a moment alone with her; he saw that it was hopeless to expect so much in a place where he could not get a moment alone with himself.

"You never rest in this country?" he said, addressing the men in the library at midnight, as they were having a final nightcap.

"Why should we?" replied Browne. "Why anticipate the grave's only pleasure?"

"You see," explained Wallingford, "on this side of the water we take our pleasures energetically. When we work, we work hard; when we play, we play hard. If we're having a good time, we crowd our luck in the hope of having a better time. If we're bored, we hurry, to get it over with."

"Do you keep this up the year round?"

"Except on ocean steamers. But we'll close that gap when we get the 'wireless' installed, with a telephone to the head of every berth."

VI

ON A MONDAY morning—Frothingham's eighth day at Lake-in-the-Wood—only Wallingford and the tireless Catherine appeared for the early ride. "It's cold," said Wallingford. "Shall we canter?" And they swept through the gates and on over the frost-spangled meadows for several miles before they drew their horses in to a walk. Catherine's cheeks were glowing and her eyes were not dreamy and soulful, but bright with vigorous, wide-awake life.

"I haven't seen you looking so well in years, Kitty." Wallingford was examining her with the slightly mocking, indifferent eyes that had piqued not a few women into trying to make him like them. "You look positively human. And it's becoming—most becoming."

Catherine began to scramble into her pose. She did not like to be caught lapsing from her ideals.

"Why do you do it?" Wallingford dropped his mockery for an instant. "Your own individuality, no matter how poor you may think it, is far better than any you could possibly invent—or borrow."

Catherine looked hurt. "Why do you charge deception against every one who lives above your level?" she asked. "I hope you're not going to be nasty this morning, Joe. I'm blue."

"What's the matter? Something real, or——"

"Don't tease. This is real."

"What is it? I see you wish to be encouraged to tell me."

"No—I couldn't tell any one." Catherine's eyes were tragic. "It's one of those things that can't be told, but must be——"

"Go on. What is it?" Wallingford refused to be impressed by tragedy. "I see you're dying to tell me. Why not get it over with?"

"You are so sympathetic, Joe. You pretend not to understand me, but I feel that you always do."

"You mean that I refuse to be misled by your charming little pretenses. But how could I? Why, don't I remember the day, the very hour, you went in for the 'soulful'? I must say, I never could see why you took that up as your fad. Being natural is much harder to win out at—few people are interesting or even endurable when they're natural."

"Joe," she said absently, as if she had not heard him, "I'm afraid I'm making a—a dreadful—mistake."

"Well?" he asked, almost gruffly, after a short pause.

"About—about—Lord Frothingham," she confessed, lowering her eyelids until her long lashes shadowed her cheeks.

"Oh, I think you'll land him, all right," said Wallingford encouragingly. "He's a bit gone on you, and then, too, he needs the cash."

"Please don't speak of him in that way, Joe. He's not a vulgar fortune-hunter, but a high, sensitive, noble man."

"Who said he was a vulgar fortune-hunter? On the contrary, he's an honest British merchant, taking his title to market. And he's been lucky enough to find a good customer."

Catherine ignored this description of her knight and her romance. "You know I'm engaged to him?" she asked.

"Ever since the first time I saw your mother look at him."

"Yes—she approves it."

"I should say she would," said Wallingford judicially. "She's got the best part of it. She'll have all the glory of having an Earl in the family, and she won't have to live with him."

"I'm—afraid—I don't love him as I ought," said Catherine with a sigh.

Wallingford laughed. "Now, of what use is it to talk this over, Kitty, if you won't be frank? It can't be a question of loving him that's troubling you. Of course you don't love him. You love his title, and that would prevent you from loving him for himself, no matter how attractive he was. But why bother about love? He's giving you what you really want."

"What do I want?" She looked at Wallingford with sincere appeal, slightly humorous but earnest.

"I once thought that you wanted to be a real woman. But ever since your mother took you abroad to fill her own and your head with foreign notions I've been losing faith. What do you want now? Why, the trash you're buying."

"Joe, how can you think that I'd sell myself?"

"Why not? It's generally regarded as a reputable transaction—unless one is vulgar enough to sell out for the mere necessaries of life. Oh, I'm not criticising you, Kitty. Perhaps I'd sell myself if I could get any sort of price. Never having been tempted, I can't say what I'd do."

"Please don't talk in that way, even in jest. It isn't true. I know it isn't true. And it's knowing that that makes me——" She hesitated, then went on—"despise myself. It's of no use to lie to you, Joe. I'm glad there's somebody I can't lie to, somebody that sees into me and forces me to look at myself as I am. And sometimes I hate you for it. Yes, I hate you for it, now!" She was sitting very erect upon her horse, her head thrown back, tears of anger in her eyes.

"Hate?" He shook his head teasingly at her. "I envy you. I've tried every other emotion, and I'd like to try that. But I can't. I can't hate even Frothingham. On the contrary, I like him. If you must have a title, you've got to take a husband with it. And, I must say, I think you'll be able to harness Frothingham down to a fairly reliable family horse."

"How can you jest so coarsely about such a serious matter?" she exclaimed indignantly.

"But is it? What does it matter whom you marry so long as you have no purpose in life other than to make a show and to induce stupid, shallow people to admire you and envy you for the things you've got that can be bought and sold? It's better, on the whole, isn't it, my friend, that you should carry out these purposes through a foreigner and in a foreign country than that you should spoil some promising American and be a bad influence here?"

"You are cruel, Joe. And I thought you'd sympathize with me, and help me!"

There was a pause, then he demanded abruptly, "What does your father say?"

She flushed—partly at the memory of the interview with her father, partly through shame in recollecting that she had led Frothingham to believe she had not told him. "He said—but why should I tell you?"

"I don't know, I'm sure, unless because you wish to."

"Well—I will tell you. He said" (she imitated his nasal drawl): "'If your ma and you want to make the deal, I'll sign the papers. I reckon you know what you're about. And all our money's for is to make us happy. Buy what you please—I'll settle for it.'"

"Was that all?"

Catherine lowered her eyes. "Yes, that was all he said. But he looked—Joe, it was his look that upset me."

"I understand." Wallingford's voice was gentle and sympathetic now. "And what answer are you going to make to that look?"

"I'd rather not say," she replied, giving him a brilliant smile. "Let's canter again. We must get home."

As soon as she reached the house she went to her mother's rooms. Mrs. Hollister was just finishing her morning's work with her secretary. Catherine waited, impatiently playing with her riding-whip. When the secretary left she said: "Mother, I'm going to throw him over."

Mrs. Hollister hesitated for an instant in putting away some of her especially private papers, then went on. Presently she said tranquilly: "You will do nothing of the sort."

Catherine quailed before that tone—she had been ruled by her mother all her life, had never been interfered with in any matter which her mother regarded as unimportant, had never been permitted to decide any matter which her mother regarded as important. And her mother's rule was the most formidable of all tyrannies—the tyranny of kindness.

"But, mother, I should be wretched with him."

"Why?"

On the basis of their method of thought and speech each with the other, it was impossible for her to erect "Because I don't love him" into a plausible objection. So she said: "We have nothing in common. His laziness and cynicism irritate me. He makes me nervous. He bores me."

"All men are objectionable in one way or another," replied her mother. "If you had married the ordinary man you would have had nothing after you had grown tired. But marrying him, you'll have first, last and all the time the solid advantages of your position and your title. And you'll like him better when you're used to him—he has admirable qualities for a husband."

"I can't marry him," said Catherine doggedly. She knew that it was useless to argue with her mother.

"You can't refuse to marry him. It would be dishonorable. Your word is pledged. It would be impossible for a child of mine to be guilty of a dishonorable action."

"When I tell him how I feel he will release me."

"You mean he would refuse to marry a woman who, after treating a man as you have treated him, would show herself so light and so lacking in honor. No, my daughter will not disgrace herself and her family." Mrs. Hollister seated herself beside Catherine and put an arm round her. "She has had her every whim gratified, and that has made her careless of responsibilities. But she will not show herself in serious matters light and untrustworthy."

Catherine stiffened herself against the gentle yet masterful force that seemed to be stealing in upon her from her mother's embrace and tone.

"You've come to one of those rough places in life," Mrs. Hollister went on, "where young people need the help of some older, more experienced person. And I wish to see you safely over it."

"I can't marry him, mother."

Mrs. Hollister frowned for a second, then her face cleared and she said quietly: "Your father and I have put you in a position to establish yourself well in life. You have engaged yourself to an honorable man who has something to offer you, who can insure you a position that will be a satisfaction to you all your life and to your children after you. I know I have not brought you up so badly that you would throw away your career, would disregard the interests of those you may bring into the world, all for a mere whim."

Catherine was silent.

"Even if you cared for some one else——"

"But I do," interrupted Catherine impetuously.

Mrs. Hollister winced and reflected before she went on: "It cannot be a serious attachment, Catherine, or I should have noticed it. Is it Joseph Wallingford?"

Catherine did not answer.

"Even if you had been attracted for a moment by a man who had something to offer besides a little sentiment that would be gone in a few months after marriage, still it would be your duty to yourself and to your family to make the sensible marriage. You are not a foolish girl. You are not a child. You know what the substantial things in life are."

"I can't marry him," repeated Catherine stubbornly.

"Has Wallingford been making love to you?" The anger was close to the surface in Mrs. Hollister's voice.

Catherine smiled bitterly. "No," she answered, "he has not. He cares nothing for me. But I can't marry Lord Frothingham—and I won't."

"You must not say that, Catherine," said her mother sternly. "It is a great shock to me to find that you cannot be trusted. If you refused to marry the man you have voluntarily engaged yourself to, I should never forgive you."

Catherine's eyes sank before her mother's. "The engagement must be announced at once," her mother went on. "You will change your mind when you have thought it over, and when you realize what my feelings are."

"I can't," began Catherine monotonously.

"I wish to hear no more about it, child," interrupted her mother, her eyes glittering a forewarning of the hate she would have for a daughter who disobeyed her. "To-morrow we will talk of it again."

Catherine and her mother arose and each faced the other for a moment—two inflexible wills. For Mrs. Hollister had made one error, and that fatal, in training her daughter. She had not broken her will in childhood, when the stiffest inherited will can be made to yield; she had only subdued it, driven it to cover. She had left her her individuality. But she did not know this; so, she saw her daughter's looks, saw her daughter leave the room, resolution in every curve of her figure, and was not in the least disturbed as to the event. The idea that she, Maria Hollister, could be defied by any one in her family—or out of it—could not form in her mind. "It is fortunate," she said to herself, "that Wallingford is leaving early in the morning. I'll announce the engagement at dinner to-night."

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

WASHINGTON was relieved when the Venezuelan arbitration was agreed on. The trouble may flame out again when the award shall be made; the status may then be just what it was when the lions and the wildcat were glowering at each other; Venezuela, with South American irresponsibility, may refuse or may find herself unable to pay whatever the award may be; but this is not probable, and in any event there is a lull pending the adjudication.

The President has been showered with congratulations on his good sense in declining the clever and flattering invitation to be arbiter, and on his success in bringing the European Powers to accept The Hague tribunal. From the American standpoint this is a wise and fortunate conclusion. And yet the question was not altogether one-sided. If there was a suspicion that the President was strongly tempted by the proposal to refer the dispute to him, it was not far from the truth; and the inclination did not rest alone on his temperamental willingness to take responsibility, but upon his perception of some advantages in that course.

It would have put the whole case in his hands from the beginning—not merely the guidance of the American attitude and policy but the determination of the merits of the dispute and of the form of settling it. The President would then have had control of the whole mechanism of the proceeding. As arbiter he would have passed on the validity of the claims; he would have decided how much is due; and he would have indicated the form and method of payment. As President he would still have been free to determine the relations of the United States to the judgment and to any questions growing out of it. While acting as arbiter he would have had nothing to do as President on this subject, and when the time for acting as President came he would have ceased to be arbiter.

Nor would there have been any embarrassment in the mere function of adjudicating the dispute. That duty entails simply an examination of the merits of the claims and a judgment of how much money is due. An award of territory is expressly excluded by the conditions of the reference. There are principles of international law involved, like that of the right and obligation of a nation to protect its own nationals in another country; but the arbitrament is only the determination of these questions. When the judgment is tendered the duty of the arbiter ends.

Doubtless the English and German Governments asked President Roosevelt to arbitrate with the feeling that his position as President of the United States would morally enforce his decision as judge, both in its influence on his own action and in its constraint on Venezuela. Though the two relations would be entirely distinct in terms it would be difficult to keep them entirely dissociated in effect. Probably the immediate participation of the President as arbiter would induce the Government of the United States, without assuming any obligation, to facilitate a mode of settlement through private advances; but in the end it may find it expedient to do this anyway.

Thus there would have been advantages and disadvantages in the President's acceptance of the rôle of arbiter. On the one side, it would have kept the control of the whole matter in American hands; on the other, it would consciously or unconsciously have affected the President's freedom to deal with any possible exigency growing out of the issue as the interests of the United States might dictate. For this reason he was wise, on the whole, in declining it. The final adoption of The Hague court is a great triumph for the principle of arbitration and gives a powerful impulse to that tribunal. It was in danger of lapsing into a desuetude far from innocuous. Europe had created it and then had left it as a waif on the doorstep of the nations. The United States has rescued it and given it new life and prestige.

This fact is the more significant and notable since in reality the United States has less interest in The Hague tribunal than Europe ought to have. That tribunal is essentially a European court. The United States and Mexico are the only American nations that participated in the conference or that have any members in the list of judges. We are two against twenty. The questions which we shall have for arbitration will for the most part, in the nature of things, be primarily American questions. In any issue between the United States and a nation of Europe which is of a general character and free from distinctive American elements The Hague tribunal would be as acceptable to us as any. But where the issue involves specific American rights and principles, shall we be ready always to refer to that arbitration?

The Venezuelan dispute is primarily a mere question of indebtedness and indemnity. But there are collateral issues which turn wholly on American doctrine and American purposes as distinct from those of Europe. That is why the President's assumption of the position of arbiter would to that extent have been advantageous. It is the reason why an American arbitration outside of the President, of commensurate dignity and authority, like that of one or more judges of the Supreme Court, would have been desirable. It is the reason why The Hague court, with all that may be said for it, does not meet the highest ideal of a tribunal for the determination of American issues.

When Arbitration May be Refused

There are two considerations, however, which partially neutralize the objections. The first is that Venezuela will probably make her choice of arbitrators from among the American judges. The second is that in the creation of the tribunal the United States expressly reserved from its scope the Monroe Doctrine and the traditional relations of this country to questions purely American. That is a vital limitation and safeguard. Beyond that, every nation reserves the right to refuse reference to arbitration at all when its honor or safety is at stake. But we are determining general principles of action and making precedents. We are seeking to advance the cause of arbitration instead of war for the settlement of international disputes, and we are bound to consider the tendencies of our action in all its relations.

We can conceive of questions which we would not submit to arbitration at all, and we can conceive of others which we would submit only to arbitration exempt from European bias and entirely free to give just weight to American considerations. For example, we have an issue ostensibly with the British Government and really with Canada over the Alaska boundary. It has been laid aside for the time being under a modus vivendi. But the issue remains and sometime it must be settled. Our title is clear and impregnable, and the Canadian claim is an impudent and trumped-up pretense. There is so little warrant for the invasion of our boundary that we should probably never consent to arbitrate the question, any more than we should arbitrate an insolent and baseless pretension to a slice of New York.

But if we were ever brought to acquiesce in its arbitration, should we consent to submit it to The Hague tribunal? Should we leave this American question to that court with its European influences and traditions? The Geneva award was fair and reasonable—was, indeed, all that we could rightfully ask or expect from a European or any other court; but was the excessive judgment in the Fisheries case calculated to induce the submission of an American issue to judges wholly surrounded by a European atmosphere?

These considerations suffice to suggest that American questions are to be treated from the American standpoint, and that an American arbitration of the Venezuelan dispute, if it could have been secured free from other complications, would have been in line with the policy which American statesmen cannot dismiss from view. American and Continental development imposes more and more on our Government the necessity of framing an American policy which shall be large enough for the coming requirements. There is a respite now while the Venezuelan difficulties go to the judicial realm of The Hague tribunal. But when the award shall be made the subject will reappear with all its perplexities and obligations.

The Monroe Doctrine is more vital to the United States now than when it was first proclaimed. Its enunciation eighty years ago was not only a theoretical protection of America against a then not aggressive Europe, but it was a prophetic conception of a still more important defense in the future. The great Powers of Europe have apportioned Asia and Africa among themselves, either actually or prospectively. Their territory and spheres of influence on the broad continents of the Eastern world are substantially delineated. With that division the metes and bounds of their development are set. Now that they can see their limits there, if South America, with its 7,000,000 square miles and 60,000,000 people, divided among feeble nations, some of them in chronic revolution, were open to them, how eagerly they would plot for it!

But the Monroe Doctrine impressively and authoritatively says, Hands Off! Eighty years ago Europe did not want South America. The Holy Alliance simply wanted to sustain senile Spain in the impotent scheme of reëstablishing her sceptre. The Monroe Doctrine was more of an academic proposition then. Now Europe has reached the stage of advance where, circumscribed elsewhere, she would naturally be thinking of at least staking out claims in South America. Such a movement would present the danger of some of the great Powers of Europe planting themselves on our continent with the design of extension. To proclaim the Monroe Doctrine now, as a new national purpose, would be a direct challenge to a direct menace and might be regarded as an affront. But to reaffirm it as the legacy of the past and the fixed policy of the nation is only to repeat our established traditions and to maintain a secure bulwark without giving offense. Never was any national keynote in the early days of feebleness more fortunate than the Monroe Doctrine!

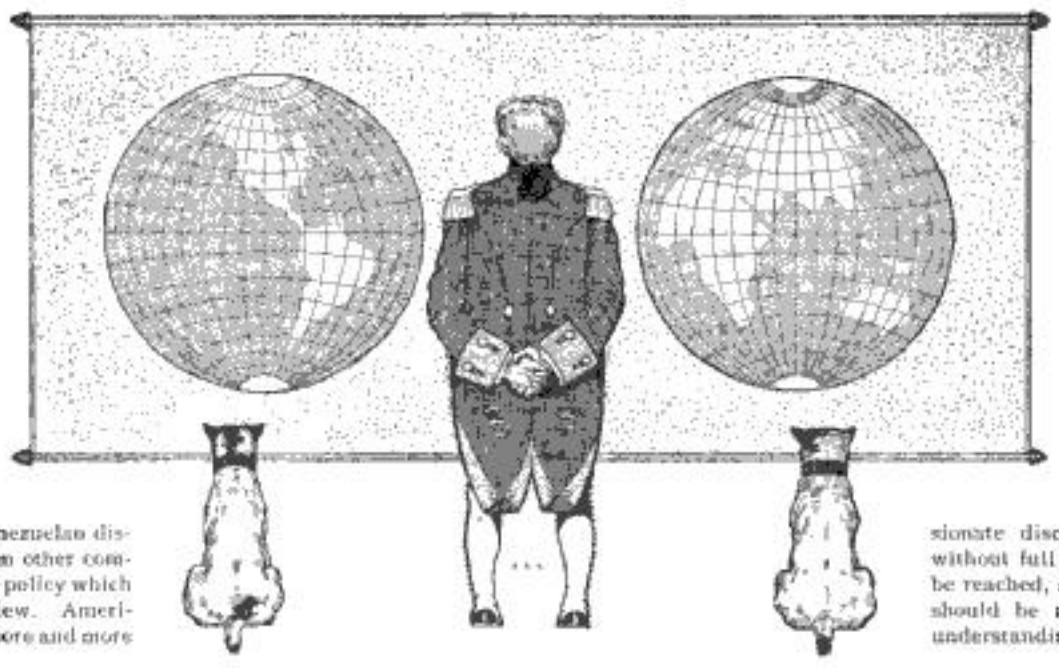
But what is to accompany it? If we are to forbid European occupation, how are European claims to be met? If South American nations are to be shielded from European conquest, how are they to be kept from repudiating obligations? Is Europe to be told that, if she deals with South America she must take the risks? Is South America to be told that, if she is to be protected against territorial levy, she must give other bonds? Must arrangements be made that where states persist in default a sort of receivership shall be established and the revenues administered for the benefit of creditors? Must the United States exercise friendly offices in fiscal supervision as in territorial protection? Must we so adjust communications and reciprocal relations with South America that her dealings will be with us and in our control instead of with Europe?

Practical statesmanship crosses the bridge when it comes to it. It does not lay down a program for contingencies which may vary their course, but meets each question as it arises. But these thoughts suggest some of the great and intricate questions with which our Government must deal in the broad field of international action. Nothing indicates the extraordinary growth of the United States more than the part it is now playing in the world's affairs. The difference within five years is amazing. And what is no less gratifying is the signal skill with which she is playing that part.

The Monumental Measure of the Session

What great and difficult problems it has to deal with in domestic affairs is shown in Senator Hoar's anti-trust bill and Attorney-General Knox's suggestions. That bill looms up as the monumental measure of the session. This does not mean that it will pass. It would be remarkable if a bill proposing so great and sweeping a change in business regulation could go through the inevitable discussion, secure the necessary concentration of opinion, and reach final enactment in a single short session. This is hardly to be expected, even if ultimate adoption might be anticipated. But it is the monumental measure of the session because it presents the most important and overshadowing question, and because it brings to a focus the practical problem of regulating the trusts. Assuming that it crystallizes the policy and methods which the discussion and study of months have brought out, and that it embodies in substance the general scheme of Federal control of corporations, its transcendent importance will at once be recognized.

In a degree it is a radical and revolutionary measure. The transfer of the control of all corporations from the States to the Federal Government is a new departure in our American system. The assumption not merely of regulating interstate commerce in its general commercial relations, but of laying the hand of the Federal Government on all business which is done under a corporate organization, and exercising a rigorous supervisory authority, is something which on the surface is quite foreign to our American conception of liberty of action.



This is what Senator Hoar's bill does in substance. Under our modern conditions most large business is done under corporate form. All corporations whose business passes State lines are engaged in interstate commerce. Under Senator Hoar's bill they cannot carry on their affairs without agreeing to conditions which give the Attorney-General power to enter their offices, open their books, examine their papers and exact any report he chooses. They cannot undersell or give discounts from market rates or offer preferences or enter into any combination which may be alleged to be for the purpose of driving out of business any other person engaged therein. Any violation of the provisions of the act renders any officer or director of the corporation liable for all its debts and obligations, and any infraction of its prohibitions is punishable by fine and imprisonment.

The Drastic Character of Senator Hoar's Trust Bill

The drastic character of this measure is plain. It may be that an act of such far-reaching force is necessary to provide effective protection against the trust abuses at which it is aimed. It may be that in the prodigious development of modern enterprise and in the rage for corporate combination the time has come for the application of such stringent safeguards. It may be that in its practical operation the restraints and severities of such an act would fall only on the perpetrators of the wrongs which are to be reached and that it would involve no real hardship where there is no violation of its provisions. But it is essential that if the country is to enter upon this departure it shall be with an intelligent understanding of its import and character.

The searching provisions of this measure are analagous to those of the national banking law. The Comptroller of the Currency may go into a bank precisely as the Attorney-General under this act could go behind the doors of a business corporation. He may inspect the books, summon the officers, probe the records and hold to the strictest account. But a bank is a fiduciary institution. It is not a mere trader, but holds a trust for a large clientage. It possesses privileges in return for its strict accountability. The application of the same rules of supervision, the same powers of inspection, and the same measure of responsibility to ordinary business which gets nothing in return except the right to do business across State lines is an extension of the principle to which we are not accustomed.

It involves a long advance in the evolution of governmental control and private responsibility—an advance which may be the inevitable necessity of new conditions, but which requires that we fit our conceptions to new theories. Many secondary questions arise at once. Would it be possible to modify and mitigate the radical provisions without impairing the efficacy of the measure for its essential purpose? Would it be practicable by some rule of classification to make it reach the combinations which really need regulation without hampering the body of business? Would it be feasible to enforce accountability on the part of business without letting loose irresponsibility and caprice on the part of any chance Government officer?

It is evident that the broad issue and practical details of Senator Hoar's bill present the most momentous question of domestic concern which has come to us since the Civil War. It requires the most thorough, searching and dispassionate discussion. It cannot and ought not to pass without full debate. No precipitate conclusion should be reached, and if we are finally to adopt this policy it should be after ample deliberation and with a clear understanding of all that it involves.

—RAN HATLESS AND PANTING ACROSS THE FLOOR

CHAPTER XIX

ONCE free of the crowd after leaving Page, Landry ran with all the swiftness of his long legs down the stairs and through the corridors till, all out of breath, he gained Gretry's private office. The other Pit traders for the house, some eight or ten men, were already assembled, and just as Landry entered by one door the broker himself came from the customers' room. Jadwin was nowhere to be seen.

"What are the orders for to-day, sir?"

Gretry was very pale. Despite his long experience on the Board of Trade, Landry could see anxiety in every change of his expression, in every motion of his hands. The broker before answering the question crossed the room to the water cooler and drank a brief swallow. Then emptying the glass he refilled it, moistened his lips again, and again emptied and filled the goblet. He put it down, caught it up once more, filled it, emptied it, drinking now in long drafts, now in little sips. He was quite unconscious of his actions, and Landry as he watched felt his heart sink. Things must, indeed, be at a desperate pass when Gretry, the calm, the clear-headed, the placid, was thus upset.

"Your orders?" said the broker at last. "The same as yesterday; keep the market up—that's all. It must not go below a dollar fifteen. But act on defensive. Don't be aggressive unless I send word. There will probably be very heavy selling the first few moments. You can buy, each of you, up to half a million bushels apiece. If that don't keep the price up, if they still are selling after that, . . . well"—Gretry paused a moment, irresolutely—"well," he added suddenly, "if they are still selling freely after you've each bought half a million, I'll let you know what to do. And look here," he continued, facing the group, "look here—keep your heads cool. . . . I guess to-day will decide things. Watch the Crookes crowd pretty closely. I understand they're up to something again. That's all, I guess."

Landry and the other Gretry traders hurried from the office up to the floor. Landry's heart was beating thick and slow and hard, his teeth were shut tight. Every nerve, every fibre of him braced itself with the rigidity of drawn wire to meet the issue of the impending hours. Now was to come the last grapple. He had never lived through a crisis such as this before. Would he prevail—would he keep his head? Would he avoid or balk the thousand and one little subterfuges, tricks and traps that the hostile traders would prepare for him—prepare with a quickness, a suddenness that all but defied the sharpest, keenest watchfulness?

Was the gong never going to strike? He found himself all at once on the edge of the Wheat Pit. It was jammed tight with the crowd of traders; the excitement that disengaged itself from that tense, vehement crowd of white faces and glittering eyes was veritably sickening, veritably weakening. Men on either side of him were shouting mere incoherencies, to which nobody, not even themselves, was listening. Others, silent, gnawed their nails to the quick, breathing rapidly, audibly even, their nostrils expanding and contracting. All around roared the vague thunder that since early morning had shaken the building. In the Pit the bids leaped to and fro, though the time of opening had not yet come; the very planks under foot seemed spinning about in the first huge warning swirl of the Pit's centripetal convulsion. There was dizziness in the air; something, some infinite, immeasurable power, onrushing in its eternal courses, shook the Pit in its grasp. Something deafened the ears, blinded the eyes, dulled and numbed the mind with its roar, with the chaff and dust of its whirlwind passage, with the stupefying sense of its power, coeval with the earthquake and glacier, merciless, all-powerful, a primal basic throe of creation itself, unassailable, inviolate and untamed.

Had the trading begun? Had the gong struck? Landry never knew, never so much as heard the clang of the great bell. All at once he was fighting; all at once he was caught, as it were, from off the stable earth and flung headlong into the heart and centre of the Pit. What he did he could not say; what went on about him he could not distinguish. He only knew that roar was succeeding roar, that there was crashing through his ears, through his very brain, the combined bellow of a hundred Niagaras. Hands clutched and tore at him, his own tore and clutched in turn. The Pit was mad, was drunk and frenzied; not a man of all those who fought and scrambled and shouted that knew what he or his neighbor did. They knew only that a support long thought to be secure was giving way, not gradually, not evenly, but by horrible collapses, and equally horrible upward leaps. Now it held, now it broke, now it reformed again, rose again, then again in hideous cataclysms fell from beneath their feet to lower depths than before. The official reporter leaned back in his place, helpless. On the wall overhead the indicator on the dial was rocking back and forth like the mast of a ship caught in a monsoon. The price of July wheat no man could so much as approximate. The fluctuations were no longer by fractions of a cent, but by ten cents, fifteen cents, twenty-five cents at a time. On one side of the Pit wheat sold at ninety cents, on the other at a dollar and a quarter.

And all the while above the din upon the floor, above the tramplings and the shouting in the Pit, there seemed to thrill and swell that appalling roar of the wheat itself coming in, coming on like a tidal wave, bursting through, dashing barriers aside, rolling like a measureless, almighty river from the farms of Iowa and the ranches of California, on to the East—to the bakeshops and hungry mouths of Europe.

Landry caught one of the Gretry traders by the arm.

"What shall we do?" he shouted. "I've bought up to my limit. No more orders have come in. The market has gone from under us. What's to be done?"

"I don't know," the other shouted back. "I don't know. We're all gone to the bow-wows; looks like the last smash. There are no more supporting orders—something's gone wrong. Gretry hasn't sent any word."

Then Landry, beside himself with excitement and with actual terror, hardly knowing even yet what he did, turned sharply about. He fought his way out of the Pit; he ran hatless and panting across the floor, in and out between the groups of spectators, down the stairs to the corridor below, and into the Gretry-Converse offices.

In the outer office a group of reporters and the representatives of a great commercial agency were besieging one of the heads of the firm. They assaulted him with questions.

"Just tell us where you are at—that's all we want to know."

"Just what is the price of July wheat?"

"Is Jadwin winning or losing?"

But the other threw out an arm in a wild gesture of helplessness.

"We don't know ourselves," he cried. "The market has run clean away from everybody. You know as much about it as I do. It's simply hell broken loose, that's all. We can't tell where we are at for days to come."

Landry rushed on. He swung open the door of the private office and entered, slamming it behind him and crying out:

"Mr. Gretry, what are we to do? We've had no orders."

But no one listened to him. Of the group that gathered around Gretry's desk no one so much as turned a head.

Jadwin stood there in the centre of the others, hatless, his face pale, his eyes congested with blood. Gretry fronted him, one hand upon his arm. In the remainder of the group Landry recognized the senior clerk of the office, one of the heads of a great banking house, and two other men—confidential agents, who had helped to manipulate the great corner.

"But you can't," Gretry cried. "You can't; don't you see we can't meet our margin calls? It's the end of the game. You've got no more money—you——"

"It's a lie!" Never so long as he lived did Landry forget the voice in which Jadwin cried the words: "It's a lie. Keep on buying, I tell you. Take all they'll offer. I tell you we'll touch the two-dollar mark before noon."

"Not another order goes up to that floor," retorted Gretry. "Why, J., ask any of these gentlemen here. They'll tell you."

"It's useless, Mr. Jadwin," said the banker quietly. "You were practically beaten two days ago."

"Mr. Jadwin," pleaded the senior clerk, "listen to reason. Our firm——"

"GIVE A DOLLAR FOR JULY!"

But Jadwin was beyond all appeal. He threw off Gretry's hand.

"Your firm, your firm—oh, you've been cowards from the start. I know you, I know you. You have sold me out. Crookes has bought you. Get out of my way!" he shouted. "Get out of my way! Do you hear? I'll play my hand alone from now on."

"J., old man. Why—see here, man," Gretry implored, still holding by the arm; "here, where are you going?"

Jadwin's voice rang like a trumpet call:

"Into the Pit."

"Look here—wait—here. Hold him back, gentlemen. He don't know what he's about."

"If you don't execute my orders I'll act myself. I'm going into the Pit, I tell you."

"J., you're mad, old fellow. You're ruined—don't you understand?—you're ruined."

"Then curse you, Sam Gretry, for the man who failed me in a crisis!" And as he spoke Curtis Jadwin struck the broker full in the face.

Gretry staggered back from the blow, catching at the edge of his desk. His pale face flashed to crimson for an instant, his fists clutched, then his hands fell to his sides.

"No," he said, "let him go, let him go. The man is merely mad."

But Jadwin, struggling for a second in the midst of the group that tried to hold him, suddenly flung off restraining clasps, thrust the men to one side, and rushed from the room.

Gretry dropped into his chair before his desk.

"It's the end," he said simply.

He drew a sheet of notepaper to him, and in a shaking hand wrote a couple of lines.

"Take that," he said, handing the note to the senior clerk—"Take that to the Secretary of the Board at once."

And straight into the turmoil and confusion of the Pit, to the scene of so many of his victories, the battle-ground whereon again and again, his enemies routed, he had remained the victor undisputed, undismayed, came the "Great Bull." No sooner had he set foot within the entrance to the floor than the news went flashing and flying from lip to lip. The galleries knew it, the public room and the Western Union knew it, the telephone booths knew it, and lastly even the Wheat Pit, torn and tossed and rent asunder by the power this man himself had unchained, knew it, and knowing stood dismayed.

For even then, so great had been his power, so complete his dominion, and so well-rooted the fear which he had inspired, that this last move in the great game he had been playing, this unexpected, direct, personal assumption of control struck a sense of consternation into the heart of the hardiest of his enemies.

Jadwin himself, the great man, the "Great Bull" in the Pit! What was about to happen? Had they been too premature in their hope of his defeat? Had he been preparing some secret, unexpected manœuvre? For a second they hesitated; then, being moved by a common impulse, gathering themselves together for the final assault, they again offered the wheat for sale; offered it by thousands upon thousands of bushels: poured, as it were, the harvests of entire principalities out upon the floor of the Board of Trade.

Jadwin was in the thick of the confusion by now. And the avalanche, the unleashed ocean of the wheat, leaping to the lash of the hurricane, struck him fairly in the face.

He heard it now, he heard nothing else. The wheat had broken from his control. For months he had, by the might of his single arm, held it back; but now it rose like the upbuilding of a colossal billow. It towered, towered, hung poised an instant, and then, with a thunder as of the grind and crash of chaotic worlds, broke upon him, burst through the Pit and raced past him, on and on to the eastward and to the hungry nations.

Under the stress and violence of the hour something had snapped in his brain. The queer murk behind his eyes had been suddenly pierced by a white flash. The strange qualms and tiny nervous paroxysms of the last few months all at once culminated in some indefinite, indefinable crisis, and the wheels and cogs of all activities save one lapsed away and ceased. Only one function of the complicated machine persisted; but it moved with a rapidity of vibration that seemed to be tearing the tissues of being to shreds, while its rhythm beat out the old and terrible cadence:

"Wheat-wheat-wheat, wheat-wheat-wheat."

Blind and insensate, Jadwin strove against the torrent of the wheat. There in the middle of the Pit, surrounded and assaulted by herd after herd of wolves yelping for his destruction, he stood braced, rigid upon his feet, his head up, his hand, the great bony hand that once had held the whole Pit in its grip, flung high in the air, in a gesture of defiance, while his voice, like the clangor of bugles sounding to the charge of the forlorn hope, rang out again and again, over the din of his enemies:

"Give a dollar for July—give a dollar for July!"

With one accord they leaped upon him. The little group of his traders was swept aside. Landry alone, Landry who had never left his side since his rush from out Gretry's office, Landry Court, loyal to the last, his one remaining soldier, white, shaking, the sobs straining in his throat, clung to him desperately. Another billow of wheat was preparing. They two—the beaten general and his young armor-bearer—heard it coming; hissing, raging, bellowing, it swept down upon them. Landry uttered a cry; flesh and blood could not stand this strain. He cowered at his chief's side, his shoulders bent, one arm above his head as if to ward off an actual physical force.

But Jadwin, iron to the end, stood erect. All unknowing what he did, he had taken Landry's hand in his, and the boy felt the grip on his fingers like the contracting of a vise of steel. The other hand, as though holding up a standard, was still in the air, and his great, deep-toned voice went out across the tumult, proclaiming to the end his battle-cry:

"Give a dollar for July—give a dollar for July!"

But, little by little, Landry became aware that the tumult of the Pit was intermitting. There were sudden lapses in the shouting, and in these lapses he could hear from somewhere out upon the floor voices that were crying: "Order—order, order, gentlemen."

But again and again the clamor broke out. It would die down for an instant in response to these appeals, only to burst out afresh as certain groups of traders started the pandemonium again by the wild outcrying of their offers. At last, however, the older men in the Pit, regaining some measure of self-control, took up the word, going to and fro in the press repeating "Order, order."

And then, all at once, the Pit, the entire floor of the Board of Trade, was struck dumb. All at once the tension was relaxed, the furious struggling and stamping was stilled. Landry, bewildered, still holding his chief by the hand, looked about him. On the floor, near at hand, stood the President of the Board of Trade himself, and with him the Vice-President and a group of the Directors. Evidently it had been these who had called the traders to order. But it was not toward them now that the hundreds of men in the Pit and on the floor were looking.

In the little balcony on the south wall opposite the visitors' gallery a figure had appeared, a tall, grave man in a long black coat—the Secretary of the Board of Trade. Landry with the others saw him, saw him advance to the edge of the railing and fix his glance upon the Wheat Pit. In his hand he carried a slip of paper.

And then in the midst of that profound silence the Secretary announced:

"All trades with Gretry, Converse & Co. must be closed at once."

The words had not ceased to echo in the high vaultings of the roof before they were greeted with a wild yell of exultation that burst from the crowding masses in the Wheat Pit.

Beaten; beaten at last, the Great Bull! Smashed! The great corner smashed! Jadwin busted! They themselves saved, saved, saved! Cheer followed upon cheer, yell after yell; hats went into the air. In a frenzy of delight men danced and leaped and capered upon the edge of the Pit, clasping their arms about each other, shaking each other's hands, cheering and hurrahing till their strained voices became hoarse and faint.

Some few of the older men protested. There were cries of:

"Shame, shame!"

"Order—let him alone."

"Let him be; he's down now. Shame, shame!"

But the jubilee was irrepressible; they had been too cruelly pressed, these others; they had felt the weight of the Bull's hoof, the rip of his horn. Now they had beaten him, had pulled him down.

"Yah-h-h, whoop, yi, yi, yi. Busted, busted, busted. Hip, hip, hip, and a tiger!"

"Come away, sir."

Landry was pleading with Jadwin, clutching his arm in both his hands, his lips to his chief's ear to make himself heard above the yelping of the mob.

Jadwin was silent now. He seemed no longer to see or hear; heavily, painfully he leaned upon the young man's shoulder.

"Come away, sir—come away!"

The group of traders parted before them, cheering even while they gave place, cheering with eyes averted, unwilling to see the ruin that meant for them salvation.

"Yah-h-h. Yah-h-h, busted, busted!"

Landry had put his arm about Jadwin and gripped him close as he led him from the Pit. The sobs were in his throat again, and tears of excitement, of grief, of anger and impotence were running down his face.

"Yah-h-h. Yah-h-h, he's done for, busted, busted!"

"D——n you all!" cried Landry, throwing out a furious fist. "You brutes, you beasts! If he'd so much as raised a finger a week ago you'd have run for your lives."

But the cheering drowned his voice; and as the two passed out of the Pit upon the floor the gong that closed the trading struck, and, as it seemed, put a period, definite and final, to the conclusion of Curtis Jadwin's career as speculator.

Across the floor toward the doorway Landry led his defeated captain. Jadwin was in a daze; he saw nothing, heard nothing. Quietly he submitted to Landry's guiding arm. The visitors in the gallery bent far over to see him pass, and from all over the floor, spectators, hangers-on, corn and provision traders, messenger boys, clerks and reporters came hurrying to watch the final exit of the Great Bull from the scene of his many victories and his one overwhelming defeat.

In silence they watched him go by. Only in the distance from the direction of the Pit itself came the sound of dying cheers. But at the doorway stood a figure that Landry recognized at once—a small man, lean-faced, trimly dressed, his clean-shaven lips pursed like the mouth of a shut money-bag, imperturbable as ever, cold, unexcited—Calvin Crookes himself.

And as Jadwin passed Landry heard the Bear leader say: "They can cheer now all they want. They didn't do it. It was the wheat itself that beat him; no combination of men could have done it—go on, cheer, you fools! He was a bigger man than the best of us."

—"CURSE YOU, SAM GRETRY, FOR THE MAN WHO FAILED ME IN A CRISIS!"

With the striking of the gong and the general movement of the crowd in the galleries toward the exits Page rose, drawing a long breath, pressing her hands an instant to her burning cheeks. She had seen all that had happened, but she had not understood. The whole morning had been a whirl and a blur. She had looked down upon a jam of men, who for three hours had done nothing but shout and struggle. She had seen Jadwin come into the Pit, and almost at once the shouts had turned to cheers. That must have meant, she thought, that Jadwin had done something to please those excited men. They were all his friends, no doubt. They were cheering him—cheering his success. He had won, then! And yet that announcement from the opposite balcony, to the effect that business with Mr. Gretry must be stopped immediately! That had an ominous ring. Or perhaps that meant only a momentary check.

As she descended the stairways with the departing spectators she distinctly heard a man's voice behind her exclaim:

"Well, that does for him!"

Possibly, after all, Mr. Jadwin had lost some money that morning. She was desperately anxious to find Landry and to learn the truth of what had happened, and for a long moment after the last visitors had disappeared she remained at the foot of the gallery stairway, hoping that he would come for her. But she saw nothing of him, and soon remembered she had told him to come for her only in case he was able to get away. No doubt he was too busy now. Even if Mr. Jadwin had won, the morning's work had evidently been of tremendous importance. This had been a great day for the wheat speculators. It was not surprising that Landry should be detained. She would wait till she saw him the next day to find out all that had taken place.

Page returned home. It was long past the hour for luncheon when she came into the dining-room of the North Avenue house.

"Where is my sister?" she asked of the maid as she sat down to the table; "has she lunched yet?"

But it appeared that Mrs. Jadwin had sent down word to say that she wanted no luncheon; that she had a headache and would remain in her room.

Page hurried through with her chocolate and salad, and ordering a cup of strong tea carried it up to Laura's "sitting-room" herself.

Laura, in a long tea-gown, lay back in the Madeira chair, her hands clasped behind her head, doing nothing apparently but looking out of the window. She was paler even than usual, and to Page's mind seemed preoccupied, and in a certain indefinite way tense and hard. Page, as she had told Landry that morning, had remarked this tenseness, this rigidity on the part of her sister, of late. But to-day it was more pronounced than ever. Something surely was the matter with Laura. She seemed like one who had staked everything upon a hazard and, blind to all else, was keeping back emotion with all her strength, while she watched and waited for the issue. Page guessed that her sister's trouble had to do with Jadwin's complete absorption in business, but she preferred to hold her peace. By nature the young girl "minded her own business," and Laura was not a woman who confided her troubles to anybody. Only once had Page presumed to meddle in her sister's affairs, and the result had not encouraged a repetition of the intervention. Since the affair of the silver matchbox she had kept her distance.

Laura on this occasion declined to drink the tea Page had brought. She wanted nothing, she said; her head ached a little; she only wished to lie down and be quiet.

"I've been down to the Board of Trade all the morning."

Laura fixed her with a swift glance; she demanded quickly: "Did you see Curtis?"

"No—or, yes, once; he came out on the floor. Oh, Laura, it was so exciting there this morning. Something important happened, I know. I can't believe it's that way all the time. I'm afraid Mr. Jadwin lost a great deal of money. I heard some one behind me say so."

"Did Curtis say he was coming home this evening?"

"No. Don't you understand? I didn't see him to talk to."

"Well, why didn't you, Page?"

"Why, Laura, honey, don't be cross. You don't know how rushed everything was. I didn't even try to see Landry."

The Man—Not the Money

ARE nations as blind as individuals to the real meaning of their own lives?

A keen-eyed Englishman said the other day that the only picturesque features in American life were our colored races. But how many of us would agree with him? We should look on a brisk day in the Stock Exchange or a Chicago skyscraper as far finer and more suggestive sights than a Navajo studying electrical engineering, or an old negro Maumee peering with her bleared eyes into the coming years to find what they were bringing to her black sons.

Probably no stranger sight was offered in this country last year than a meeting held in Philadelphia in behalf of a training school for colored working-people.

An ex-President of the United States presided, and the chief speaker was a negro, born a homeless, nameless chattel, but who ranks now among the foremost genuine orators of the country.

The significance of the incident was not in the school, nor in the white man, nor in the black. It was in the Chance which this country offers to the individual, the possibility in it for a black slave to push his way up and up.

The Chance for the strange live force in a man to do something, to take its share in the work of the big, seething world—that is the real significance of this country among nations, after all.

One of the most important events in American history occurred about twenty years ago in a dusty little court-room in a Nebraska town.

A peaceable Indian tribe that had tilled the same ground for three hundred years were robbed of it by swindling agents at Washington, and were driven to the marshes of the Bad Lands, leaving their grain uncut and the fires burning on their hearths. They died like poisoned sheep. At the end of a year, gathering up the bones of their dead, they came back. The journey of the Israelites through the desert or the famous flight of De Quincey's Tartar tribe was not more tragic than the march of these red men, seeking again the homes of which they had been robbed. They were arrested in a town of Nebraska and the head men were brought into court. The agent for the Government demanded that they should be sent back to the Bad Lands on the plea that not being legally recognized as human beings in this country they could not own their homes nor farms, nor appeal to the law for restitution.

One of the chiefs gathered the meaning of these words. He rose, drew himself to his full height, and looking slowly around on the whites that filled the court-room, tapped himself gravely on the breast and said:

"Am I not, too—a man?"

The Judge, a just, sane man, decided that an Indian was a person, not a chattel, and entitled to the full protection of the law.

That decision still stands. It opened the Chance for the red man.

Do we see what that means?

We are apt nowadays to think that the work before each of us and the country is to get money and things. Money and things don't last. Let Professor Heilprecht tell you of the great Babylonish empire which he is digging out of the sand.

It is the Man who lasts, and the work of this Republic is the making of the man, not money.

Concerning Your Neighbor's Business

MANY and varied are the alleged occupations that give a plausible excuse for neglecting one's own immediate work of the home and the day. None—not even minding one's neighbor's business—is so fascinating and dignified as searching the horizon for the mast-tops of remote calamities. It invests one with the air of patriotic concern. It gets one the reputation of being a thinker and a prophet—who remembers the shivery predictions of "calamity howlers" long enough to jeer at them as false prophets? And no one suspects that the "thinker" and "prophet" is simply an idle fellow who cannot endure the drudgery of useful work.

Just now this class of thinkers is greatly concerned, and has induced many busy people to be greatly concerned, over the growth of socialism and kindred isms. "Look at the socialist vote," they say. "Look at the strikes. Look at the attacks upon the right to work. Look at the acquiescence of press and politicians."

It is true there is an unprecedented amount of socialistic activity, and there was last November a socialist vote of 300,000, and there are many unpleasant signs of an unwholesome discontent. But when these matters are rightly considered, is there any cause in them for alarm, or even for amazement or even for astonishment? Is not the wonder rather that there has been and is so little unhealthy and un-American discontent?

Within the last fifteen years the rising standards of the European masses and the increasing burden of caste, monarchy and militarism have caused the socialistic propaganda which Karl Marx started with his Das Kapital to spread with the swiftness of a prairie fire in dry weather among the working-classes of the various European nations. And within the past ten years there have poured into this country from the fiercest "hotbeds" of European discontent—from Italy, from the most socialistic parts of Germany, Russia and Austria—no less than five million immigrants, almost all from the oppressed laboring class. They were wretchedly poor; they were densely ignorant; they were bitter against the social order as they have known it all their lives. And instead of spreading out over the country, on farms and in the villages, as did former immigrants, they have huddled together in the cities and larger towns, each successive billow pushing in upon those that preceded it.

Within this mass is vaguely outlined a vast collection of foreigners in spirit as well as in language—a multitude who do not know their new country in its history, in its laws, in its customs, in its ideas. They are full of political and social notions natural to the oppressed of their native lands, but wholly alien to us. They exaggerate every small discomfort into an outcropping here of the conditions from which they fled; they fancy that only the most drastic remedies will cure these largely imaginary grievances. They blame their new country for misfortunes chargeable to their own lack of knowledge of its ways. And their leaders are, of course, saturated with socialistic theories. Finally, these theories are tolerated and encouraged by scholarly and philanthropic persons who have unfortunately read European history and sociology to the neglect of the history and sociology of their own democratic Republic. These facts do not constitute a menacing or even an especially difficult problem. On the contrary, the problem is one which time and common-sense and the fifty-odd million native Americans and the millions of assimilated foreign-born and native-born of foreign parentage will readily solve. If the Republic were not founded wholly upon principles of justice and right, if there were radical wrongs of iron caste and entrenched privilege, if we had not schools and colleges in abundance and the atmosphere of reasonableness, there might be cause for jangling the alarm bells. But we started right nationally, we are still in business for the benefit of the common man; and the most blinded and prejudiced cannot fail to see it after a while.

Of Mortgages and Marquesses

PERSONAL statistics and uncontradicted statements about the titled families of Europe show a shriveling of posterity that must be extremely painful to the idolaters of blue blood and the worshipers of rank. In some of the nations, especially the smaller ones, the shrinking process has affected the nobility to such an extent that it cannot scare up enough energies and brains to fill the offices, and it has been necessary to import these qualities from the common herds. In more than one of the great countries the changes of the times and the irreverent tendency of mortgages and bills to fall due have found the bearers of proud names unable to do so small a thing as earn a living. In brief, throughout all Europe a very considerable part of the wearers of titles must face bankruptcy without so much as a hope of ever getting out of it.

It would be easy to find some satisfaction in this, if only for our contempt for titles—a feeling which most of us profess and which few of us really have. But the instance goes far beyond the mere capital letters and gilt baubles which the noble seigniors wear. It illustrates as nothing in modern life has ever done the certainties and the conditions that prevail in any civilization—be it under royal banners or democratic shields—when families rooted in distinguished ancestry go to seed. We have known it in this country; there is not a State that could not supply an example to-day, and each generation finds its surplus of vain, empty, impoverished and ineffective gentility. And with all the reverence we confess for great names, we are often driven to declare that about the worst nuisance that breathes is this same dried-up gentility. It is bad enough when it wears petticoats, but when it minces along in trousers the healthy man, with good blood in him, feels as though there might be exceptions to the modern ukase against spanking.

It would not be fair to place all the blame upon the one member of the line of deterioration. It all began, of course, when one generation commenced to bank on something besides its own worth and energy, that something being either a family name, a title, or a merit not intrinsically its own. After a generation of that, the next crop of boys and girls needed miracles to make them worth their salt, and the longer this sort of thing went on, the smaller and more attenuated the dribbles.

But it really isn't so hopeless as it may seem. We recall the man wrestling with Hercules. He had his troubles, but every time he touched the earth he was made stronger. So it is with many of the fortunate families of life. They have to be thrown to the earth before they get their best qualities. In this country we say that it is only three generations from shirt-sleeves to shirt-sleeves. In Europe the rounds are much longer. Perhaps we have in this very difference another of the many explanations of the super-excellence of American energy and initiative. But we should not be too proud. There is good material in the nobility, and if Fate slams it to earth hard enough it will get into its posterity some of the force that made its ancestry rich and glorious.

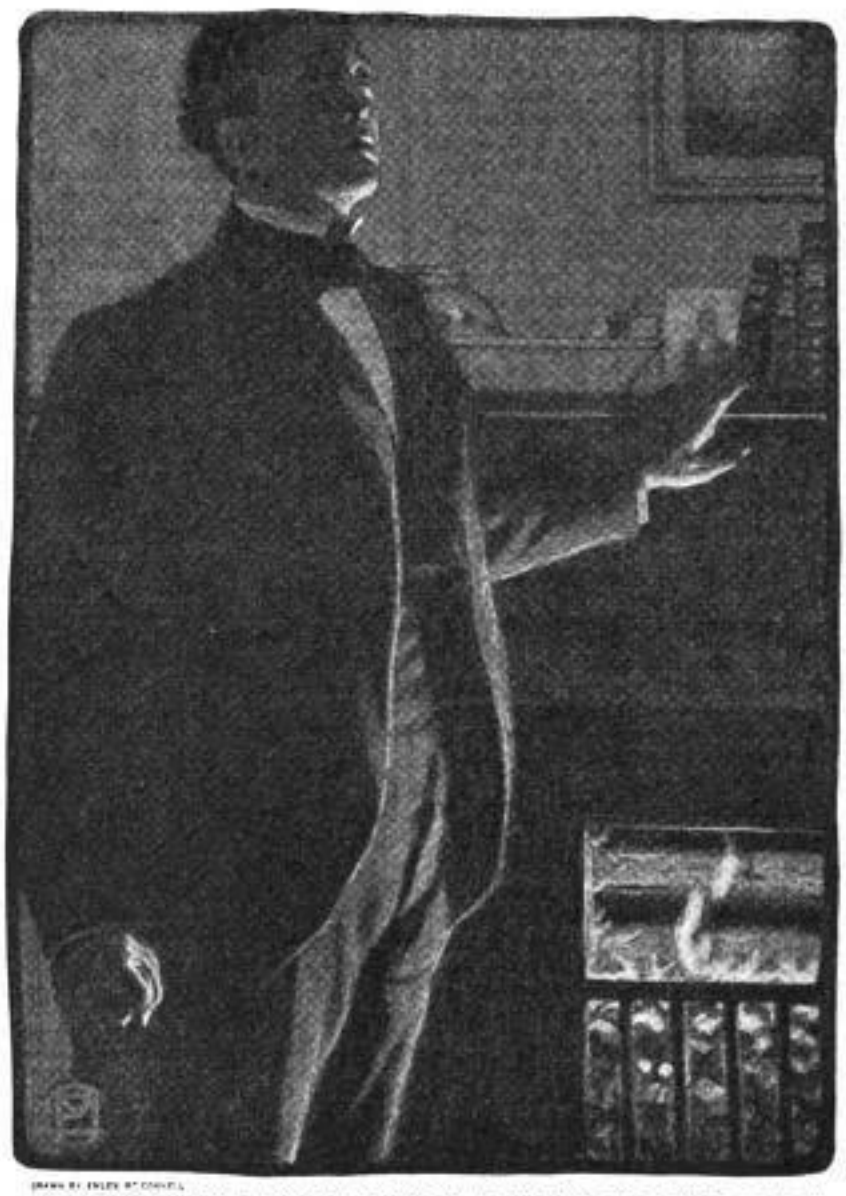
An Unseen Presence

THE WRITING-MAN'S NARRATIVE OF A MYSTERY OF HIS COLLEGE DAYS

Copyright, 1913, by The Curtis Publishing Company. Copyright in Great Britain

IT WAS agreed among ourselves upon the Moor that the Indian soldier had done his duty the night before in a simple and straightforward manner, and that an obligation lay on the rest of us to follow his lead. There was a dispute in the evening between the writing-man and the barrister which should go first, and so much time was being lost that we called upon the soldier to order either he pleased to the front, and he chose the writing-man because he hoped the professional skill in story-telling would make up for his own poverty of speech the night before. And after we had all protested that nothing could have been better than the soldier's description of his midnight skirmish in the sixteenth century, and after we had insisted that the writing-man was not to dazzle us with the preciosities of literary style, or foist upon our simplicity some elaborately wrought fiction, we lay back in our chairs and this was the story he told:



"Though I have been a citizen of many places, and have no local roots, I took my degree at Edinburgh, and am proud of that slight connection with the austere capital of Scotland. Last week I traveled over Edinburgh on the top of an electric car to enjoy the glory of Princes Street once more, and to revive certain memories of the past in grayer streets and less fashionable quarters. In the afternoon I found myself in what is called the South Side, a district of which the West End of Edinburgh professes to be ignorant, but where a considerable number of well-doing citizens live and bring up their families, and which is much frequented by students. I did not notice where we were till suddenly, at a stoppage of the car, I looked up and saw above me the top floor of a four-story building, and a corner room with a window on the main street and one on a narrow lane at the side. At the sight of that commonplace room I started from my seat and left the car as by a sudden masterful attraction. It was not simply that in the days of long ago a student had lived and worked and had good fellowship in that room, for he had other lodgings in Edinburgh which he would not have looked at twice, and some of which he had forgotten. It was because the sight of that room, even from the roof of a tram-car, brought up before him the most inexplicable experience of his life, and the most gruesome.

"It came upon me that I should like, so far as might be, to renew the impression of more than thirty years ago, and I went up the lane and stood at the door which gives access to the flats above. I rang the upper bell, and noted from the brass plate that a maiden lady was now the tenant of the house—Miss Jane McKittrick. The door was opened from above by an ingenious arrangement which I used to admire because it secured the privacy of the stair, and saved the servants from the inconvenience of coming down with the call of every visitor. I mounted the familiar steps, and remembered how in a panic of my heart I had thought of bolting down them once in the early morning of a winter day, that I might escape from I knew not what, but, at any rate, save myself, soul and body, from an awful and hostile Presence. When a trim and demure servant—the handmaid of an elderly, highly respected, unmarried lady—met me at the top of the stair, and seemed, so far as her face expressed anything, to ask what such a person as I appeared to be could want with her mistress, I came to myself and faced an embarrassing situation.

"I made a hasty resolution to be honest up to a point, and having by good luck discovered a card in my waistcoat pocket, I asked Elizabeth—for that was what Miss McKittrick called her, just as her young man would call her Lizzie—to take it to her mistress with my compliments, and to ask whether of her kindness I might see her for a moment.

"Miss McKittrick was the tidiest and timidest of little single ladies and at first neither sat down nor invited me to take a seat; but after I'd thrown myself upon her mercy, and pleaded that I was a middle-aged and world-battered man who had bethought himself of his student days, and wished to see the rooms in which he had prepared for his degree, the good soul relaxed her natural reserve and her vague suspicion of unknown male visitors. She felt it was a lad's romance and she forgot her years and mine—there is no kinder soul than a sweet-blooded old maiden lady—and she not only bade me welcome to my old room, but with a nice tact she suggested that I should doubtless like to be alone for a little; so Miss McKittrick went out, closing the door, and left me with the past.

"I took a chair as like the one I used to have as could be found in Miss McKittrick's room, and sat down at the table, and opposite me, nothing between us but mathematical books and sheets of paper, sat my coach on the night before it happened. It was all very well, you must know, in those days to be a fair scholar in Latin and Greek, and even to have the trick of prose translation from English into Latin; but unless you could pass a certain modest standard in mathematics and natural philosophy your classics would avail you nothing, and you could not get a degree. As I hated Euclid worse than anything except trigonometry, and had not the slightest interest either in the laws of light or heat, it was necessary that some practiced hand should cram me for the occasion—that is how I came to know McKinnon. It did not matter where I asked, or how I put my case, as soon as men got an inkling of the situation every one of them said: 'Get Angus McKinnon.' They said that there had not been for twenty years such a mathematician known in the University as this West Highland Celt, and that if he ever got to Cambridge he would take the Senior Wranglership walking, but that he would never get out of Edinburgh because he couldn't take his degree, never having been able even to translate Cæsar or to distinguish one Greek letter from another; that his power of calculation reduced the mathematical professor to silent admiration; that he was as familiar with the fourth dimension as with the University public-house, which was saying a good deal; that he could teach mathematics to a Highland cattle beast, and that he had passed men through that department of their degree who were barely sane; that he knew almost every question an examiner would ask, and crammed his pupils with answers which they remembered for about seven days and never understood; that his power of drinking was portentous, and that it was doubtful whether he was ever sober; that his temper was satanic, and his profanity an absolute monopoly, but that his genius for passing a fool through mathematics was beyond question. Therefore my friends agreed, with painful unanimity, that if I ever expected to get a degree I should secure the services of Angus McKinnon. It was in a public-house that I found him about ten A. M., and it was evident that he had already been tasting, but he was sober enough to demand a heavy fee in advance, and to declare, after half a dozen searching questions, that he thought I was on the whole, in the matter of mathematics, the greatest ass he had yet come across. He added, however, that if I were willing, as he put it, to 'mind what I will be telling you, and to be working night and day, and not to be meddling with speerits'—which, he explained, was a temptation avoided by all mathematicians—'he would pass me through, or' (and on reaching this point he brought a gigantic fist down upon the table) 'he would see both himself and me in a part of the universe where the question of degrees would be of little importance.' As I looked upon him for the first time in that classic place—six feet two in height, forty-two inches around the chest, black-haired and black-bearded, with a strong-cut face and gleaming eyes—I could see beneath the drinking, and the recklessness, and the swearing, and the roughness, that there was a strength of iron will and unquenchable manhood in Angus McKinnon.

"FORGIVE ME, ANGUS McKINNON; I THOUGHT NOT WHAT I DID!"

"Again McKinnon and I were facing one another across the table on which, under his fiery compulsion, I had been forced to drudge for two months as I had never done in all my life; and again McKinnon was showing me methods of solving equations so rapid and ingenious that even I could work them in a few minutes; and finally drilling into my mind the principles of geometry with such force that I remember a very few of them even to this day; and taking me through a hundred questions, out of which he was certain the examiners would ask twenty-five, and impressing upon me with triumphant emphasis that if I only stuck to the twenty-five he had prepared me for, and left severely alone the others he had not anticipated, and which with much frankness he implored me not to attempt lest I should reveal my idiocy, he was prepared to swear, and did swear at some length, I should pass the mathematics. When I showed any intelligence he was agreeable to the point of contempt, declaring that if my father had given me any real education when I was young something could have been made of me; and when I did not follow him in a short cut through a calculation he was fearsome, both in his looks and language; and when I had not worked for him as he expected he would lose all control, and sweep the books off the table, and storm like a bull. As I was not a boy, there were times when I was almost roused to rebel against this violence, but I frankly confess that there was a fierceness and a virility about Angus which had, to use the Scots phrase, put the fear of death upon stronger men than I was. Besides, one found that underneath the coarseness there was a heart in the man, and, even though it seems absurd to say it, a certain tenderness. He was honestly concerned about my passing much more than about his fees, although he had driven so hard a bargain. It was evident that he would be much pleased if I obtained my degree, although his own chance of obtaining one was the remotest.

"Frankly, I came to like McKinnon, and perhaps, through the insight of this sympathy, I began to speculate about the problem of his life. It was not a thing unheard of that a Celt should 'taste,' but that a man of such trenchant intellect and will-power should play the fool before the eyes of all men, and be the song of drunkards, demanded some solution. Had there been some tragedy in his life? Was his heart eaten by vain regret? Was he really a broken-hearted and hopeless man killing remembrance by alternate bouts of study and drinking? He never once alluded to himself or to his life, and he was not the man whom any one could question. One night he lit his pipe and stood upon the hearthrug looking into the fire, while I wrought out a problem he had set me, and, glancing to see whether he was growing impatient, I noticed that the fashion of his countenance had altered. fierceness and the restlessness had given place to an expression of unspeakable sadness, and if ever I saw remorse and despair upon a human face it was that night. When we resumed work McKinnon was courteous as only a Celt can be, and as he was on rare occasions when he seemed to come to himself. When he rose to go I took my courage in both my hands and tried to say what was in my heart. What I did say I really do not know, but he understood. He looked at me for what seemed a whole minute in silence, then he put his hands upon my shoulder. I realized how handsome McKinnon must have been before his face was coarsened—and he said: 'Pray God you may never do in an instant what you will be regretting all the days of your life—when it is too late—too late.' He left the room and let himself out. I had the sense not to follow, but from the window I saw him cross the street. I watched him till he disappeared, and that was the last time I saw McKinnon alive.

"Next day I sat for the mathematical exam., and as soon as I saw the paper was certain that I should pass. No wonder the incapables sang the praises of Angus McKinnon, and declared that the gift of second sight in the matter of examinations was given to that Celt, for seventy-five per cent. of the questions I had already worked over, and with the remainder I did not meddle. When I left the examination hall my heart was full of gratitude to McKinnon, and I expected to see him at the door, for it was his way to meet his pupils when they came out and to hurry them into some corner, to snatch the paper out of their hands, to run it over in an instant, reviewing the imbecility of the examiners in ever returning upon their own tracks, or acknowledging their genius in setting questions which he had not anticipated, and then dragging out from the unfortunate candidate what he had done and how he had done it, and what he had not done and why he had not done it; and then to announce to him with absolute infallibility either his success or his failure. Angus was not in the passage, nor in the quadrangle, nor lurking anywhere beneath the great arches of the entrance, nor in ambush at the gate. And I was inwardly cast down, for I knew that, thanks to him, I had done well, and, I confess it, I had hoped—having heard of such a thing—that he would shake hands with me. I hurried over to the University place of refreshment, into a back room which was a common haunt of McKinnon's. He was not there, nor had he called that morning. I inquired here and there among the men, but no one had seen Angus; and they began to remark upon his absence, for he was a figure on examination days. Once when Angus had had an international difference with four foreign students, none of whom attended classes for a fortnight afterward, and he could not appear himself for a single day, I had gone to work at his rooms; now, with a chill upon my heart which I could not explain, I paid my second visit. When his landlady opened the door I knew what had happened, and she, recognizing me, began a wail, as a right-thinking and well-read Scotswoman ought to do on such an occasion.

"'Come in, bye,' she said with many tears, 'come in, bye; I ken yer face—ye were here a fortnight last Wednesday. An awful dispensation, and terrible sudden; gaein' aboot yesterday as livin' like as oorsels, and lyin' cauld this mornin'. A solemn warnin' to be prepared, and no to be pittin' aff to the last; there to-day, and here to-morrow,' added the excellent woman with some confusion.

"'No but that he was juist himsel' last nicht, for ye could hardly tell that he had been tastin'. He cam hame aboot ten instead o' twelve, and he was that quiet that I jaloused (suspected) there was something wrong; and he was that ceevil I was quite concerned, and I asked him if he wudna he the better of a warm drink.

"'There's nae doubt that he was given to tastin', and it was awfu' what he could carry; and he micht let drop an aith at a time when he was contradicted; but eh! sir, he was a learned man, and though he never gaed to kirk, he wud never let a word be said against the confession of faith. There was an impident whipper-snapper o' an English student that he was tutorin', and didna the body speak aw' nicht in this verry hoose—for I heard it through the open door—against John Calvin? and if Mr. McKinnon didna give him sic a round o' swearin'—for there's nae doobt he was a grand swearer—that the cratur came oot o' the room as white as a sheet. I'll warrant the smatchit 'll no meddle wi' Calvin again,' said the landlady, with much appreciation of McKinnon's theological

"In 1895 Messrs. Wilcox & White, of Meriden, Conn., began manufacturing an interior attachment, and in February, 1897, built their first 'Angelus,' a cabinet piano player. This instrument, the invention of E. H. White, may be regarded as the pioneer of the various similar attachments which have since been placed upon the market."

Although we are justly proud of having placed before the public the pioneer piano player, the Angelus (an instrument by means of which any one can play any piano, and which has created a new industry), yet we realize that our preëminence must be maintained by progress, so we are continually applying our experience, our skill and ingenuity to improving and perfecting our instrument. To-day we declare that there is no piano player which has such complete and ingenious expression devices as has the Angelus; moreover, we make a style (The Angelus Orchestral), which contains finely voiced reeds, with which the performer may produce most charming effects in conjunction with the piano.

French Court Memoirs

FROM Henry of Navarre to and through the reign of Du Barry (whose personal memoirs occupy four of the volumes) this set of books covers the back-stairs-and-kitchen-gossip side of French Court history, much as Guizot covers its outward manifestations. And where so much was set afoot with secret and obscure design, where so little was open and above-board, where boudoir councils dictated treaties and the wounded vanity of favorites instigated campaigns, where a low-born woman's caprice could send forth the torch to lay waste the half of Europe, it is impossible to comprehend the curious events of history without knowing the intimate details of those underlying causes. It is a characteristic of these Memoirs that in dealing with the peculiar affairs which are associated in everyone's mind with French Court history of the period, their very simplicity and frankness purges them of all offense.

The undersigned controls a few sets of these personal French Court Memoirs (translated with fidelity into English) which can be secured, in complete sets only, at a very low price and on small monthly payments, if preferred, provided application be made at once.

These few copies are from a limited numbered and registered de luxe edition, bound up to sell at $10 a volume. But through a binder's error the leather of the volumes is imperfectly matched; consequently it becomes advisable to dispose of them outside of regular subscription channels, and at a price about equal to the value of the unbound sheets.

accomplishments, both in faith and word. 'A weel built and responsible-lookin' man, and regular in his payments every Saturday nicht, though there were times he could hardly see the money. But we have all oor faults, sir, and his were upon the surface, and no worth mentioning the day. I'm judgin', from what he said to that Episcopalian haveril, that the root of the matter was in Mr. McKinnon. Ye'll be wantin' to see him?' and the landlady dropped her voice.

"'It was in his sitting-room, littered with books and papers, black with calculations, that the landlady had reviewed Angus' character, and now we passed into the little bedroom which opened from the other room, and I looked on my tutor. He had already been dressed for burial, and the landlady was satisfied with his appearance.

"'When we dressed him I found this little leather pouch hanging on his breast, and do ye see that it is sealed and that I havna opened it. Would ye tak charge o' it in case some friend should come to claim it? Ye micht open it to see if he has left any directions.'

"Once more I looked at my tutor; then, when the landlady had gone into the sitting-room, I kissed him and bade him farewell, realizing then that in the short time I had known him I had come to love McKinnon. In the presence of the landlady I broke the seal and opened the little packet. It contained one short letter; but when I saw that the letter had no address, and was signed by a woman, I put it back in the case, and the case into my pocket, and told the landlady that it threw no light upon his family, but that I would keep it till it was claimed. I went to my rooms, forgetting that I had passed in mathematics and was now sure of my degree, and remembering only the tragedy of Angus McKinnon.

"It was our boyish way to celebrate the evening after a degree exam. by attending a Christy Minstrel function and joining cheerfully in the choruses; but that night I shut myself in the room where I am, as it were, sitting while I tell this story, and which by every book and paper reminded me of Angus, and I mourned till night had passed into the morning. It is fair to take into account that I had been working for a fortnight till three in the morning, as well as the livelong day; that I had had no physical exercise, and had been intensely anxious—in short, that my nerves were over-strained; and now, upon the head of all, had come Angus' unexpected death, which in my heart I believed, and suspected the doctor knew, had been some form of suicide. The room was already, in my imagination, full of McKinnon before I took the packet out of my pocket and read the letter, at which before I had only glanced. With the after-look I am free to confess that I ought not to have read the letter, and that in all the circumstances I should have destroyed it unread. My excuse was then and is now, that it was not the curiosity of a stranger but the love of a friend that moved me, for I was convinced that I held in my hand the secret of Angus McKinnon. As I took the letter out I felt as if I should ask his permission, and for the moment as if across the table he had refused it with a fearful look, and had stretched out his hand to recover the letter. My fingers shook when I unfolded the single sheet which contained on one side the whole letter. The writing was that of a well-educated woman, who through weakness was scarcely able to form the letters, and had to pause between the sentences, and this is what I read:

> "'Dearest One: The doctor says that I am dying, and there is something I wish to say to you before I die. I will write as well as I can, and the letter will be carried by sure hands. I have said that I slipped and was injured in the falling, and I charge you, as my last request, that you keep silence. I forgive you what you did, for it was your love turned into rage, and not your hand, which struck me. You know now that I was never untrue to you, my heart's love, and I die loving you as you love me.
> "'Your faithful MORAG.'

"One understood it in a moment—his love for Morag, a girl of his own race by the name, though educated in the English speech, his jealousy of some other lover, his hot passion in some evil hour, and the ghastly issue which killed Morag and sent Angus forth to live in unquenchable remorse and self-loathing. As I held the letter in my hand I was conscious of a strange and penetrating sensation, and now words, I am afraid, will fail to convey my experience. It was as if a wind were pouring through some opening in the wall and filling the room with a new and strange atmosphere which surrounded me and chilled me. Holding the letter in my hand, I rose and faced the door as if IT had entered, and then I turned to the table as if some one were standing opposite me; then I made an effort and flung off the impression, and sat down again by the fire and read the letter again—I will not deny it—with tears. Poor Angus! Oh, the sorrow of things! I started to my feet imagining I had been touched, and looked round the room, where every corner was visible and in which every sight was commonplace. Where was IT? And now, under a compulsion, which I could not resist, of nervous terror, but at which I laughed within my heart, I searched the room—below the table, under the couch, in the shadow beyond the piano; and, still despising myself, I opened the doors of the chiffonier, in which nothing larger than a cat could have hidden, and lifted the lid of the piano. Nothing, of course. And although I did all this, I did not expect to find anything—I was not really looking for any visible person. Still holding the letter in my hand, I came back to my chair and was about to sit down, when, so far as I can describe it, the Presence in the room gathered itself together and came close to me and tried to master me.

"As I stood beside the table, my hands clenched and hanging by my side, and my feet rooted in the floor, the Presence flung itself round me as one would do who was trying to carry a person away; and although I knew not what it was, and knew not where it would carry me, I was convinced that I must resist with all my might, and that the resistance lay somehow in my will. If I—the personal being that says I—yielded for an instant, I should be lost, and the idea of lost, in the sense of yielding to this Presence, was charged with horror. It was a wrestle for life or death, and lasted perhaps only five minutes, and then the strain relaxed and I had for the moment conquered; I sank into the chair, and the perspiration rolled, rather in a stream than in drops, off my face. A horror laid hold upon me that, while the gaslamps were burning in the street outside, and I could hear the sound of a belated passenger and the distant rattle of a cab, while there were living people in the rooms across the passage, I was shut into this room with the other world striving to conquer me. How, I could not explain; and for what end, I did not know. If the strain continued long I should not be able to breathe. Making a great effort, I sprang to my feet and made a dash for the door. Before my hand was upon the handle the Presence was between the door and me, and I was beaten back to where I had been standing; and now, shaken and weakened, I waited another wrestle. When suddenly there crept into my mind the idea that this Presence was not really hostile, but was contending with me to gain some end which was not my destruction. Could it be that McKinnon was acting on me from the other side?—and the moment that I thought of him the deadly fear began to lift. He had sinned openly before us all, and he had sinned grievously in a way we had not known; but the soul within him was not bad, and the power of McKinnon—if he had any power—would not be for death. As I was thinking I was left untouched, as if IT understood that I was trying to understand. What ailed him, and what could he want? Perhaps it was the letter, and I opened my closed fist and found the letter there crushed into a ball. As I looked at it and gently unfolded it, the Presence seemed again to enfold me—but how feeble words are to bring out the experience!—now it was with a persuasive and informing touch. It was the letter, and then in an instant I understood. I had broken upon the secret that was between the man and woman, and having done so thoughtless a deed the letter might yet fall into others' hands, and the trust of Morag be broken. They were both on the other side; and while this letter lived their story on this side was not closed. All the time I was looking at the letter in my hand, and the Presence was around me. The fire was still burning, for I had been cold that evening, and had built it high. As I moved a step toward the fireplace—now it seemed as if I were being led and urged—I knelt down and thrust it into the heart of the fire; and as I did so the Presence seemed to gather round my head with a caress. I leapt to my feet and cried aloud: 'Forgive me, Angus McKinnon; I thought not what I did!' I was alone in the room again, and the soul of Angus McKinnon was at rest.

"When Miss McKittrick came in I thanked her for her courtesy, but I did not tell her what had happened in that room thirty years before, and the scene I had just rehearsed."

"FOR 35 YEARS A STANDARD PIANO"

The Wing Piano

A Wing style—45 other styles to select from

You need this book IF YOU INTEND TO BUY A PIANO. A Book—not a catalogue—that gives you all the information possessed by experts. It makes the selection of a piano easy. If read carefully, it will make you a judge of tone, action, workmanship and finish; will tell you how to know good from bad. It describes the materials used; gives pictures of all the different parts, and tells how they should be made and put together. It is the only book of its kind ever published. It contains 116 large pages, and is named "The Book of Complete Information about Pianos." We send it free to any one wishing to buy a piano. Write for it.

Save from $100 to $200

We make the WING PIANO and sell it ourselves. It goes direct from our factory to your home. We do not employ any agents or salesmen. When you buy the WING PIANO you pay the actual cost of construction and our small wholesale profit. This profit is small because we sell thousands of pianos yearly. Most retail stores sell no more than twelve to twenty pianos yearly, and must charge from $100 to $200 profit on each. They can't help it.

In 35 Years 33,000 Pianos

We refer to over 33,000 satisfied purchasers in every part of the United States. WING PIANOS are guaranteed for twelve years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship or material.

Instrumental Attachment

A special feature of the Wing Piano. It imitates perfectly the tones of the mandolin, guitar, harp, zither, and banjo. Music written for these instruments, with and without piano accompaniment, can be played just as perfectly by a single player on the piano as though rendered by an entire orchestra. The original instrumental attachment has been patented by us, and it cannot be had in any other piano, although there are several imitations of it.

Wing Organs

are just as carefully made as Wing Pianos. They have a sweet, powerful, lasting tone, easy action, very handsome appearance, need no tuning. Wing Organs are sold direct from the factory; sent on trial; are sold on easy monthly payments. For catalogue and prices write to

The Reading Table

A Mother of Bureaus

The Department of State at Washington has been shedding bureaus, so to speak, at intervals, for more than half a century. It will throw off, as a contribution to the make-up of the new Department of Commerce, a sub-department which hitherto has attended to the business of handling the reports of United States Consuls from all over the world, incidentally making up periodical statements in book form regarding our foreign trade.

It is surprising what a highly comprehensive branch of the Government the State Department was in former times. It was, among other things, the Census Bureau, and up to 1849 did all the work of counting noses. In early days it was also the Patent Office, and the first patents issued by the new-fledged republic were signed by George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. Patents in Europe had always been royal grants, and are such still in some European monarchies; thus it came about that in the United States they were granted, at first, by the President.

The State Department, in early times, granted all the copyrights. Also, it had charge of all matters relating to the control of the Territories. And, as if this were not enough, it was the office of the Attorney-General, who in those days, though a member of the Cabinet, was a much less important personage than at present. He received less pay than any other of the President's advisers, and was expected to eke out his income by the practice of law, the Government work taking only a part of his time.

Even the pardons were granted through the Department of State in former days. It was a mighty busy establishment, one may well believe. But in 1849 the Interior Department was organized, and took unto itself the Patent Office, the Census Bureau, and the Pension business, which last had appertained to the Departments of War and the Navy. Also, it absorbed the Indian Bureau, which had belonged to the War Department, and it gobbled the Land Office, which previously had been a part of the Treasury.

The new Department of Commerce and Labor will comprise the present Department of Labor, the Bureau of Foreign Commerce (from the State Department), the Fish Commission, the Census Bureau, the Life-Saving Service, the Lighthouse Board, the Marine Hospital Service, the Shipping Commission, and the Bureaus of Steamboat Inspection, Statistics and Immigration.

Who's Who in Iowa

Iowans eminent in national affairs are justly proud of the mental as well as material resources of their State.

None the less they are enjoying a story of a superintendent of schools in one of the interior counties of Iowa who asked a class to tell something about L. M. Shaw, A. B. Cummins and Mrs. Ballington Booth.

Had the questions given Mr. Shaw and Mr. Cummins the title of Governor, a great cloud would have been lifted from the minds of the class. The unaccustomed initials were pitfalls, and some of the answers were surprising. Included in the children's statements as to the rôles played by Governor Cummins were the following: A pirate in the South Seas; an Arctic explorer; a noted minister in New York; a famous Revolutionary General. The strangest answer of all made Mr. Shaw "Aguinaldo's first assistant."

In Case of Fire

A recent invention promises to rescue people from burning buildings with no more panic than attends a pleasure trip on a Ferris wheel.

On steel platforms near the roofs of buildings are erected friction wheels, clutching devices and governors for controlling endless chains. The latter in normal times are folded and held in receptacles near the operating machinery.

The pressure of an electric button at any window-sill or in the hotel office or in any corridor releases the chains and causes them to hang conveniently in front of the windows. Interference with the circuit, by fire or accident, also brings the chains into readiness.

Attached to the chains throughout their length are loops to be used as stirrups.

The weight of a body on the chains starts the revolutions at any speed predetermined in the setting of the mechanism.

40-Volume Shakespearian Library for 6 Cents a Day

For six cents a day, for a few months, you can buy a complete Shakespearian Library—forty volumes—containing all of Shakespeare's Plays, Poems and Sonnets, with copious notes and explanatory matter. If you are a student of Shakespeare, or if you are accumulating a library of standard works, or if you wish to read merely for pleasure, you cannot do better than buy a set of the Booklovers' Shakespeare on our Club plan. An entire set will be sent you, on your request, for examination before purchasing.

The Booklovers' Edition

This is the ideal edition for those who love good books. It gives Shakespeare's works complete in forty dainty volumes—light and easy to handle—but well printed, beautifully illustrated and handsomely bound. It is not a cheaply made, trashy edition, but a production worthy of a place in the library of the most fastidious book lover. The type is large and clear, and the work is printed on a superior grade of white paper.

This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text, to which have been added Prefaces, Critical Comments, Glossaries, and Explanatory and Critical Notes. There are over 400 illustrations, many of which are reproductions of rare woodcuts of Shakespeare's time.

Forty Complete Volumes

You will enjoy reading Shakespeare if you read this edition, not only because it is the most accurate edition, but also because it is the best annotated edition ever offered to the American public. Every obscure phrase, every difficult word, every tangled passage, has been discussed and explained by the men best fitted to explain it. In the extent of the information it contains concerning the great poet and his works it is, in fact, a Shakespearian encyclopedia.

The sets are in forty volumes, and with each set is included a Life of Shakespeare by Israel Gollancz, and a Topical Index of Shakespeare's works (comprising one volume) by means of which the reader can find any desired passage.

The entire set contains 7,000 pages, forty beautiful color plates and 400 woodcut illustrations. The volumes are 7½ x 5½ inches in size—just the right size for easy handling—and they are bound in an attractive cloth or half-leather binding.

An Unusual Bargain

If you order promptly, you can obtain a set of this splendid Shakespeare at a bargain through our Shakespeare Club. The advantages of ordering through the Club are that you have the set shipped to you for examination without costing you a cent; you can retain it by paying the low Club price, and you may pay in little easy payments of $2.00 a month. The prices through the Club are $27.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $21.00 for cloth binding—payable at the rate of $2.00 a month. At these Club prices the edition will cost you less than 75 cents a volume in half-leather binding. If you desire a set at these low prices cut out the coupon and mail it to us to-day. We will send you a set, express prepaid, for examination, and if it is not satisfactory you may return it at our expense.

FED THE PROFESSOR

This One Had "Dreams More Terrible Than Visions of 'The Comet.'"

You must feed the professors and teachers right or they can't do justice to pupils. They should, of all people, possess a healthy nervous and mental organization. The teacher with weak nerves cannot obtain as good results as the one who has a perfect mental poise.

"It had been for me a most difficult problem," said a professor connected with a prominent college of the South, "how to keep the nerves in proper condition and the brain in good working order. Lack of proper opportunity to take exercise, an irregular diet and improper food brought on a general break-down in health. I became irritable and restless and at night would dream of more terrible things than any of Dr. Holmes' visions of 'The Comet.'

Upon the suggestion of a friend, who is a busy business man, I commenced to eat Grape-Nuts every day, and found in a short time a great improvement in my health; the food contained just the right kind of nourishment for my body and brain that was lacking. The restlessness disappeared, my stomach ceased to trouble me, mental vigor returned and I am now able to do more and better work than ever before.

When friends express surprise to find me so well, it is necessary only to mention the merits of Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Between the Lines

The Boomer Speaks

The literary boomer sat in his luxurious private office behind his mahogany roll-top desk and spoke regretfully of the glorious opportunities that went to waste during the so-called "golden age" of American letters.

"Just think what might have been done with the authors of that period if a man like myself could have had the handling of them. Of course he would have needed all the modern appliances in the way of the telegraph, photographic camera, and so on, but give me those and put me back fifty or sixty years and I'd guarantee to make literature get up and hump itself.

"Take Hawthorne; what good was his shyness if it didn't help sell his books? There ought to have been a tally-ho coach run from Lenox every afternoon during the season just to show folks how shy he was, and in the winter I'd have kept him busy declining invitations to meet the Four Hundred, just because he was so shy. Why, I'd even have him decline an invitation to the big dinner our house is going to give next week in honor of the three hundred thousandth copy of Old Uncle B'gosh, our great rural romance, though as a general thing our authors are not allowed to stay away from these feasts. It's going to be a great affair, by the way. Delmonico's banquet hall fitted up like a haymow, the waiters dressed in overalls and a Virginia reel of eighty-six authors after the dinner. You'll read about it in the next copy of the magazine.

"Then there was N. P. Willis with his fancy vests. Why, just think what could have been done with him in the way of color printing! There was Washington Irving, too; a high-toned, dignified gentleman that moved in the very best society of his day. Did you ever hear of his publishers working up a boom for his books as the one author in America who could depict society because he was thoroughly familiar with it, and then backing up the racket by working his name into the society columns every Sunday? My dear boy, if I'd had the running of Irving, he'd have gone to every big ball and party in New York, and I'd have had it in his contract that he had to, or else get his books published somewhere else.

"But the worst case of all in the way of a neglected opportunity was Thoreau. There was a man who used to go into the woods and get so far away that they couldn't find him, except when his royalties came due. I'd let him go into the woods, too, but not more than ten minutes' walk from a post-office or telegraph station, and I'd make him dress himself in skins and wear whiskers down to his waist and be photographed coming out of his cave, so we could boom him as the hermit of—what's that long name? Yes, that's right, the Androscoggin.

"It just makes my heart ache when I think of that man never getting photographed in his fancy dress, never getting pretty near ate up by a bear, never escaping from the horns of a moose, never sittin' up nights to whisper to an owl, never even changing his name nor nothing."

And with a sad shake of his head the literary boomer hurried away to close a contract for the advertising of a new brand of Good-Old-New England crullers that were to be eaten at the grand authors' dinner.

The Author of Admirable Tinker

Mr. Edgar Jepson, whose stories about The Admirable Tinker have been appearing in these columns, is an Oxford man who was at Balliol in the days of the famous Jowett. There he took his degree in Honor Greats and represented the University in cross-country running. But he took an even greater interest in the advanced movement in modern literature and was a member of those famous and eclectic literary societies, The Dolores and The Ishmaelites. This interest brought him into contact with the Harvard traveling scholars of his time, notably with the philosopher, Mr. George Santayana, and the art critic, Mr. Bernard Berenson, who saw a good deal of him during their first visits to Oxford.

On leaving the University Mr. Jepson accomplished the somewhat rare feat of putting behind him for a time the academic career with its associations and atmosphere. He said that people who lived in studies had better confine themselves to writing about books, while those who wished to write about life had better experience it. Therefore he

Why "superior to all others"?

1—Because they are pure and of high grade.
2—Because they yield the most and best for the money.
3—Because they are unequaled for smoothness, delicacy and flavor.
4—Because years of study have been given to their skillful preparation.

Special systems and machinery have been devised peculiar to the methods of treatment whereby the purity, palatability and highest nutrient characteristics are retained.

FRANK C. CLARK, 111 Broadway, New York traveled in France, Italy, Montenegro and the Holy Land, pursuing his exploration of life as far as the West Indies, for about four years. Returning to London he renewed his intimacy with his old Oxford friends and attempted the adventure of literature. He shortly made a considerable success with a novel called The Passion for Romance, which was quickly followed by other brilliant stories. This season he has published a go-ahead romantic narrative entitled The Dictator's Daughter, and a more serious but not less humorous novel, The Sentimental Warrior. There are not in England at the present time four other writers for whose work literary people look with more curiosity; and those Continental papers which keep in touch with English literary work never fail to notice him favorably.

The writer remembers him well on his entry into London literary life. Coming straight from the West Indies he had absolutely nothing to say about anything; now he has perhaps a trifle too much—most of it in a "grimsical" vein and painfully different from what every one else says. He is a slight, fair man with tired blue eyes, who cannot see the importance of a long face in being earnest.

A Mistaken Tribute

Not long since, King Edward and Queen Alexandra visited the Isle of Man, and very naturally Mr. Hall Caine was conspicuous among their entertainers. The photographers did their work as usual. In the conventional line which was formed with the King and Queen in the middle there appears the striking face of Mr. Caine near the King. There is also a boy who wears his hat while all the others except the King have bared their heads. Apropos of this there is a story. The youth who wore his hat was Mr. Caine's son. He was taken to task for his remissness in royal etiquette.

"Why did you keep your hat on?" his father asked.

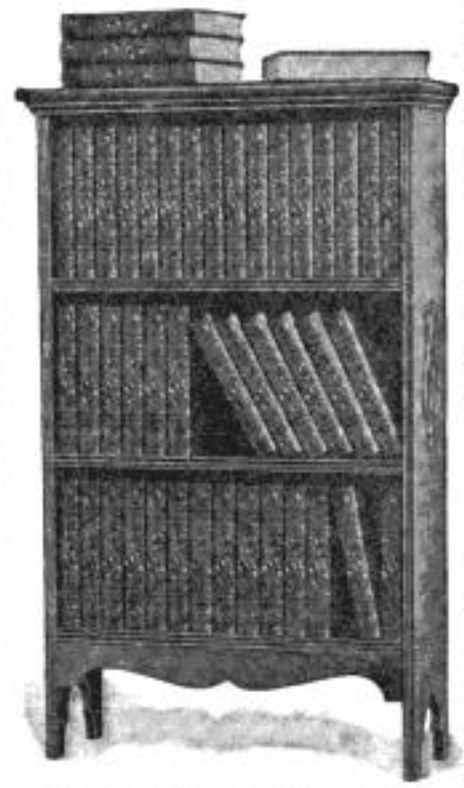
"Well," he replied, "I thought whatever the King did was right."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, the King kept his hat on, and so I wore mine."

The story reached the King with the photograph, and Edward VII is said to have been greatly amused at this misdirected proof of loyalty.

Cape Cod Ballads



The appearance of a new volume of honest, homely, genial verse is an event so infrequent that whenever a young writer publishes a collection of poems that are really worth reading and reading again, it becomes a genuine pleasure to accord to them a full measure of praise and appreciation. Such a collection is Mr. Joe Lincoln's Cape Cod Ballads (Albert Brandt, Trenton, New Jersey).

To readers of this magazine Mr. Lincoln is perhaps best known as a humorist, as a teller of tales, a chronicler of the deep-sea adventures of sturdy shipmasters, or of the grocery store debates of village philosophers; but most of his prose work he has paralleled in his charming verse.

Mr. Lincoln is content to sing of the common things of life: and therein, perhaps, lies the secret of his success. An atmosphere of the past is apt to pervade his verse; he takes the reader back to boyhood scenes and recalls old-fashioned Thanksgivings, long Sunday mornings in the prim little church, summer days in old-time gardens, schoolday pranks, swimming, fishing, and the thousand joys of boy life in a New England sea-town. Perhaps the most striking characteristics of these poems are their simplicity and their sincerity. They ring true; they make one feel that the author is himself part and parcel of the scenes he pictures; that they are not only his birthright, but that they are part of him. Add to their simplicity and sincerity a mellow flavor of geniality, good humor and kindliness—with perhaps a savor of New England austerity—and one has a fair idea of what is in store for one's mental palate. It should also be said that in rhyme and rhythm Mr. Lincoln's workmanship is so smooth and free that lilt and metre seem but happy accidents.

The author of these ballads is a city man—an editor in New York—but his forebears, "Cape Codders" all, followed the sea for many a year and handed down to him that inbred love of salt water that a man loses only with his life. Mr. Lincoln spent his boyhood on the sandy arm that hugs Massachusetts Bay; and each summer he goes back to his old home by the sea and renews acquaintance with the men and places of his poems.

How Would You Like to Own

an ideal library containing the best of the plays of Shakespeare and Molière, the poems of Goethe, Chaucer and Longfellow, the stories of Dumas and Dickens, the essays of Emerson, Schopenhauer and Macaulay, the humor of Aristophanes, Mark Twain and Charles Lamb—in a word, a library containing the best of every author you ever admired or wanted to read?

Charles Dudley Warner

was the first to bring such a library within your reach in a superb set of forty-six books. It is, in truth, the World's Best Literature, and the largest private libraries cannot equal it in scope. With it you need never again be ignorant of any literary subject. The not only includes masterpieces, but gives critical essays on noted authors by the greatest living writers.

Governor Yates, of Illinois, said:

"The distinguishing feature of the Warner Library—and the one which places it above all other libraries—is found in the critical and interpretative essays, which enable us to know and understand each great master as he was known and understood by his greatest exponent and biographer."

Sixty Centuries of Books

20,000 Pages In these wonderful forty-six volumes will be found the brightest thoughts of the greatest authors—complete novels and chapters in fiction, humorous sketches, poetry, philosophy, history, travel, science, oratory, letters and essays. Translations from Persian, Hindu, Greek, Latin and all the modern languages are included. In short, the thousands of large pages fairly teem with interest and delight.

Course of Reading A systematic course of reading and study, equal to a four years' university course, has been prepared. It not only gives the system of reading, but furnishes the material itself, through the pages of the Library, and by means of an admirable Index. It is both teacher and text-book.

800 Illustrations Photogravures of famous scenes and paintings, portraits, art plates, color reproductions of beautiful manuscripts—all these form a wealth of attractive material profusely illustrating the Warner Library.

2,500 Synopses of Books This valuable feature is unique with the Warner Library. Brief descriptions of all the world's great books are given in the space of a few hundred words each. No one has read or can read all the books which come up in the course of conversation. But these synopses will give the busy man a gist of them all; not only novels such as "Robert Elsmere," "Ben Hur," or "Quo Vadis," but poems, dramas and technical works.

THE PIT

"Did he seem very busy?"

"Who, Landry? I——"

"No, no, no, Curtis."

"Oh, I should say so. Why, Laura, I think, honestly, I think wheat went down to —oh, way down. They say that means so much to Mr. Jadwin, and it went down, down, down. It looked that way to me. Don't that mean that he'll lose a great deal of money?"

Laura started up with a sharp gesture of impatience and exasperation, crying:

"Oh, what do I care about wheat—about this wretched scrambling after money! He was busy, you say? He looked that way?"

Page nodded: "Everybody was," she said. Then she hazarded:

"I wouldn't worry, Laura. Of course, a man must give a great deal of time to his business. I didn't mind when Landry couldn't come home with me."

"Oh—Landry," murmured Laura.

On the instant Page bridled, her eyes snapping.

"I think that was very uncalled for," she exclaimed, sitting bolt upright.

"As much so as your telling me what I was not to worry about," Laura flung back. "Worrying! What am I worrying about? Upon my word, you talk as though I did not want Curtis to attend to his business."

"But, you—you just said," protested Page, "that you didn't care anything about wheat, about his scrambling——"

But Laura interrupted her, clasping her hands about her temples, her eyes closed.

"Oh, don't argue, don't argue," she cried. "Oh, couldn't you choose another day than this—this day of all the year—to annoy me?"

"Why, Laura, dear, who is trying to?"

Laura wheeled quickly about, her hands clasped under her chin.

"Oh, will you go away?" she exclaimed. "Will you go away? I shall scream! I shall scream in another moment."

And Page, bewildered, confounded, her heart none the less aching for her sister, could only take herself away as quietly and as quickly as possible.

(TO BE CONCLUDED)

A Newspaper Knight

NEWSPAPERMEN will rejoice at the unique part played by one of their craft, Mr. John Callan O'Laughlin, in the present political storm centre of Venezuela.

Mr. O'Laughlin started recently to be on hand in the Caribbean Sea to report the American naval manœuvres there. En route he visited Caracas. In that capital he readily foresaw that trouble of international moment was about to break out. Thereupon he cabled to New York canceling his newspaper engagements with Dewey's fleet.

"The high places of Venezuela are good enough for me," he wrote to a friend in Washington.

For twelve years Mr. O'Laughlin was a correspondent at the National Capital, assigned to duty at the State Department. There he became acquainted with many of the world's leading diplomats, and was regarded by them as not inexpert in their own line of statesmanship. His standing, for example, at the Russian Embassy was such that Count Cassini presented his name to the Czar, and that monarch made the newspaperman a member of the Order of St. Stanislaus.

When complications made affairs tense in Caracas President Castro denied himself to correspondents and otherwise handicapped them. At this point the American journalist thought of his St. Stanislaus button. Wearing this, he proceeded to the President's mansion. The insignia of rank worked like a charm; gates and doors swung open as if by magic.

Perhaps President Castro felt that an American journalist with influence enough to secure a decoration from the Czar of Russia was a possible international factor not to be ignored. At all events, Castro accorded him many courteous attentions, and finally summoning attendants the President ceremoniously and with assurances of esteem signed a decree conferring upon O'Laughlin knighthood in the Order of Caballero de Bolivar, and affixed the button of that order in the American's coat lapel. A further attention, and the one, of course, which the American reporter sought, was an executive permit to dispatch uncensored cablegrams.

The Admirable Tinker

Tinker was full of a quiet, restful satisfaction. But it was in the evening that the great triumph came. When she came out of her room in her evening frock, Tinker regarded her for a while with a satisfaction that was almost solemn, then he turned her round, looked into the big mirror at the end of the corridor, and said, "We match."

"Do you really think so?" said Elsie in an awed voice, with humid eyes.

"There's no doubt about it," said Tinker with calm, dispassionate and judicial impartiality.

When they came into the restaurant there was a faint murmur of delighted surprise from the tables they passed, and one stout but sentimental baroness cried, "Voilà des seraphins!"

And truly, if you can conceive of a seraph in an Eton suit, a low-cut white waistcoat and a white tie, there was something in what she said. At the sight of them Sir Tancred smiled, and Lord Crosland said, "I congratulate you on your taste, young people."

"It was Tinker's," said Elsie; and she looked at him with a world of thankfulness and devotion in her eyes.

After dinner Tinker was uncomfortable: he felt bound to break to Elsie her uncle's desertion, and he was afraid of tears. With a vague notion of emphasizing the difference between her uncle's régime and his own, he led the way to the corner of the gardens where they had first met, and, standing before the seat on which she had waited so long and so hungrily, he said, "I say, don't you think we could do without your uncle?"

"Do without uncle?" said Elsie surprised.

"Yes; suppose instead of living with your uncle and his looking after you, you lived with us and I looked after you? Suppose you were to be my adopted sister?"

"For good and all?" said Elsie in a hushed voice.

"Yes."

For answer she threw her arms round his neck, kissed him, and cried, "Oh, I do love you so!"

By a splendid effort Tinker repressed a wriggle.

"We'll consider it settled, then," he said. Elsie loosed him.

With a little deprecating cough and a delicate tentativeness he said, "About kissing: of course, now that you're my sister, you have a right to kiss me sometimes; and—and—of course it's all right. But don't you think you could manage with once a day—when we say good-night?"

"In the morning, too," said Elsie greedily.

"Well, twice a day," said Tinker with a sigh.

Tales of a Country Town

horror of an impending crisis. Homer Tibbetts was waiting for them at the main entrance.

"I got separated from you down there and came out alone," he said. "I've fixed it so that we can get in to see Choctaw Bill before the show opens up."

Ashen pale, a helpless thing carried along into the maëlstrom of Fate, "Bronco Jim" approached the private tent of his old friend and camp-mate, Choctaw Bill.

The flaps of the tent parted and the buckskin hero, at a swift signal from the attorney-at-law, was holding "Bronco Jim" by the hand.

"Jim Tibbetts, put her there!" he exclaimed. "It's good for sore eyes to see you again. Miles was asking about you the other day. I told him that probably you'd run up from Musselwhite to see me. You saved my life more'n once and I figured that you'd be here to-day if you had to walk the whole distance."

Jim stood and listened with a ghastly smile, but "Doc" Clevison and the others were too much stunned and blinded to observe his confusion.

To this day "Bronco Jim" will sit apart from the others trying to explain to himself the miracle. It is all a vast mystery to him. But he has the satisfaction of knowing that any story he may choose to tell has the hallmark of authority. He was identified by Choctaw Bill.

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

Ready for Our Smelters

ORE worth between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000 is already mined waiting to be smelted—to be turned into money. Ore "in sight" (or blocked out), which will feed an enormous smelting plant for years to come, is also ready to be converted into cash. This ore alone is worth far more than the total capitalization of the Majestic Copper Mining and Smelting Company, which owns outright eight groups of mines—namely: Hoosier Boy, Vicksburg, Harrington-Hickory, Old Hickory, O. K., Larkspur, Copperfield and Treasure Groups—wonderfully rich in Copper, Gold, Silver, Lead, Iron and Zinc. The mines are now being developed and managed by the famous mining expert, Mr. William A. Farish. The ore is practically inexhaustible.

TO MAKE the last payments on a 350-ton smelting plant, and to have sufficient capital to be absolutely independent, the Majestic Company will sell a limited amount of treasury stock at a price which will quickly bring in all desired subscriptions. An opportunity to invest in this stock, which may steadily advance in value for generations, is offered. Some of our largest stockholders are business men whom we have persuaded to visit the properties or who have sent for our book "Above and Below the Surface." The present price, $7.50—par value $10.00—will positively be withdrawn next month (February). Only those signifying their intention of becoming stockholders before then can secure treasury stock at $7.50.

OUR NEXT PARTY WILL START FOR THE MINES IN BEAVER COUNTY, UTAH, ON FEBRUARY 3d

will be mailed to all persons interested. Remember we guarantee the truth of every statement we make, and these statements can be further verified by a visit to the property. We will gladly send copies of letters regarding this property, written by some of the most influential and best-known business men in this country.

A substantial dividend will undoubtedly be earned before the close of 1903. Persons buying stock at this time will, of course, participate in all dividends. Complete details furnished. Address all communications and make all checks payable to the Fiscal Agents,

THE NEW MEMBER

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS
Committee to Elevate the Condition of Labor
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON, D. C.

SURMOUNTING the great dome of the Capitol is the figure of what Mr. Hitt, of Illinois, the most genial, the most delightful, and the most witty of men, told me was Freedom, and Montague Lessler, of New York City, whose experience here is not much greater than mine, said was intended to represent Liberty; but whether it is Freedom or Liberty it ought not to be there, and in its place there should be an extra large brazen calf covered with the very finest gilt.

Of all places in our broad land this is the one place above all others where every man and woman worships at the shrine of the golden calf. Here we have put up an idol to the great god Success; we have erected to him our temples, and we have given to him high priests and acolytes. All day long one can hear the chanting of the priests and see the censers swung in his honor. The air is heavy with the perfume of incense burned in the sanctuary.

Yesterday I was in Senator Graham's committee room when a friend of his, a big New York banker, was also there, and they were talking about trust legislation. The Senator introduced me to his friend, who mentioned the names of some other Senators, asked how they stood on the trust question, and how much influence they possessed, and finally inquired about Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts.

"You get Lodge with you and you are all right," Graham said, but not with much enthusiasm in his voice.

"I am surprised at that," said the New York man; "is Lodge so all-powerful?"

"Lodge," Graham answered, "is the President's dearest and closest and most intimate friend, for the President himself has publicly said it. Lodge goes to the White House morning, noon and night; it is 'Theodore' on the one side and 'Cabot' on the other, and if that doesn't show how close the intimacy is then nothing else can."

"But why should that make him so influential in the Senate?" the New Yorker asked.

"My dear fellow," Graham told him, "simply because it means that Lodge has got there, and the man who has arrived, as the French say, is the man who is in Washington. If you can go to the President, if you can feel sure that whatever you may say to him will have its effect, if he will ask your advice and accept it—and the latter is more important than anything else—why, of course, in Washington you are the great man."

A Selfish, Jealous City

In our committee-room the other day, after the committee meeting had adjourned, three or four of us sat around the table gossiping, and to tell you the truth it seems to me as if members of Congress spend a great deal of their time in talking gossip and telling stories. Well, we got to discussing some of our associates and their abilities, and the name of a certain man was mentioned, and White, of Maryland, who was sitting at the head of the table smoking, turned to me and said:

"Turner, you are serving your first term and I've been here a dozen years, and if you want to stay here and succeed I'll tell you how to do it."

I said I should be under eternal obligations for the information.

"Then this is what you are not to do," White went on. "Don't waste your time working on committees; don't ever make a speech in which only a few people are interested; don't think that anybody else knows nearly as much as you do about anything.

"Those are the don'ts; now for the things you are to do. Before you make your first speech just go round to as many men as you know and tell them that you are going to speak and you want them to hear you——"

"As a particular favor," Jones interrupted with a laugh.

"Yes, as a particular favor," White replied, "but as a particular favor to them and not to you. Say they will hear some things they don't know, and say it as if you owned the patent right on knowledge, and the majority in the next hour will be saying what a deucedly clever fellow you are; and as the able men in Congress are mighty scarce and too indifferent to care, they won't take the trouble to say anything. I tell you the trick is easy if you only know how to work it."

I want to succeed here. I want to succeed here very much; but it is so hard, so disappointing, so different from what I thought it was going to be!

Washington is the most brutal place in the world. The House is full of good fellows; there are lots of them always ready to ask me to take a drink and a few who have invited me to their houses to dinner, and any number only too willing to tell me what to do and how to go about things; and yet, despite all that, if you were to search the country over for concentrated selfishness it is in Washington that you would find it.

Every man comes here determined on only one thing—to hold his job. Every member of the House wants another term, every doorkeeper and clerk wants to keep his place, and all he thinks or cares about is to draw his salary. If you think we legislate for the country you make a great mistake. We don't. We legislate for ourselves. Whenever we do anything we think about our districts and the effect it will have on us the next time we come up for election. I know this doesn't sound just as nice as you would like to hear it, but I am telling you the truth. I am not worrying about Massachusetts or New York, I assure you. My own little district kissed by the Pacific Ocean is my empire, and "my" people and "my" country are no longer empty figures of speech to me.

We are not only selfish but the whole life is hollow and artificial, and there is no place in it for the poor man, or for the woman who is really sincere and who prefers her home and her children to the mockery of society.

The Washington 400

At home, you know, we think that a Congressman is a very big man, and that he goes everywhere in Washington, that the President invites him to dinner once or twice a week, that Ambassadors are very civil to him, that people think it is an honor to know him, and that he is on the top wave of society and has nothing to do but enjoy himself and have a good time. It is fortunate people think that at home. As you asked me to tell you all about society and the people I meet, I will try to give you an idea of how things are.

At the top of the heap is the President, who has done more entertaining since he has been in the White House than any man before him. He delights in it; he enjoys meeting people and having them there to luncheon and dinner, and Mrs. Roosevelt is equally fond of giving teas and musicales. A White House invitation, especially to dinner, is what every one wants, and when a man receives an invitation to the White House he must go there, even if he has already accepted another invitation for the same evening. An invitation from the White House is like a command from Royalty, which only sickness will excuse one from accepting. Up to the present I have not had to cancel any other dinner engagement to obey a White House "command."

After the President come the members of the Cabinet, who give dinners or go out to dinners every night during the "season," which means from the time when Congress assembles until Lent. The only form of entertaining known in Washington is dinners. If you are in society you give a dinner to-night and to-morrow night you dine at the house of one of the men who was the guest the night before, and you probably meet half of the men and women who were at the table, and that is the way it goes on for seven nights in the week; yes, for seven, because life is too short to waste any of its evenings, and Sunday has to be pressed into service just like any other day. Among the diplomats Sunday is the day for luncheons and dinners.

Well, they dine and they dine and they dine. People never meet in Washington merely to talk, as they do in other places—as we do, for instance, at home. You are invited to dinner and you sit for two hours eating a great deal more than is really good for you, and sometimes you enjoy it and sometimes you don't, and whether you do or whether you don't depends a great deal on whether the girl or woman that you took in to dinner has any interest in you and you in her, or whether she wishes she was on the other side of the table talking to the man with the black mustache, who is evidently only too happy that he has been placed next to the girl with blue eyes in white satin.

I've been lucky. Bachelor members of Congress are not common. Judge Lancaster's daughter, Florence, is a charming girl, and the Lancasters are among the big society people. Miss Lancaster belongs to a swell dancing club, whose members dine at the houses of the chaperons before every dance —dinner dances they call them here—and she was kind enough to invite me to one of these dinners. Dinner was at eight o'clock—that's the fashionable hour—and lasted for a couple of hours or so, and then between eleven and twelve o'clock began the dance. By that time you are hungry again and you have supper, and it is three or four o'clock in the morning before you go to bed.

There is one thing quite certain—I may be able to draw a decent bill of complaint, but I can't write a connected account of Washington life because there are so many distractions that I start in one direction and then go wandering off on another tack before I get there. I began by telling how society is arranged here, and here I've wound up at four o'clock in the morning after having been out all night dining and dancing. Well, after the Cabinet come the big Senators who live in large houses and have plenty of money, and a few swagger Congressmen like Judge Lancaster, who have been here a great many years, who have fine houses and know every one, and if they have pretty daughters their invitations will never be refused.

Next to being a bachelor the best thing that a Congressman can be is the father of a pretty daughter.

The Best Job Going

Now I have given you the make-up of society in Washington, but I almost forgot the diplomats, who belong to a circle quite by themselves and rather look down upon all the rest. The best job going is that of an Ambassador for one of the European nations. The Ambassadors live in big houses, which are the property of their Governments, and are paid large salaries, besides having allowances for entertaining. They don't have much to do, so far as I have been able to find out, except to enjoy themselves.

That's the list of society, the Washington 400, and the rest of us never get our names in the papers outside of the Congressional proceedings and cut no more ice than Susan's dressmaker. Susan's dressmaker can go to the theatre and look at her patrons in the dresses she made for them, and so can we, and see Ambassadors and their wives and a lot more fashionable people, and we go to the White House to an official reception and shake the President's hand, and that's about as near as we ever get to knowing anything about society.

You can understand that the people who are in society don't really care for each other. Nobody in Washington has an intimate friend. Men may like each other fairly well, but a deep, lasting friendship is unknown. Life is too evanescent for that.

But it is interesting, it is the most interesting life you can think of. At home when we go into politics it is rather a small game that we play, but here we are playing the biggest kind of a game that you can think of, and the men who play it are experts and know every move to be made. I don't suppose you will like to hear me talk about Congress and legislation as a game, but that is really what it is. Take the fight we had over the admission of the new States. Senator Quay led the forces on one side, and Senator Beveridge, and Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, led the ranks of the opposition.

Senator Aldrich is the great boss in Washington; he has more real power than any other man, or nearly all the other men put together. Every Republican consults him, every man wants to know what he says before making up his opinion. And the curious thing about Senator Aldrich—so men who have been here a great many years tell me—is that nobody has yet been able to discover why he wields so much power or to imitate his method. He never appears to want anything for himself, he never makes a trade, he never asks for favors. Other men go on for deals, Aldrich never. If there is an important piece of legislation pending, men are in doubt as to the outcome until they consult Senator Aldrich, but when he has reached his conclusion every one is satisfied that the verdict has been pronounced. Senator Graham told me that in all his experience, in great fights over the tariff and other things, he has never known Senator Aldrich's judgment to be at fault.

I have met him on two occasions. He is a man with a charming manner and a brain that simply leaps at a proposition. He knows what you are going to say long before you have said it. I am told that he is the greatest authority on tariff and finance in Congress, and in addition is very well informed on all general subjects. He is the big boss in Washington. I'll tell you something about Quay, his opponent, in my next.

WINTON

To meet with conditions like the one illustrated above does not, therefore, justify the slightest alarm. A Winton Touring Car may be going ever so fast but the operator, quick as a flash, with a single forward stroke of the right arm, can disconnect the power from the transmission and apply a wheel-locking emergency brake. Absolutely no chance for confusion—only one thing to do, and the means for doing under direct command. Simple, isn't it? Of course there are two other brakes, either of which would hold the car, forward or backward, on the steepest hill, but the convenience of this positive acting emergency brake is a big feature when considering the matter of safety.

Everything about the Winton combines to insure safety, comfort and speed. It's the handsomest car on the market, too. Possesses many inherent advantages which make it the unquestioned triumph of the 1903 season. It is appreciated by those who recognize superiority and whose good judgment enables them to differentiate between practical construction (with the embodiment of the best and most expensive materials) and superficial construction.

The new 1903 Winton Touring Car has a 20 horsepower motor, an increase of 33 per cent. in power over the 1902 model. The price, everything complete, is $2500. Visit any of our branch or agency depots and the many features of Winton excellence will be fully demonstrated.

The Autobiography of a Beggar

"WOULD YER MIND READIN' MEH A BIT OUT EF DE BOOK?" AXES HE

By I. K. FRIEDMAN

Author of By Bread Alone, Etc.

I Come Into de World

BEING AN ACCOUNT OF HOW MY RESEARCHES IN HEBREW BROUGHT ME TO THE STUDY OF ANTHROPOLOGY

I WAS born—well, what's de use puttin' down what every one knows? I was born an' dat settles it. I don't know de day nor de year, but what has dat got ter do wid it, anyways? De main fact is dat I was born. Ef I had ter do it over agin I might change meh mind, but bein' born an' dyin' is where beggars comes in even wid millionaires. Did yer ever stop fer ter think dat de only diff'rence twixt men is what dey does atween de time dey is born an' die? We is all born equal an' we dies equal, but we don't live equal. Hurrah fer equality! Anyways, I am forty years old, er I ought ter be; I kin tell dat 'cause I can't be ten, and I'm too old ter be twinty, an' I must have been thirty a long time ago. Forty is a good place ter stop orff, an' I'm goin' ter let it go at dat. Not ter know yer age is a good way ter keep young, eh? I rekomind it ter wimens. Oh, wimens, giddy wimens, joy ef a man's folly, as de poets say—but dey comes later in de story.

Where was I born? I don't know ef it's any ef yer particuler bizness, but it bein' dat I'm writin' meh histree fer de sake ef a anterpolergist an' his noble coin (which comes in furder on) I don't mind sayin' I was born in a alley ef Chicago on de big West Side. Ef yer kin find dat alley yer pretty smart—smarter en meh—'cause dey have carted it orff long ago an' thrown it inter de lake. Maybe dey done dat in meh honor, an' maybe dey done it 'cause dey needed de space. Yer kin take yer pick.

Meh mother was a Irish washerwoman an' meh father was a German by profession afore he come ter Amerikee. His trade was ter watch meh mother work an' ter lick me. He didn't work no union hours at either end. Dey give meh a grand eddication, startin' meh out early in life wid a basket on meh arm ter bring home what I could. I stoled oncet an' dey licked meh—fer not stealin' more when I had de chanct. (I'm goin' back an' scratch dis part out.)

I ain't told yer meh name yet, fer de fact is dat yer jist ez well orff ef yer don't know it, an' I've got one eye on de perlice while I'm writin' dis, which ain't comfertuble. Sam de Scribe says bein' a literary guy ain't no snap, an' Sam knows more en a cross-eyed cow, I'm a-tellin' youse. Meh real name is George Schwarz, I think; but I've changed meh name so often accordin' ter circumstances dat I ain't sure ef I'm right. It's a funny world, eh? Seems yer got ter have a name same ez a dog er de number ef a house. Dey named de first man Adam an' ever since den we took names ter be in line. Style an' fashun is responsible fer all meh woes.

I was arristed oncet (oncet? Ha! Ha!), an' de jidge axes meh what was meh name. "I ain't got none," I says.

"Thirty days fer havin' no name," he says.

"Please, yer honor," I pipes up, "meh name is Mollbuzzer."

"Twinty more fer contimpt ef court," he says.

Well, meh secret is out, so I might ez well tell yer meh name is Mollbuzzer. It's a name what thieves calls a feller what picks wimen's pockets an' bothers wimens in gineral; Moll, meanin' wimens, I guess; an' Buzzer, like all names, explainin' itself. It ain't pretty, I admit; but it was guv me agin meh will an' I ain't complainin' none, fer it might hav' been worse; but I don't see how. I don't want yer ter think I ever picked a pocket, fer, ter tell yer de truth, it's a slick trick an' I never could get on ter it, an' I'm too honest, anyways. I was pinched oncet fer tryin', an' I left it alone ever since. Dear reader, do likewise. Yer must have rubber fingers ter pick pockets an' begin practicin' young. It's a inborn gift like writin' poetree er paintin' a pictshure er bein' a carpinter, an' dere's no use ef cryin' ef yer ain't born dat way. Meh motto in life is, ef yer can't get what yer want, don't sit down an' cry, but jist go an' grab it.

I must tell yer how I come ter write de sweet story ef meh life, 'cause I ain't a-doin' it fer fun. It come about all along ef goin' in de public libraree fer ter read a book. "Yeagers," which is de English fer beggars, likes librarees in winter, 'cause dey is warmer en de weather, an' 'cause yer kin git a nice big book, hide yer head ahint it an' go ter sleep widout payin' fer yer bed. De day I went in it was colder en a corpse, an' der was nothin' doin' on de street, no one bein' out ter see how dere breath looked.

So I goes inter de riference-room an' I says ter de cove wid a blue coat at de desk, "Bring meh a book." An' he looks at meh sharp an' he says:

"What kind ef a book?"

"A histree book," says I, thinkin' as dey must be de biggest, 'count of histree bein' so long.

"What kind ef a histree book?" says he.

"United States histree," says I.

"Which one?" axes he.

"Is dere more en one?" axes I.

"Sure dere is," says he, laffin'.

"Well," says I, "bring meh de biggest." An' he goes orff a-laffin', an' soon he comes back wid de histree, an' I carries it to de desk an' starts ter read de pictshures. Den I finds a piece 'bout George Washington which wasn't so slow, an' I reads dat. George was a iligent gineral an' a good Prisident, considerin' he come first. Den I finds a piece about a duck named Aleck Hamilton, who, so a feller named Dan Webster says, "hit de rock ef national finances wid de rod of wisdom" an' made money come out ef it when de countree an' George Washington was hard up. But I don't believe dat—no, not meh. Aleck, I guess, would have made a better hobo en George, seein' he was so good at comin' games. Well, I started ter write meh own histree an' not de histree ef Amerikee; but I come on ter a part 'bout a cove named Aaron Burr, who was at de head ef all ef 'em when it came to de playin' ef games.

De first thing Aaron done was ter put Aleck Hamilton out ef bizness wid a gun, an' den he comes de rock an' rod game hisself; but de peepul bein' on ter de trick, he gives it up ter grab de Mississippi River, but dey catches him, an' it was all over wid poor old Aaron. He had ter skip ter Paris an' live on cold victuals de same ez us. Histree teaches dat dere ain't no game what ain't been played long ago.

Well, I reads on a bit an' falls asleep, a-dreamin' I was Aleck Hamilton hittin' de rock wid meh little rod an' tellin' de peepul like dis: "Feller-citizens, each ef youse kin step up an' give meh one little dime, den I will hit de rock wid meh rod an' make de coin bubble, an' each ef youse gets a big silver dollar. Ef de rock don't work yer gits de dime back. Step up, feller-citizens, an' git rich quick. De first guy an' dime takes two silver dollars."

An' de feller-citizens, never havin' been done dat way yet, bein' still young an' innercent, steps up lively an' hands meh a nice lot ef new dimes, which I was puttin' in meh pocket, when some one grabs meh, an' I swings meh rod, thinkin' he was a-goin' ter take de dimes away from meh, an' I wakes up. It was de libraree cove wid de blue coat.

"What are yer doin'?" he says. "Dis ain't no lodgin'-house; yer can't sleep in here!"

Digitized by Google

"I wasn't sleepin'," I says, mad at him fer comin' along when de dimes was all mine, "I was only a-thinkin'."

"Well, yer makes an awful noise when yer thinks," he says.

"I was thinkin' about Aleck Hamilton hittin' de rock," I says.

"I don't care," he says, lookin' puzzled. "I'll have ter put yer out ef yer sleeps agin."

"Can't a feller think?" I grumbles, an' he goes orff back ef his desk, an' I goes back arter him an' says:

"I'd like anudder histree book—a very old histree book—de older de better," fer I wahted ter see what games dey played afore George Washington was born.

De cove in de blue coat grins an' he says, "De oldest histree book we got is in Hebrew."

"Good, dat sounds ez old as old clothes; bring it along," I says.

"Kin yer read it?" axes he.

"Kin I read it! I wouldn't axe fer it ef I couldn't read it. I guess meh own uncle is Hebrew," I says.

An' he brings de book out an' I goes along wid it till I comes ter where a real old gent wid long gray hair an' gold specs was sittin' an' readin', an' I takes a seat'opersite him, thinkin' maybe he would lay de gold specs down an' I might pick 'em up.

An' I pretends not ter see de old gent; but he looks up ater a while an' watches meh, fer I was a-mumblin' an' a-mumblin' ter mehself an' a-waggin' meh head up an' down ez ef de Hebrew book was more excitin' en de tale ef "Buck Bradley's Ranch, Er Up Agin de Pirates in Missouri." He looks surprised, an' den he looks over at meh an' he says:

"Excuse meh, my friend, but in what langwidge is de book dat yer is readin'?"

"It's in Jew langwidge er old Hebrew," I says.

"Yer don't say," he smiles. "Is yer fond ef it?"

"It's meh faverite langwidge," I says.

"What does de book treat on?" axes he.

"On old Hebrew games," says I.

"I never knowed dere was sich a book in Hebrew," he says.

"Yer kin read it ef yer likes," I says, pushin' de book ter him.

"No, thanks," he says; "I can't read Hebrew."

"Yer can't!" I says, "it's too bad. It's amusin' ter diskever how old our new games is."

"Dat interests meh," he says. "I'm a anterpolergist." An' he gets up an' comes ter take a seat next ter meh; de cove in de blue coat lookin' on wid his eyes wide open.

"What's a anterpolergist?" I axes him. "Is it somethin' new?",

"Compearatively speakin'," he says. "A anterpolergist is one who studies de science ef man."

"Same es a cop?" I says.

"Not 'xactly," smiles he, rubbin' his gold specs, but not layin' 'em down like he orter.

"What makes de name so long?" I axes. "It sounds ez ef it took two pounds ef steam ter blow it thru a whistle."

"It comes from two Greek names," he says, "meanin' man an' science."

"I thought dere was two Greek names in it," I says. "Dose Greeks is awful on names. I knows one what has a fruit store, an' his name is longer en a bunch ef bananas."

An' de old gent rubs his glasses an' laffs an' says, "How come yer ter study Hebrew?"

"How come yer ter study anterpolergy?" axes I, not knowin' what else ter say.

"Well," he says, "'count ef meh interest in it."

"It was de same wid meh an' Hebrew," I says.

"Would yer mind readin' meh a bit out ef de book?" axes he.

"Sure not," says I. An' I says ez ef I was a-readin', "Mohowee, mohowwhoaa, mohahaha," er somethin' dat was jist as good.

"Not so loud, ef yer please," says he.

"Yer have ter read Hebrew loud," says I, "it bein' part ef de langwidge." An' I goes on readin' louder an' louder, an' de cove from behint de desk comes runnin' up an' sayin':

"Dis won't do; yer makin' too much noise an' disturbin' ivrybody. Yer go right out er I'll call de cop from downstairs," he says.

"It was meh own fault," pipes up de old gent. "I axed him ter do it."

An' I goes out into de hall an' de old anterpolergist comes a-runnin' ater meh. "I'm sorry dat happened," he says.

"So am I," I says, "'count ef de cove chasin' meh out I loses a dollar an' a half translatin' two pages ef Hebrew fer a minister."

"Well," says de old gent, "I'll make it right. But supposin' we gets somethin' ter eat, it bein' near noon, an' I wants ter talk wid yer; yer interests meh."

"I'm sorry," I says, "but I really ain't got de time. I'll have ter go an' tell de minister what happened."

"It won't take us long," he says.

"All right," says I. An' he takes meh inter a basemint restaurint an' he starts ter ax meh a whole pile ef questions, like dey all does; it bein' human nature ter want somethin' fer yer money.

"How comes it," he axes first, "dat yer kin read Hebrew so good an' dat yer English is so bad?"

"Bad company done it," I explains.

"How come yer ter git in bad company?" he asks.

"Count ef meh Hebrew," I says.

"Explain yerself," he says.

"Well," says I, "I got so interested in Hebrew dat I wouldn't do nothin' but read old Hebrew books, an' meh wife got mad at meh fer neglectin' her, an' she runned orff an' I took ter drink. Dat's de histree ef it."

"Who learned yer de Hebrew?"

"I learned it in collidge," I answers.

"What collidge?" axes he.

"Hebrew collidge," I says.

"I never heard ef it," says he.

"Yer hearin' might be bad," says I, an' he laffs.

"Where was yer born?" axes he.

"I was born in England," says I.

"What did yer father do?" axes he.

"He was prisidint ef de Hebrew Collidge," I says.

"Den de collidge was in England?" axes he.

"Sure," says I.

"Why didn't yer say so den?" axes he.

"Why didn't yer ax meh?" says I.

"What was yer mother?" axes he.

"Meh father's wife," says I.

"I know dat," says he, laffin'; "but what was her nationalitee?"

"She was Chinee," I says.

"Chinee! Dat's funny!" says he.

"It wasn't funny at all," says I; "meh father was like meh. He was terribul on langwidges. Whenever he wanted ter learn a new langwidge he married a new wife. His fust wife was German, an' his second was French, an' his third was Spanish, an' his fourth she was Chinee. An' dat's all I knows," I says, de dinner bein' over, "an' I'd like meh dollar an' a half which yer promised meh."

"Here it is," he says, "but yer is de biggest fakir what ever I seen in meh born days, an' I don't think yer knows any more Hebrew en a cat."

"Didn't yer hear meh read it in de libraree?" I axes, puttin' de coin in meh pocket.

"Dat was no more Hebrew en it was Chinee," he says.

"Dat shows yer don't know Hebrew from Chinee," I says.

"Take yer money an' go 'long," he says.

"I don't want yer money den," I yells; "I wouldn't touch it wid a pair of gloves," an' I lays it on de table, hopin' he would add anudder dollar an' apolergize.

"Thanks," he says, takin' de coin an' puttin' it in his pocket.

"I don't believe yer knows any more anterpolergy en a pig," I says, "even ef yer did beat meh out ef a dollar an' a half."

"I didn't beat yer," says he; "yer gave it back ter meh."

"Keep it an' welcome," I says; "I never knowed anybody ter get money dat way what did him any good. An' yer calls meh a fakir an' a liar, an' meh self-respect is more ter meh en all de money in de world." An' I goes out lookin' mad.

"Come back here!" he yells, an' I comes back an' he says: "I'll tell yer what I'll do, we'll go out an' I'll buy yer a Hebrew book wid de dollar an' a half, seein' as yer likes Hebrew so much."

"All right," I says, thinkin' I would rather have de Hebrew book en nothin'; "all right; dat's jist what I wanted was a Hebrew book."

So we goes inter a old bookshop aroun' de corner an' de man says he has a Hebrew book on Moses fer a quarter.

"Dat's jist what I wants!" I says; "I've been a-lookin' all over de earth for a Hebrew book on Moses. Glory Hallelujah!" I says.

"It's your'n now," says de old gent, givin' de cove a quarter.

"An' yer kin give meh de dollar an' a quarter which I saved yer," says I.

"De agreemint was only fer ter buy a Hebrew book," he says.

"No, sir," pipes I; "de agreemint was ter buy a Hebrew book fer a dollar an' a half; so ef yer gives meh de book on Moses an' a dollar an' a quarter asides we'll call it square."

"All right," he says; "yer is de best dat I ever seen; take de book an' de money an' go."

"Thanks," says I, puttin' de coin in meh pocket. "I'll sell yer de book on Moses back fer fifteen cents."

"Not much," he laffs.

"Yer missin' de chanct ter make a dime quick," I says.

"Please go away," he says; "I ain't got no more time."

So I takes de book an' de old gent goes orff a-laffin' ter hisself an' I follers him, an' ater a while I pulls him by de coat-tail, puffin' fer wind ez ef I runned all de way.

"You agin?" pipes he. "What does yer want now?"

"Thank Heaven I found yer," I says.

"Why fer?" axes he.

"De cove in de store," I says, "told meh a lie; dat Hebrew book ain't on Moses. It's in yer line—it's a book on Anterpolergy. De title is two Hebrew words meanin' man an' science. Jist de thing yer wants," I says; "de whole thing is in dis little Hebrew book—all yer wants ter know about science an' all dere is about man."

"But what good is it ter meh, my friend," he laffs, "ef I don't know Hebrew?"

"But ain't yer goin' ter give meh fifteen cents, runnin' all dis way. I might have died from heart disease."

"I tell you what yer do," he says, kind ef thinkin' ter hisself, "yer keep de Hebrew book an' write meh down de story ef yer life from de cradle ter de grave—don't leave out nothin', an' bring it ter meh in de libraree an' I'll give yer twenty-five dollars fer it. I have de notion dat dere'll be more anterpolergy in it den in de little Hebrew book."

So dat's why I'm writin' meh histree from de cradle ter de grave. The Money Kings of the World

By WILLIAM T. STEAD

Leopold II, Sovereign of the Congo

A LITTLE KNOWN BUT LARGELY PROFITABLE SPECULATION WHICH WINS ITS PROMOTER MORE GOLD THAN GLORY

MOST people will be surprised that Leopold, King of the Belgians, should appear in the portrait gallery of the money kings of the modern world. It is so unusual for a money king to wear a crown that the fact that he enjoys such a decoration seems to place him outside of the category of financiers. But Leopold is a much more important figure in the world as a financier, operator, speculator and company promoter than he is as the monarch of the little state which he inherited from his father.

Belgium is a small country, prosperous, and, notwithstanding occasional turmoils, like other prosperous countries, fairly contented. Its trade increases, although it has no colonies, no shipping to speak of, but it never plays any part in the arena of international politics. In order to realize King Leopold it is necessary to forget that he is a Belgian King, and dismiss all associations that may be connected with the little kingdom over which he reigns as a constitutional monarch. For many years no one suspected the possibilities, financial and political, which lay dormant behind the exterior of a man of pleasure. Leopold was believed to be much more addicted to the coulisses of the opera than to the operating rooms of the Bourse, and his name was popularly associated with scandals which were the talk of Europe.

Leopold II inherited from his father, Leopold I, a keen interest in public affairs, and a political sagacity which, had he ascended a greater throne, would have enabled him to play a leading rôle in European politics. In Belgium his ambition found little scope. The Belgian King who aspired to be prominent in international politics would have been promptly voted a nuisance both by his own subjects and by his neighbors. He was very cautious and circumspect, anxious to maintain his position, and to provide himself with the necessary wherewithal to indulge his tastes, most of which were expensive even when they were innocent. Among his innocent extravagances is a hobby for collecting rare plants and flowers from all parts of the world. His glass-houses in the palace of Laecken are famous throughout Europe. In connection with these glass-houses may be mentioned a curious fact which illustrates one side of his character not usually in evidence before the public. In the very heart of the vast acreage that is covered with conservatories, orchid and palm houses of all shapes, stands a church the like of which is to be found nowhere else. It is circular in form, surmounted by a dome of glass, supported by twenty granite columns in the intervals of which stand statues of the Twelve Apostles. The plain stone altar stands among a mass of palms and flowers. Above the altar hangs a large cross which is fitted up with electric lights. The whole church at the evening service can be brilliantly lit up. The gallery for the orchestra is lavishly decorated with growing flowers. Here the King goes to mass with the royal household, whose devotions are not disturbed, although occasionally enlivened, by the singing of the numerous birds which flit to and fro above the worshipers. The King sits in front before the whole congregation. Sermons he does not tolerate, but he attends mass like a good Catholic.

The Conquistador of the Congo

That picture of Leopold kneeling before the altar embosomed in tropical foliage while the birds join their music to that of the choir lingers in the memory, if only because of the sharp contrast which it offers to the companion picture of Leopold as Sovereign of the Congo. Similar contrasts are familiar enough in the blood-stained history of the conquistadors when men of the stamp of Cortes and Pizarro rivaled the fervor of their piety by the ruthlessness of their rapacity. For, unless an almost unbroken procession of credible witnesses have conspired to lie, King Leopold is in his imperial capacity one of the most sinister and terrible of all the figures to be met with even in connection with the blood-stained annals of the Dark Continent. A volume might be written—indeed a volume has been written—detailing the steps by which the easy-going libertine of Brussels, the constant correspondent of Queen Victoria, was transformed into the Vampire of the Congo.*

There are some who believe Leopold marked the heart of the Dark Continent for his prey when he received the reports of the West African explorers who spoke of the riches of the territory drained by the Congo. The instinct of the vulture, they say, was aroused within him; and he deliberately set about the enterprise which has resulted in his netting enormous financial gains. For my part, I shrink from crediting him with the foresight or the hypocrisy which such a supposition implies. It is more reasonable to believe that he went into the Congo adventure from a desire to assert himself in a wider field than the narrow limits of his little kingdom. It is not impossible that he may have been prompted thereto by the natural feelings of benevolence which are never entirely extinct in the human heart. Whatever the motives which led him first to embark upon his Congo adventure, even if they were of the highest, they exposed him to temptations which he has been unable to resist. Yielding to them, first perhaps unconscious as to where a false step would lead him, he has plunged onward on a path which led him ever downward until at the present moment he stands responsible for having established in the name of civilization a veritable Empire of Hell in the heart of Africa. But he has made Hell pay; and a rapid survey of the methods by which he has achieved this result brings into relief the enormous advantages which a crown gives to a money king. It is well for financiers pure and simple that royalty so seldom enters into competition with them at their own business. Altogether the King is said to have invested a sum of not more than $6,500,000 in founding and exploiting his African Empire. The Empire as a political organization has not yet produced a surplus. But the deficit is a mere bagatelle compared with the enormous profits which the King draws from his African domains. According to Mr. Morel, the annual profit which the King is reported to draw from his African speculation is not less than $5,000,000, or a return which might make a Rockefeller turn green with envy.

From a financial point of view the success of King Leopold is without precedent; but the King is not content. His profits at present arise exclusively from the loot of the ivory of a continent, and the exaction by merciless atrocity of the India-rubber which is required to furnish the cycle and motor trade with tires. But quite recently, inspired, it is said, by a conversation with an American citizen of Irish birth, Mr. Walsh, of Colorado, he has conceived the idea that the highlands of the Congo may be as rich in gold as the mountains of the Western slope of the American continent. It is sincerely to be hoped that Mr. Walsh may be right. The Americanization of the Congo might yet be a means of delivering it from the marauding scourge of the cannibals whom King Leopold arms and employs as tax collectors of his Empire.

Pending the success of Mr. Walsh and the engineers who are shortly to be prospecting for gold in the Congo, King Leopold makes his money out of India-rubber. Mr. Vandervelde, a Socialist leader, recently declared in the Brussels Senate that the King of the Belgians was the greatest India-rubber merchant in the world, and charged him with employing methods for collecting that rubber which result in untold horrors. The collection, he said, is left in the hands of white adventurers who have lost their sanity, and whose sense of morality, never strong, grows weaker and weaker every day. The foundation-stone of the profits made by King Leopold lies in the fact that he has a standing army of about 15,000 men, most of whom are admittedly cannibals, with whose aid he is able to collect rubber from the natives who sell it at two cents a pound. This rubber sells at Antwerp at from sixty to seventy-five cents a pound. The margin of profit is therefore very considerable. As the State sells about 2000 tons of rubber every year at Antwerp some conception may be formed of the King's profits. But here it is necessary to make a distinction. King Leopold, like many other Kings, is felt where he is not seen, and pockets money through agencies for which he is not officially or publicly responsible.

The Avowed Purpose of the New State

The methods, however, by which he has attained a position which enables him to exploit the region handed over to him to govern in the interest of the inhabitants are so peculiar as to merit a little attention. It would seem that when Mr. Rockefeller was building up the Standard Oil Trust, if the worst that is said against him by Mr. Lloyd in his Wealth against Commonwealth is true, he might still profitably have taken lessons by sitting at the feet of King Leopold. In justice to Mr. Rockefeller it must be said that he did not herald the foundations of his great fortune by pious declarations of a providential mission to benefit the public. The constitution of the Congo State dates from the year 1876 when King Leopold astonished every one by summoning a conference of delegates from Belgium, Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy and Russia. The object of the conference was to consider the best means to be devised in order to open up Central Africa to European civilization. The King was profuse in his declarations of disinterestedness. "Is it necessary for me to say," he asked plaintively, "that in inviting you to Brussels I have not been actuated by egotism? No, gentlemen; if Belgium is a small kingdom, Belgium is happy and contented with her lot." It was pure philanthropy, in short, and the King intimated that he was willing to spend his money freely in the great work of saving the natives of the Congo from exploitation by unscrupulous adventurers; and at the same time for guaranteeing to all the world the interior of Central Africa as a free-trade market in which they would all have a fair field and no favor. An International Association was formed for the exploration and civilization of Central Africa with King Leopold as president. The association was international in name but Belgian in reality.

For the first two years very little was done, but when the American Mr. Stanley arrived from his exploration of the Congo the King saw an opportunity for giving practical effect to the designs over which he had been brooding since the formation of the association. His first idea seems to have been to create an independent confederacy of free negroes with himself as President. He was careful to deny that he contemplated turning it into a Belgian colony. Far be it

Editor's Note—This is the fifth of Mr. Stead's papers on the Money Kings of the World.

*On this question there prevails the most extraordinary, and indeed almost inexplicable, conflict of opinion. While the British Chambers of Commerce, the British Aborigines Protective Society and the Belgium Socialists agree in declaring that the rule of the King in the domaine privé has produced the most ghastly atrocities, King Leopold has among his officials and friends those who describe him as an angel of light spreading civilization and peace throughout the heart of the Dark Continent. Mr. F. D. Morel, whose book upon the Affairs of West Africa has just been published in London, vigorously sustains the indictment against the King and declares: "The Congo State must be called to account for its crimes against civilization; for its outrage upon humanity; for the unparalleled and irreparable mischief it has committed." On the other hand, Sir H. Gilzean-Reid writes me in praise of the King in terms which would hardly be too strong if used concerning the Archangel Gabriel. So far as I can judge the weight of evidence is not in favor of the contention of Sir H. Gilzean-Reid.

from him to dream of such an evil ambition. What he wanted was the establishment of a powerful negro kingdom. The title was then changed from "International Association" to the "International Congo Association." It concluded what were called treaties with various tribes on the Congo Basin, by which it claimed to have acquired territory which to the American Government it professed to be acquired for the use and benefit of free States established and being established. The American Government recognized the United States of the Congo Association as an independent State.

This was immediately followed by a conference summoned by Prince Bismarck which met at Berlin in November, 1884, and sat till February, 1885, by which the European Powers followed the lead of the United States and recognized Leopold as Sovereign of the Congo Free State on various conditions, the first of which was that no import duties should be established at the mouth of the Congo for twenty years. As nothing was said of export duties the King gradually imposed taxes on exports varying from five to seventeen and one-half per cent. The King also promised that the State should grant no monopoly or privilege in matters of trade, and should watch over the welfare of the natives. This to the outside world was represented as the original purpose which the King had in view from the first. Territory covering a million square miles in Africa was to be reclaimed for civilization. The natives were to be protected from slave-traders, and blessed with a free government in which they should be Christianized and civilized as fast as the missionaries and traders could reach them. Above all, the whole region was to be open to all nations, who were to be allowed to compete freely with each other unfettered by hostile tariffs, and guaranteed against all competition by the State, which had voluntarily foresworn all right to trade on its own ground and was pledged to do so by the terms of the Berlin Conference.

Five months after the Berlin Conference closed the King issued the famous decree which is the foundation of his fortunes. By this he asserted rights of proprietorship over all vacant lands throughout the whole million square miles forming the Congo State. Then, by a series of subsequent decrees, all lands were declared to be vacant except those upon which the natives were actually sitting in their villages or cultivating as farms. It was asserted that by this means 800,000 square miles became the property of the State, being known as the domaine privé, which became a great field for the exploitation of Africa. The King's first great war was that which he waged against the half-caste Arabs of the Upper Congo. They had a monopoly of the ivory trade in that region and being slave-traders they were fair game. The King enlisted, armed and drilled his cannibals, with whose aid and that of the slaves made over to him by the conquered tribes he cleared out the Arabs, and got the ivory trade into his own hands. This operation lasted two years, from 1892 to 1894. Before that campaign had been begun the King had applied to the Powers in 1885 to release him from the obligation not to impose import duties, on the ground that the expense of putting down slave-trading had exhausted his resources. The representatives of the Powers met again in Brussels in 1889-1890 and permitted him to impose a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem upon all imports into the Congo. There was no doubt that up to this time the King had often been hard pressed for money. He had either invested himself or secured the investment of £500,000 before the recognition of the Congo as an international State. This, according to Mr. Stanley, he had given free of return, without any hope of return further than a mere sentimental satisfaction.

The Artful Veiling of a Sinister Purpose

In 1889, four years after the Berlin Act which is the charter of the Congo State, he made a will bequeathing to the Belgian nation all his sovereign rights in the State, and all the advantages attached to that sovereignty. In return for this Belgium advanced £200,000 at once to the Congo State, and promised a subsidy of £40,000 a year for the next ten years without interest. The King on his part promised that he would borrow no more money, and that at the end of ten years Belgium should be free to take over the State. Notwithstanding this promise the King, being in straits in 1895, borrowed £20,000 from the Bank of Antwerp. The King from his privy purse subsidized the Congo State to the extent of £40,000 a year. Notwithstanding all these subsidies and loans the Congo State has never down to the present day been able to make both ends meet. The deficit, however, was small, and it was abundantly met by the profits which the King made by exploiting the ivory and rubber of his domaine privé. The King was much too shrewd to go into the business in his own name. He only collected taxes in kind, which he did by the aid of his agents, who employed the armed forces of the State in compelling the natives to bring in a stipulated quantity of rubber and ivory. He issued a series of decrees carefully calculated to place the native population and all its belongings absolutely at his disposition. The natives were forbidden, in 1891, to kill any elephants unless they brought their tusks to the officers of the Congo State; in 1892 they were forbidden to collect any rubber unless they brought it to the officers of the Congo State; and all merchants receiving either rubber or ivory from the natives were denounced as receivers of stolen goods. By this means the State which had abjured all monopolies established a monopoly of the strictest kind.

In the collection of the rubber the greatest atrocities were habitually committed. The King's agents were officially instructed to devote all their energy to the harvesting of rubber and to proceed as far as possible by persuasion rather than by force. The methods of "persuasion" in many cases were said to have been more worthy of Bashi-bazouks in Turkey than of the representatives of a civilized and Christian association acting under the direct orders of the most Christian King, Leopold II. But grave as were the cruelties charged against the commissaires and direct agents of the State, they are thrown into the shade by the atrocities which are alleged against the agents of the commercial companies to which the King farmed out the exploitation of his domaine privé.

Evidence on these points thrives in abundance, but it is somewhat discredited by the fact that it comes in the most cases from ex-officials who, according to the employees of the King, having been dismissed, avenge themselves by calumniating their former employer. It is, however, difficult to believe that they would calumniate themselves even to spite the King.

The Jigger of Central Africa

It is hardly a sufficient answer to such accusations to say that the system which produces these atrocities has been financially most successful. No one pretends that the Congo State pays a dividend or avoids a deficit. But the companies which it has started and in whose shares it holds a fifty per cent. interest have been extraordinarily successful. It is in the creation of these companies that the financial genius of the King has been so conspicuous. The Congo State is like that well-known but most detested insect, the jigger, which burrows beneath the toe-nails. The jigger itself would do little harm. But the jigger no sooner makes its way through the skin than it proceeds to lay hundreds of eggs from which are hatched one of the most pain-producing of animated mechanisms, which if not checked will destroy the whole toe. King Leopold is the Jigger of Central Africa; the joint-stock companies to which he has farmed out the domaine privé are his eggs. It is they who do the mischief. They suck the life-blood of the natives. He exacts only fifty per cent. of their takings.

These eggs of the Belgian Jigger are five in number, in four of which the Congo State either holds shares or is entitled to fifty per cent. of the profits. In the fifth the Congo State is entitled to two-thirds of the profits.

These companies have been enormously successful. The Antwerp Society has a capital of $340,000 divided into 3400 $100 shares, of which the State—that is to say, the King—possesses 1700. Its net profits for four years (1897-1900) averaged no less than $360,000, a profit of more than 100 per cent. It is not surprising therefore that the value of the $100 share in 1900 had risen to $2700. Had the King sold out his 1700 shares in these years he would have made a profit of over $4,000,000. But the Antwerp Company is but one of the five. The market value in 1901 of the King's share in the Abir Company stood at $5,000,000. Notwithstanding the profits made by the companies to whom he has farmed out the right to exploit the riches of the domaine privé he succeeded in inducing the Belgian Government in 1901 to renew for another ten years its mortgage of $5,000,000. The proposal made that the territories of the Congo State should become the property of Belgium was indignantly rejected by the King, who threatened to ruin the State unless he were relieved from the pledge he had voluntarily given ten years before. The State therefore continues in his hands, and the companies are going on farming its resources, and will go on as long as they can exact any rubber or ivory from the people for whose protection they are supposed to exist.

According to the statements of many officers and missionaries the natives are regarded by the agents of the companies, and to a less degree by the representatives of the King, as taxable cattle and rubber collectors. The modus operandi by which they are induced to bring in the stipulated quantum of rubber is very simple. A village is ordered to produce so many baskets of rubber. If on delivery the baskets are not up to the requisite weight, or if only half the natives attend with rubber, a punitive force is sent out to burn down the village, and teach the defaulters to be more punctual, by inflicting capital punishment upon all who can be found within range of the King's rifles. As the troops employed in thus enforcing discipline and collecting taxes are to a large extent recruited from the cannibal tribes they usually better their instructions. Officers who have been employed in the State have borne public testimony to the fact that the bodies of natives slain and mutilated in such expeditions have been served out for food to the cannibals. This has been constantly asserted and often indignantly denied. Cannibalism, however, although a disgusting practice against which the gorge of civilized mankind rises, is not to be compared as a producer of human suffering to the other practices by which alone the stipulated supply of rubber can be extorted from the natives. A conference has been held this year at the Mansion House calling upon the Powers to annul the charter of the Congo State which was renewed by the Belgian Parliament in 1901. Innumerable articles have appeared in the newspapers and periodicals denouncing the conduct of the King and the system of forced labor indistinguishable from slavery that forms the basis of the prosperity of the Congo companies. Of course, the friends of the King maintain that this is only a movement to bear stocks which are at present standing at a very high figure. The $100 shares of the Congo Railway are quoted in the market at $2000. The Anglo-Belgian India-Rubber Company has paid a dividend of 100 per cent., and the dividends of the other companies vary from 30 to 80 per cent.

But even when all allowances are made for natural prejudice and trade rivalry it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the Congo State has been much more successful as a financial enterprise than as an institution for civilizing Central Africa.

The King has invested first and last about five million dollars in floating and subsidizing the parent enterprise. Upon this sum he has not received a penny dividend. But under the cover of this benevolent investment of $5,000,000 professedly spent to secure the open door to open up Africa to the free trade of all nations, he has created monopolies covering a million square miles of territory, reserving to himself a minimum of fifty per cent. of their profits. As the market value of the shares of these monopolies according to the Stock Exchange quotations of 1900 was, in two out of the five companies thus formed, over $18,000,000, the operation from the point of view of the financier must be pronounced a brilliant success. King Leopold is not a world-wide operator. He sticks to his own little patch of a million square miles. But in that small corner of the world he has won his crown as one of the most ruthless and successful of the Money Kings of the modern world.

The Most Useful Tree

OF ALL forest trees the eucalyptus is the most beneficial to mankind. The list of useful articles it furnishes to the world is almost incredible.

It is predicted by the United States Bureau of Forestry that within a few years the different varieties of eucalypts will solve the fuel problem, both in America and Europe. In the rapidity and hardiness of its growth this tree has no equal. Five years from the time of planting, groves raised from seedlings will yield seventy-five cords of stove wood an acre. Three to five years from the time of cutting, sprouts that spring from the stumps mature into trees that produce more cords to the acre than the original growth. Repeated cuttings add to the thriftiness of the eucalyptus. A period of twenty-five years will develop trees the size of oaks known to be three hundred years old. In some sections of the Southwest where oak has been nearly exhausted as fuel the eucalyptus is taking its place.

Some varieties thrive in tropical swamps; others flourish in the mountain snows far above the timber-line. To every degree of climate and condition between these extremes some species from this prolific genus is adapted. Scientists have demonstrated that eucalypts have a wonderful effect upon climate. From some of the swampy areas of Italy malaria has been banished by the growth of eucalyptus groves. This is due both to the tonic and medicinal effect of its aroma and to the tree's phenomenal capacity for absorbing water.

Notwithstanding the latter trait, however, some varieties of the blue gum will thrive on arid plains. Soil on which not even cactus will live will produce great eucalyptus trees.

The genus is invaluable as a source of timber. The uses it is put to in this regard are amazingly diverse. In Australia it is used extensively in the construction of ships, buildings, bridges, vehicles, agricultural implements, furniture, barrels, and hundreds of minor articles.

Faultless hardwood logs over two hundred feet long, twelve feet in diameter at the top and thirty feet in diameter at the base, are hewn from giant eucalypts.

It is one of the most durable of hard woods. This is a remarkable fact when the celerity of its growth is considered. In repairing a decayed pier at Santa Barbara, California, it was found that a few piles were perfectly sound. Examination disclosed that they had been hewn from eucalyptus trees.

THE STORY OF A PIRATE AND A PURITAN, A DEAL IN REAL ESTATE AND ONE IN ROMANCE

By George Hibbard

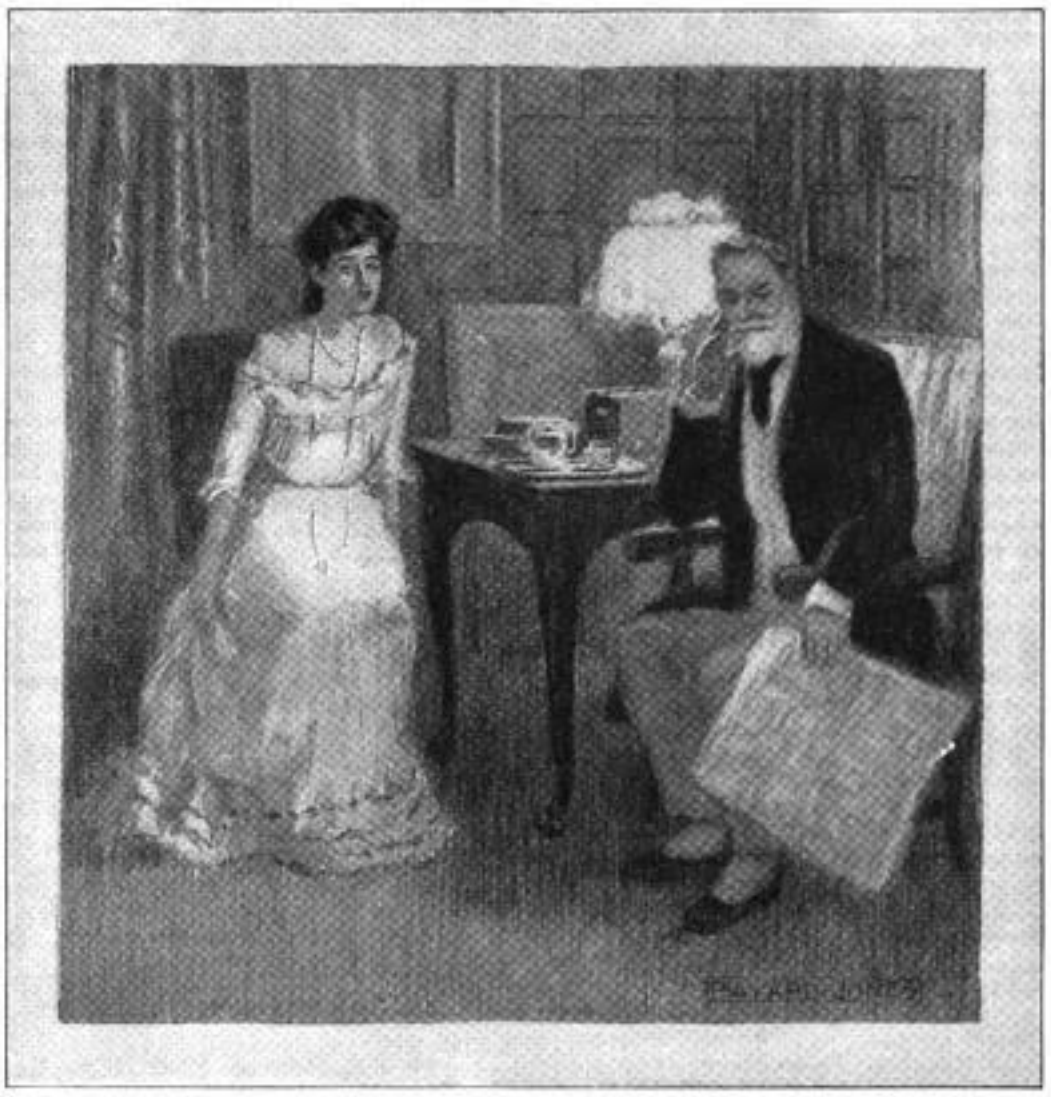
"THESE business men and these business ways," mourned Miss Julia Burnham, gazing for sympathy at her most intimate friend, Miss Brown, "and these commonplace business days!"

The most intimate friend, as she was in duty bound, looked her deep commiseration.

"No picturesqueness—no romance," complained Miss Burnham. "Nothing mysterious, nothing dramatic—nothing. It isn't fair for a girl to have to live now when nothing interesting can happen to her."

"What do you want?" asked the most intimate friend with the most flattering willingness to be instructed.

"I want some color in life—some incident—something that has some significance. But what can you expect when all the men you know think nothing but business—do nothing but business—and are nothing but business men. A girl wants to try the man who wins her—to be sure that he has at least some imagination—is capable of the finer feelings. That, in short, he is going to be able to appreciate her if there is anything in her to appreciate."



"But," remonstrated Miss Brown a little timidly in the face of such vigorous denunciation, "it isn't any worse here than in other places."

"I'm complaining of that. I'm speaking generally," Miss Burnham announced grandly. "It's so everywhere nowadays. Why, presently a man will get married quite as he eats his luncheon—just a hurried bite between two 'deals.' I'm not sure but it's that way now."

Miss Burnham wrinkled her pretty brow and glanced disconsolately out of the large library window over the spreading lawn down the drive to the great stone pillars where the wrought-iron gates hung open. Indeed her lot had been a most comfortably uncomfortable one. Never to have known a want without finding immediate gratification had resulted in a monotony that was distressing. To have had nothing but pleasant things as a daily portion had ended by making the days somewhat insipid. To have love made to her—without undue excitement—by many unexceptionable young men with whom she was perfectly at liberty to fall in love if she pleased, and to any one of whom she might even have been married without the slightest opposition, was to have the course of true love run so smoothly as to deprive it of a great deal of interest.

From the time that she had gone to her first dancing school she could not remember anything more nearly approaching a crisis than that she should be obliged to decide to which of two or more dinners she should go or with whom of two or more men she should dance a cotillon. For Miss Burnham had been the most praised and admired young woman in the large Lake city from the time she had appeared upon Alaska Avenue in her perambulator until this hour when she drove her high trap up and down it. The position of Amos Burnham—her father—president of the First National Bank, director in the Surety Trust Company, partner in the firm of Burnham, Holt & Co., and with an egg in almost every local financial basket, had at the beginning a great deal to do with her prominence. The envious—and they were singularly few—said that this was everything. But the truth was that Miss Julia Burnham's setting had very little more to do with her success than the frame with the picture. She would have won recognition and commanded admiration anywhere. She was very pretty, quick-witted, and though somewhat petulant and something spoiled, possessed of a kindly heart which led her easily to respect the prejudices of others and made her glad to be of service to them.

But this was by no means the way that she thought of herself. Her own estimate of her own character led her to consider that she was embittered by the world and cynical in the extreme. This was her only refuge and consolation in the intolerable flatness of things. So she sighed as she looked out of the window—displeased with the splendid Burnham house, displeased with even Amos Burnham himself, whom she considered a most prosaically excellent and successful person; dissatisfied with Fred Northup, the young man who was demanding her attention at that moment. How could anything "interesting" arise with the president of a bank and an active young real-estate agent and operator?

"BUT, PAPA, WHAT WERE YOU DOING?" SHE ASKED

She sighed as she sat that evening with Amos Burnham in the library while he sipped his after-dinner coffee.

"What is it, Julia?" he asked. "Can't make up your mind whether you're in love or not?"

There was a directness about her father's utterances that Julia could not help feel at times was very trying.

"Nonsense," she answered with some asperity. "It's just because everything is so tiresome."

"I know," said Burnham; "you'd like to have us all in top boots and plumed hats—a pretty figure I'd cut that way—slashing at one another when we weren't stabbing one another in the back."

"Now, you know, papa, I'm not so foolish as that."

"Aren't you satisfied with having a pirate for a father?" he growled pleasantly.

"A pirate!" she exclaimed with interest.

"That's what I'm called—even here in this newspaper," he replied. "A pirate, a shark and a good many more things."

"Really," cried Julia, brightening up, "I don't see what they can mean, but it doesn't sound commonplace."

"Oh, I'm not commonplace," Burnham assured her. "And as for the names, I've had to take a good many hard knocks in my time and given some back, so that there's naturally hard feeling."

"And have you given—hard knocks?" Julia asked.

"I've given as good as I've got every time," answered Burnham grimly.

"But just in business," she complained. "There's nothing interesting about that."

"I don't know what you call interesting," he went on.

"Nothing to give the imagination a chance," she pursued.

"Imagination!" he exclaimed. "There's as much of it in business as there is in poetry. I've had to imagine things or I couldn't accomplish them, only what I imagined turned out in dollars, not words."

"Then," she said hopelessly, "there's nothing dramatic about it. Why, there's as little chance for being involved in a plot in my life as in going downtown in a trolley car."

"Well," said Burnham, "I'd be bothered about these ideas of yours if I didn't know that you'd got some sense really. But there's interest and picturesqueness and all that, I can tell you, in business. Now take this new steel plant. Isn't that something to set you thinking? Half a dozen of us get together and in no time at all there springs up a town with streets and houses, and people in them. What's there to equal that in your romances—not to say your fairy tales?"

Julia looked pensively in the fire and admitted that it really sounded attractive.

"Where are your conspirators or even your magicians after that?" said Burnham warmly. "There's something real and practical."

"I know that the whole place is talking of it," she said. "Fred Northup said something about it to me the other day."

"Oh, Fred Northup did, did he?" asked Burnham abruptly. "You know him pretty well—see him pretty often—talk a good deal to him, don't you?"

"I take a great interest in him," said Julia with stately dignity. "And he tells me about himself and I advise him."

"You do?" said Burnham thoughtfully.

"But, oh!" cried Julia suddenly, "how can a girl be interested in a man leading such a life? A real-estate agent! Could anything be more prosaic?"

"Umph!" murmured Burnham meditatively.

"Of course, I know," Julia continued, "that he's what they call very active and enterprising, but even if he were a hero what chance could there be for him to show that he had any sensitiveness—that he was capable of loving a girl in the right way?"

A pause followed as Julia stared moodily before her.

"Ah," said Burnham wearily, "I'm tired. Tramping about the river-banks has nearly worn me out."

"Where?" asked Julia in astonishment.

"Down by the river with Dempsey at five o'clock this morning."

"Five o'clock!" cried Julia in amazement. "With Mr. Dempsey!"

"None of your conspirators could be making an earlier start than that," chuckled Burnham; "and if you had seen us you'd have thought that we were outlaws or brigands, or something that would have pleased you."

"But, papa, what were you doing?" she asked.

"I really felt like an outcast myself," he went on, "splashing about in the mud and reeds of the river."

"Papa!" cried his amazed daughter.

"I tell you down there it was lonely at that time."

Julia was gazing at her father in wide-eyed surprise when a servant entered.

"Mr. Northup," the man announced.

"I remember," she said as she sprang up; "he said that he was coming."

Burnham coughed strangely and violently.

"I think I've really taken a cold," he went on dolorously, "in those river-swamps. You might come back here when he is gone."

"I will," she cried. "What a cough you have. Sha'n't I have them send for Doctor Eaton?"

"No-no!" Burnham answered decisively. "Only come back."

"I will," she said, "just as soon as I can."

The long drawing-room was almost dark—its size being so great that the light at one end had but little strength at the other. When Julia suggested that there might be more illumination Northup objected.

"But can't you understand people better when you see them?" she asked.

"Yes," he replied; "but then darkness brings a certain confidence and one speaks more confidentially, so one comes to know people better in that way, too."

"I didn't think that you were affected by such things," she replied. "I'm sure that whether two business men were talking in the dark or the light wouldn't make any difference."

"I don't know even that," he said.

"And, of course," she went on with meaning, "there is nothing else but business."

"We're not talking business—now."

"You'd like to do it," she replied laughing.

"Do you really believe," he asked earnestly, "that I think of nothing but business?"

"I believe," she answered, "that it is much the most important thing—that you'd never let anything stand in its way—that you'd never make it subservient to anything."

"Don't you know me better than that?" he asked reproachfully, and she could feel that he was looking at her intently.

"No, I don't," she answered rather defiantly.

"But I talk to you."

"I suppose that you consider me as a vacation—a well-earned rest; but I feel that, after all, your mind is really on business. I can see how preoccupied you are to-night."

"There's a matter of great importance—for me—that is coming up for decision to-morrow. Eckert, my partner, and I hold an option on two pieces of land, and before twelve o'clock to-morrow we must decide whether to close up or to get out."

"There!" she cried in triumph, "even while you were talking to me you've been thinking of that."

"It means so much to me," he pleaded. "Fortune—at least enough to give me a start to make one. It means to be able to——"

"But it's business," she said hastily, discerning danger. "So prosaic and so uninspiring! And, oh, I am very sorry, but I am going to send you away. Papa isn't well to-night and I must go back to him."

"Really," said Northup. "He looked remarkably well this afternoon."

"Fancy a man of his age doing what he did," she exclaimed. "Going at five o'clock this morning with Mr. Dempsey and wading about in the marshes down by the river. I shall certainly scold him."

"By the river! With Dempsey!" said Northup quickly. "At five this morning!"

"Yes," she answered. "Did you ever hear of such a thing? Really, ought not I to take care of him a little better?"

"No," said Northup musingly; "no. You may be quite sure he can take care of himself. And you are certain about the river?" he insisted.

"How strange you are!" she said. "But I know that it must astonish you and I can understand that you cannot believe it. Good-night; I'm going to send you away now. I wish you could stay——"

"And talk business?"

"You admit that you do?"

"Yes," he answered boldly, "what is the greatest business of my life."

As he gathered up his hat and coat and stick from the carved chair in the hall, went out through the door that the servant held open for him, descended the broad flight of steps and passed down the walk by the side of the drive to the street, he was absolutely unconscious of all that he did. He was thinking so intently that when he found himself on the sidewalk he still held his hat in his hand. He crushed it down on his head and started forward with quick, nervous steps without heed, however, to the direction in which he was going.

Was he to find in what he had just heard the answer to the problem that had been tormenting him all day, and not only all day but for many days and nights? Did not the information conveyed by Julia settle everything? With a feeling of sudden relief and exultation he hurried on. There need be no more doubt. He could feel sure now what course to pursue.

For the past year the formation of the Sacinac Steel Company had been the most important matter in the business of the town. When men met at the club this was the subject upon which the talk ran; after every dinner when the men were left alone the topic was the one that inevitably came up. At first the question as to whether the undertaking was really to be put through was largely discussed; later when this was assured the place of building was the matter constantly under consideration. As the city lay, where the river flowed out of the Great Lake, there were two possible places for the company to go: on the river-bank below the city or on the Lake shore at a spot called Rocky Point. At one of these two places a growing town would immediately spring up, but which it should be no one could tell. And as to the facts no one of the management had given a hint. At the first news of the great undertaking Northup, acting with Eckert, had secured options on two farms near Rocky Point. The option was for four months, and both Northup and Eckert had felt that before that time something definite must be known that would enable them to decide what to do. But the weeks and months had passed and as yet nothing had come out that had made it possible for them to reach a conclusion.

On the following day at twelve the option expired. For hours during the past morning Eckert and himself had discussed the pros and cons. Should they close with the owners and take the property they would, if the company went to the river-bank, be saddled with several hundred acres of ordinary farming land. If they let it go and the Steel people should come to Rocky Point the chances of a possible small fortune would be lost.

This was the proposition that had confronted Northup and his partner for weeks and still confronted them. And now —— No one was more thoroughly in the secrets of the Steel Company than Amos Burnham. Indeed no one more fully directed its policy. And Northup had heard that at the unusual hour of five in the morning he had been prowling about the river-banks accompanied by Dempsey, the company's engineer, the man who would have all the planning of the future plant. Of course Burnham had gone at that absurd time to escape notice. Of course if he did that it was because the steel plant was going on the river. There could be no doubt about this. The attempted concealment made all certain.

By the time Northup had reached this conclusion he had arrived at the "Front"—the low bluff, a part of the Park system, overlooking the Lake. He stood gazing over the black waters to the distinct line of the horizon made by the softer darkness of the sky. The brisk breeze swept over him exhilaratingly, and he turned first to the right where the river rolled swiftly away and then to the left, looking over the gleaming lights of the city to the distant hills of the Lake shore. At last he knew what was to be done. And yet at the moment he turned away he felt a sudden uncomfortable qualm. What had caused it he could not at first tell. He felt rather the coming of future doubt than doubt itself. Then suddenly he was brought to a realization of the fact which had lain dormant in his mind all the time and had now started up and demanded recognition. Impatiently he struck the ashes from the cigar that he was smoking.

He knew at last the fact that would give him what he wanted.

But how did he know it?

From the lips of a young girl speaking unconsciously and in the freedom of a friendship so precious to him. Without knowing what she was doing she had given him information that was of inestimable value. This had been done, though, in her ignorance of business, in her girlish simplicity, and should—could—he take advantage of it? If she had understood the situation she would never have said what she did, and could he profit by her lack of knowledge? To take advantage of the chance that accident had thrown in his way would undoubtedly enable him to save a goodly sum of money. He needed it. He needed it for the accomplishment of his plans—needed it for the winning of the girl herself. And Eckert!

Was not he entitled to consideration? If he were not willing to avail himself of the information ought he not to take what advantage was to be gained from it on Eckert's account?

The reasoning was specious and for a moment Northup was almost convinced by it. But if he was willing to lose his own larger investment in the venture, was he obliged to tell the other? No; even duty to a partner did not justify a dishonorable or even a questionable act. Julia Burnham had spoken to him as a person having no interest in the affair, and self-respect compelled him to behave as if he were what she thought him. He must carefully separate the Northup who held this option on the Rocky Point lands from the Northup who was Julia Burnham's friend.

He turned toward the city and paced slowly back. He could not quite free himself from the fear that he was allowing himself to be unduly scrupulous. All would laugh at him, he knew. Amos Burnham himself, he felt sure, would be one of the first. Suppose that he were not in love with Julia, would the requirements of the situation be the same? In a moment his judgment—his taste, told him that they would be. And yet, from the point of view of the every-day business world, was he not too particular—making too fine distinctions for practical life? He inhaled the smoke from the cigar and blew it forth impatiently in a thick cloud and tramped on sullenly. To be silent would assuredly be business folly. In the day he would certainly see that. His mood now was the result of his sight of Julia—the creation of the stillness and the darkness. All would be different, he told himself, in the daytime, downtown, with the stir of active business life about him.

Eckert noticed Northup's restlessness as he faced him in the private office, but was not surprised by it. He readily ascribed it to doubt as to the decision that must be immediately made.

"It'll soon be the hour," he said, looking at his watch.

"What are you going to do?" asked Northup doggedly.

"What are you going to do?" Eckert demanded sharply. "I don't see but that you're in this even more than I am."

"Suppose I asked you to decide?" Northup said slowly.

"Decide!" exclaimed Eckert, "I've no more to go on than you have. I've been hunting everywhere and I can't get any inside information. The way those fellows have kept the thing dark is a caution. Some of them must want to buy themselves. They haven't let out anything on which a man can reach a judgment."

"They've certainly tried not to do it," answered Northup uncertainly.

"I haven't any more reason for following one course than the other. It's just a toss-up. Shall we close with them or let this go?"

"It's just as you say," Northup answered sullenly.

"What's the matter?" cried Eckert. "I've never seen you like this before. Generally you've a mind of your own and something to spare."

"You say what is to be done," insisted Northup desperately.

"Somebody's got to say something," Eckert retorted as he glanced at the telephone. "And pretty quick, too. I'd better call them up and tell them we're coming. If I can tell them what we are going to do at the same time so much the better. There aren't many minutes left."

"I can't say," Northup answered; "I leave it entirely to you. Do what you think best."

"You mean you won't," said Eckert angrily.

"Yes," said Northup firmly. "I mean that I won't if you'll have it that way."

Eckert turned away from the telephone.

"What shall I say?" he demanded.

Northup was silent.

"Have you lost your mind or your nerve?" Eckert asked.

"Do what you please," Northup called, moving toward the door as if to escape.

"I've got to," said Eckert in dismay as he took up the receiver. "Give me Huron 1232." He turned toward Northup, who stood by the door. "Can't you speak?"

"No," said Northup with a short laugh; "that's just what I can't do."

"Yes!" called Eckert through the telephone. "Is that you? Is that you, Mr. Beesley? I'm going to come to see you. What are we going to do? I'll tell you when I come," he fairly shouted. "I'll be there for the final arrangements."

As Eckert turned away from the instrument the door closed and he found that he was alone.

Late that night Northup sat in the office-like library of his bachelor apartment. During almost the entire evening he had walked the floor and it was with real weariness that he had thrown himself into a chair. The hour was so advanced that little was moving in the street and the house was absolutely still. He was surprised, therefore, to hear a sudden step in the hall and a hasty knock at his door. As he called out, Eckert burst into the room. He was in evening dress and in his impetuosity a flower fell from the buttonhole of his coat. That he was too excited for utterance was manifest and he stood for a moment silent before Northup, struggling with his feelings.

"What did you mean?" he gasped at length. "Know the whole thing and let me do what I did—know that they were going to put the plant on the river and let me take the land at Rocky Point. *What do you mean, I say?"

"You have evidently heard something," observed Northup, who had regained his composure.

"I have—in a queer way," Eckert responded, "but I've heard it. I've just come from calling on Miss Brown."

"Oh!" exclaimed Northup with meaning.

"On Miss Brown," repeated Eckert with apparently increased anger. "She told me what Miss Burnham had told her—how old Burnham has been spending his mornings. It also came out that Miss Burnham was much impressed by your interest and spoke to her friend about it. Now you must have known—must have seen that after that there was no more chance of the company's going to Rocky Point than to the moon. And yet you've let us take this land that's only good to raise potatoes. How do you explain it?"

"Simply I didn't like to use—couldn't use, in fact—information obtained in that way."

"Why didn't you tell me not to do this?" thundered Eckert.

"As I say," replied Northup quietly, "I couldn't put Miss Burnham in the place of an unconscious spy on her father."

"You're a fool," cried Eckert. "You're every kind of a fool!"

"Perhaps," answered Northup. "That's the way I have looked at it at times myself."

"And with your Quixotic nonsense we've got the land on our hands. It's a white elephant."

"Still, I suppose that a white elephant has some value. We can't lose much at the price we gave."

"Lose!" raged Eckert. "Not lose much! To lose anything's the point! When we bought only to make all there was a chance of making! When we don't want it! When it ties up the money! And all for your folly—your idiocy."

"Call me all the names you like," said Northup. "I've called myself the same. But still, I couldn't do it. I confess that I tried, but I couldn't. It seemed like sneaking spoons off the Burnham table."

"It isn't business," complained Eckert.

"I don't suppose it is," responded Northup, "but it was what seemed to me—decent."

"Since when have you had such ideas?" sneered the other.

"I hope I've always had them, and that I shall always. See here, it isn't as if I didn't lose as much as you do."

"Oh, you've paid the price of your nonsense, I admit."

"Well, then! Would you have had me read a letter of Burnham's if it had fallen into my hands and I knew that it contained the information that we wanted? This is very much the same thing, to my mind."

"He'd be the first to tell you that you had been an idiot."

"Perhaps—yes," said Northup; "but that is irrelevant."

"Well," exclaimed the other, gazing in amazement at his partner, "you beat me!"

He stood for a moment in silence, then flung himself impatiently out of the room as if undecided what to do—as if unable even to decide just what to think.

On the following evening Julia again occupied the big chair in the library on the other side of the fireplace from her father. Generally at this time, as he drank his coffee, she regaled him with the doings of the day, but on this occasion she sat with her chin in her hand and gazed silently and pensively at the leaping blaze.

"What is it?" Burnham asked, unaccustomed to such quiescence in his impetuous daughter.

"I've made a discovery," she said.

"Ah," he murmured comfortably.

"I've found out that I've made a mistake."

"And it's rather given you a set-back," he chuckled. "Well, my dear, we all make mistakes, and such is our confidence in our own absolute wisdom that it rather has that effect on all of us."

"Do you remember," she asked, "that I complained the other night about business and business men? I said that it destroyed the finer feelings if a man ever had any, and that anyway a business man never had the chance to show them."

"Yes," assented her father.

"Very well," she went on, speaking with greater swiftness, "I find I'm wrong. Completely wrong. I've just learnt of something as high-minded, as delicate-minded as anything in romance."

"Who's the man?" asked Burnham placidly.

"It's Mr. Northup," she answered readily.

"Northup?" Burnham repeated, looking up more interestedly.

"Do you remember what you told me about being down on the river-bank at five in the morning—and my being afraid that you would have a cold, which I was surprised to find that you didn't have at all the next morning?"

"Yes," said her father.

"Well," she went on, "I didn't know that it meant anything, and I told Mr. Northup."

"You did?" said Burnham, his eyes twinkling and the corners of his mouth twitching. "Ah!"

"I find that it meant a great deal. That with a Mr. Eckert he had an option, as it is called, on a great deal of land near a place called Rocky Point. If the Steel Company went there they would make a good deal of money."

"And you told him," said Burnham, laughing loudly.

"Yes," she answered. "And now I find that your being where you were that morning meant that the plant was going on the river. That the land at Rocky Point had no value."

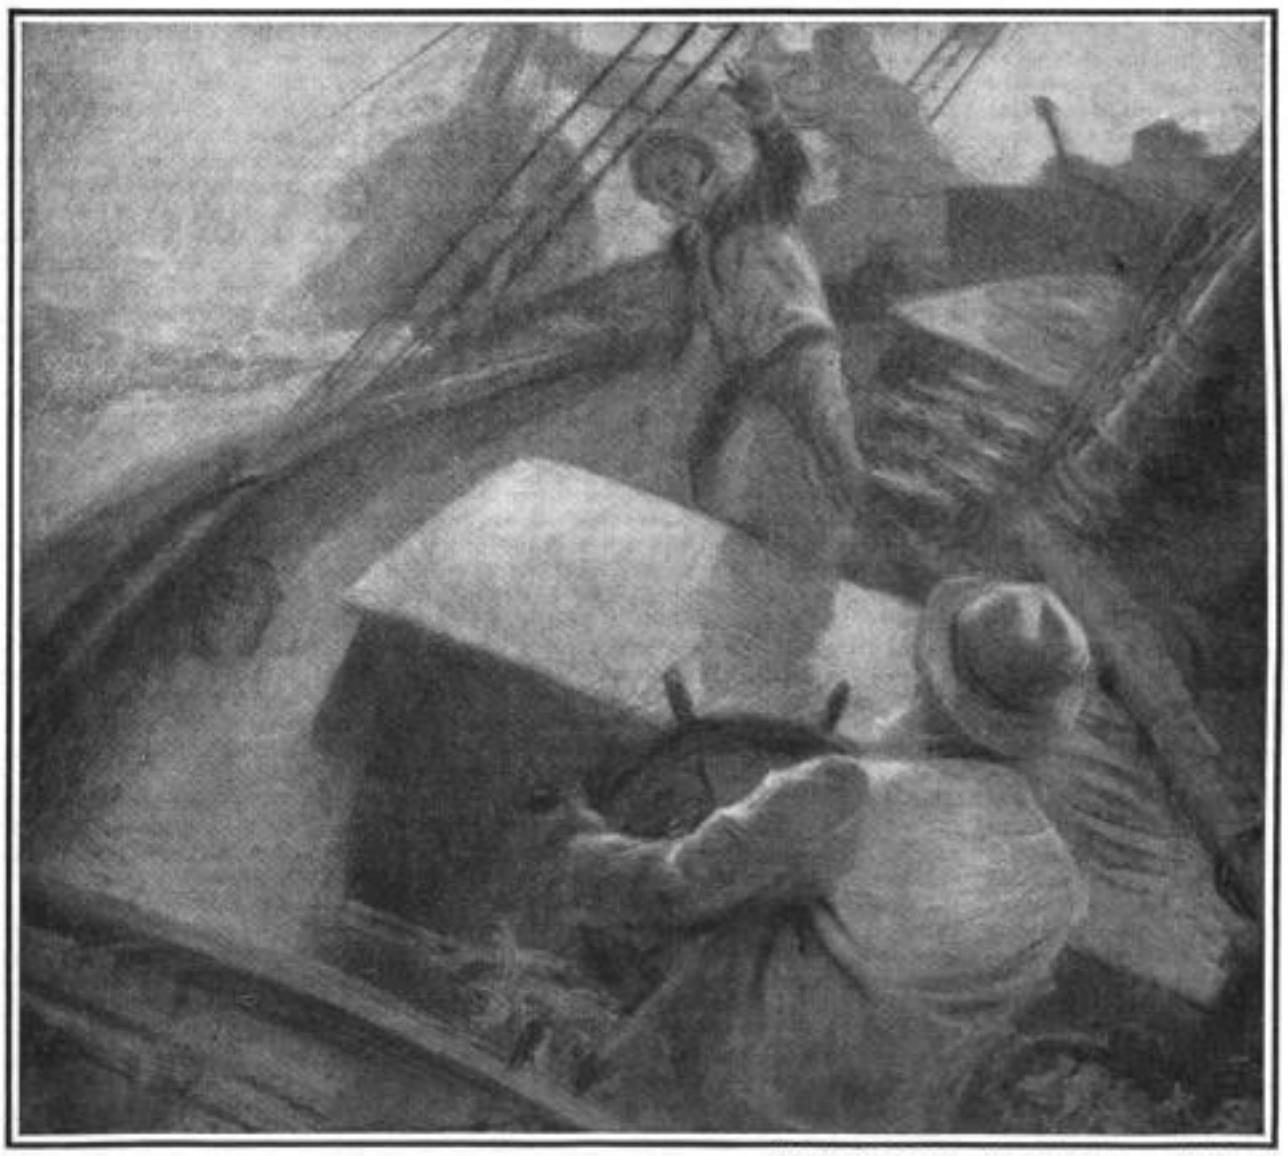
Courage and Cowardice Afloat



By MORGAN ROBERTSON

COURAGE BORROWED AND COURAGE BORN. THE COURAGE OF THE CAPTAIN WHO GOES DOWN WITH HIS SHIP AND OF THE SAILOR WHO STANDS BY FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN

A LARGE majority of people, if called upon for an opinion, would unhesitatingly declare that sailors possess courage, basing their belief upon the known dangers of a life at sea. They would aver that a man who, voyage after voyage, trusts his life to frail plank and rotting rope could not be a coward, no matter what the form that danger may take. Yet they read, occasionally, of a whole crew of sailors meekly submitting to ill-treatment from officers that would rouse ordinary men to fury, and, less frequently, of disgraceful panic in time of wreck that would not be predicated of school children; and reading thus they wonder what manner of sailors were these.

But there is nothing in the apparent incongruity to cause wonder. The man who will quietly accept a knock-down from an officer is the same man who will—provided he is really a sailor—lie out on an icy foot-rope with the ship rolling yardarms under in the effort to save some rags of canvas for the owner, and who will volunteer to man an oar in a tumultuous sea that has brought menace of death to others no weaker than himself. The reason is that his courage—or the brand of courage that he uses at sea—is acquired; and the kind that may be born in him, which would impel him to resent a knock-down on shore, and which most people recognize as the real and only courage, he reserves for use in the watch below, or retires from its place as useless in his business—provided, again, that he is a sailor. Many a master spirit in forecastle friction plays a lesser part in the work on deck and aloft.

Courage is popularly considered as of two kinds, moral and physical. A better classification is temperamental and acquired; for the moral kind and the physical kind may be born in a man, and if not, may be acquired. Or, if one is inherent and the other absent in a man's nature, circumstances may suppress the kind in evidence and create and develop the kind that is absent; and it is also possible that circumstances may be such as utterly to crush the spirit of a natural-born master of men, and at the same time develop in a mental and physical weakling forces that will make him a hero. An illustration of this is an experiment once made by a dog-fancier with an inquiring mind, who selected two of a litter of bull terriers—of brute and human creation the highest endowed with inherent physical courage—alike in markings, habits and disposition, and sequestered them. When of fighting weight and age he put them to battle with their kind. One he placed before an antagonist whom he could surely conquer, the other before one who would surely conquer him. Of course, the victorious brother remained sprightly and optimistic, while the other was subdued and deferential. Carefully judging of breed, pedigree and record the owner selected antagonists for his dogs to the end that one might always win and the other always lose, and before either dog had passed the prime of canine life had developed the favored brute into a strenuous creature that would fight a whirling wagon-wheel, and the other into an abject wretch that would not face an angry or frightened cat. Yet these two brutes, born of the same mother, and too low in the organic scale to be influenced by ethical considerations, came into the world equally endowed.

There is a third, or we might say a fifth, kind of courage, much in evidence in all parts of land and sea, eminently practicable while it lasts, but of no permanent or constitutional value—Dutch courage. It can take the place and perform the part of all other kinds, but can be included with none. It stands alone, and while it lives asks little of temperament or experience.

Perhaps the best definition of courage—the most inclusive—ever devised was given by Emerson, who called it "equality to the problem before us." This covers not only temperamental and acquired courage, but the classifications of these known as moral and physical, and almost covers the isolated, but temporarily practical, Dutch courage.

The Sailor's an Acquired Courage

Though the fighting man-of-war's-man may be given a fillip of Dutch courage on the eve of an emergency, the merchant sailor must depend upon his natural forces. Liquor is sometimes served out to sailors, but always when the strain is over, to prevent the physical reaction following an all-night struggle with thrashing canvas. Indeed, there are few emergencies in his life at sea wherein stimulants would aid the sailor, even though they could be foreseen in time. His courage is the courage of endurance, of submission, of devotion to the seafaring ethics. This courage is acquired, step by step, as he learns his trade, and stimulants before a hard drill at shortening sail would not increase it; on the contrary, acting on his usually empty stomach, they would impair his efficiency by rendering him careless, and possibly rousing what he may possess of temperamental courage, which is not of service to himself or the ship.

A temperamentally brave man is out of place in the forecastle. A few there are of such men—reckless, roving and uneducated—who, held by a love of the sea, spend their lives before the mast, continually at swords-points with the mates, deserting at every opportunity and seldom seeing a pay-day; but as a rule, such men, if they do not soon become officers, will dare any poverty and privation ashore to escape the rigors of a life before the mast. Nearly all of the sailors who man the merchant ships of the world are men of initially weak character and very often of initially weak bodily frame, who lack the intelligence, education, ambition or nerve to try their fortunes at a better calling. So they have remained in an environment which kills them, on an average, in twelve years, but develops a strength of body and mind along certain lines that is marvelous to a landsman.

Pulling ropes, scrubbing decks and climbing aloft make up an excellent system of physical culture, and a few years of it, with the necessarily deep breathing of pure air incidental to his exertions, give the sailor a chest expansion and physique that an athlete might envy. And a landsman, observing his massive shoulders and big arms knotted with muscles, and watching him as he dances aloft in the darkness to muzzle by sheer strength a thrashing sail whose flapping can be heard over the roar of the storm, will wonder why this brave man submits to insult and abuse from officers and to robbery from crimps. But an athlete or anatomist might lessen his wonder by pointing out that though his arm is big it is big with the pulling muscles alone: the pushing and striking muscles are but normal; and that though his chest expansion is great there is but little of muscular sheathing to it. A sailor cannot strike a hard straight-out blow, but in a rough-and-tumble fight would have a fair chance with a small-sized bear—provided, of course, that he had enough of temperamental courage to enter the contest.

In this argument no reference is intended to the sailors of the coasting or the Lake trade. These men take to the life because they have the temperamental courage and liking for it, and this courage remains with them, there being nothing in the milder discipline of schooners to take it out of them. They will risk their lives in a tussle with the elements and their skins in a scrap with the mate—and be ready next time. Should they sign in a deep-water ship, however, being intelligent, self-respecting men, the temperamental courage would conflict with the acquired, and they would meet trouble.

Self-preservation is the first law of Nature, and in time of danger the dominant impulse in every human mind is to take the action that will lead to safety; and no temperamental courage ever born in a man will avail him at the last moment of defeat, when the next move is the passage into the Unknown. The courage that will help a man to die is acquired, and who will say that it is not the highest form—far above the temperamental courage of the bulldog who will fight for the love of fighting, and go down to ignominious defeat when the opponent is stronger. The bulldog has his parallel among men—restless, combative, high-spirited souls who eagerly seek and thoroughly enjoy friction with others of their kind or with circumstances. But how absurd and ridiculous their position when they meet their match and are defeated.

The captain who goes down with his ship lacks the moral courage to face the consequences of his mistake, but he possesses physical courage—and most of it acquired—of the highest degree. From a strictly common-sense viewpoint it seems a useless sacrifice that a life so rich in experience with sea and storm, of courage and skill so rare and so painfully acquired, which has thoroughly solved a problem that it will never need to solve again—for no captain makes the same mistake twice—must be snuffed out forever to escape public sentiment. But public opinion that will exalt a hero to the skies to-day and cover him with ridicule to-morrow has little of common-sense in its make-up, and its punishment is so severe that no captain need be blamed if he chooses death now, in the present, to a later and inevitable death after a period of obloquy and reproach. Admiral Tryon is spoken well of to-day when mentioned. What would have been his position in English society and before the world had he chosen to save himself after the mistaken order which sent his ship, the Victoria, to the bottom with most of her crew? Would there be a door open to him? Would there be a hand extended from an officer of the army or navy of England?

Moral courage is admirable and produces splendid results; but it is the courage of inaction and has little popularity at sea, or in any other sphere where action and effort are required of men. Temperamental courage is of avail only when the sailor has risen to a directive position; before that it is a hindrance, a nuisance, and is not encouraged. Acquired physical courage alone is wanted, and that of the best quality.

Obey Orders and Sink Owners

A young sailor known to the writer was one of a crew of four men and two mates in a schooner running down Lake Ontario in a December gale, bound for Oswego. All hands were exhausted by a similar run down Lake Erie and the man-killing work of taking the schooner through the Welland Canal. They labored the first part of the night in snugging down to close-reefed foresail, staysail and jib, and at midnight, the wind, but little short of a hurricane, with occasional snow squalls and the deck and running gear clogging with ice, the captain decided not to try the dangerous port of Oswego, but to scurry across the Lake and make Cape Vincent at the head of the St. Lawrence River. He had logged the schooner to abreast of Big Sodus, thirty miles above Oswego, and from here the course to the passage east of the Gallou Islands was north-northeast. They jibed the foresail, shifting the cargo with the first lurch the schooner gave, and the young fellow, whose "wheel" it was from twelve to two took it and steered this course. It was all hands on deck or below that night, for there being nothing out but their own craft at that time of year, the usual lookout was dispensed with. The course set, the captain went below; the two mates came aft, one by one, peered into the binnacle, and went forward to the warm forecastle where the other three men had preceded them. The young sailor, not knowing that he was the only man on deck, steered on through the darkness and snow, with but an occasional peep from the binnacle into the blackness ahead and to windward. The seas yawed the schooner two points each way from the course, but he was a helmsman and "made the course good"—north-northeast. The time slipped by, and, half-frozen from his hips down but perspiring above, he began to wonder if it was not four bells when he would be relieved. He looked less at the binnacle and more into the storm and forward along the deck. At last he saw a figure mounting the fore-rigging—just a blot of blacker darkness against the background of night. Then there came a hail:

"Land ho-o-o-o! Land under the bows. Hard up your wheel!"

He knew the voice—the voice of one of the crew, a competent first mate who had shipped before the mast for this last run down the Lakes to his home, who had grown nervous in the forecastle with all hands below, and had come up of his own accord to look for the land that he knew must be close. But the order to "hard up" was from one without authority, and the young fellow did not respond until, blinking the glare of the binnacle from his eyes, he looked himself and saw the land—a low stretch of shore with trees that looked like bushes. Then he took the matter upon himself; when he looked again at the compass the schooner was two points off, and he let her swing while he crept around forward of the wheel and plunged his rubber boot through the cabin window. By the time he had regained his position abaft the wheel she was heading east, and before the skipper reached the deck in response to the crashing glass she headed east-southeast, away from any land in the vicinity. Then the others appeared on deck forward, running about, and yelling response to, and comment on, the descending lookout's information that there was land ahead. By this time the land was on the weather quarter, and they looked in vain for it ahead. Then the foresail caught aback, parted the foreboom guy, and jibed over their heads with a crash that only increased their bewilderment. Then one of the mates called out an order which might have been born of any vagrant and impromptu thought in his brain: "Keep her off." And the young fellow at the wheel, who had steadied the schooner at east-southeast, answered—and steered on.

They soon realized the situation, and the indignant captain and mates came aft to inquire, not why he had broken the cabin window, but why he had changed the course. The man who had seen the land and called out, having done his part, remained forward, and the helmsman defended himself as he could under his limitations. He knew he had done right, for he knew by this time that the land was Yorkshire Island, a small islet to the east of the Gallous, and that a vessel striking the south side of it in that sea would be washed off to the eastward and founder in deep water. And he knew that he had done wrong in changing the course without orders. Had he been a beginner at the trade he might have claimed credit for saving their lives; had he been longer at it he might have held on to the fatal course, and awaited orders. As it was with him he declared vehemently that some one had "sung out" to keep her off, and he had done so. Which was true in a transpositional sense. They were not very angry with him, but the blowing-up he received discouraged him. Later, he saw that islet in daytime, and averred that the schooner could not have gone on five minutes longer before striking.

When Panic Strikes the Passengers

There is another factor in the problems sailors are called upon to "be equal" to that is canceled painfully, and often never—inherent fear of some one particular thing or condition. All of us are born with some such weakness—the writer confesses to a congenital fear of the law—and all of us know the difficulty in overcoming it. A sailor has his pet fear, or aversion, like the rest of us; but if it conflicts with his usefulness he must overcome it—or, as Mark Twain did with his conscience, bring it under control—and if he lives long enough, he will. A big, burly, red-headed Irishman, a fine sailor and natural fighter, once shrieked in pitiable terror when the writer—a boy at the time—suddenly placed a trapped rat under his nose. Twenty years later the two met, and the Irishman told how a subsequent long passage in an empty grain ship, during which the starved rats entered the forecastle in quest of food, cured him of the weakness, which was inherent and all-possessing from his infancy up to this passage. Some men are born with an intense fear of falling, others with the same fear of drowning—for not all sailors can swim. They conquer these fears little by little, as they learn the strength of rope, deck-fittings and the grip of their fingers. The most unpromising case of all, perhaps, is that of the man born with the fear of pain; for this man shrinks from work which is painful, and seldom progresses. The man who "does not know what fear means" never existed in fact. Every human mind fears the unknown, the untried, the unsolved; and to the extent that he masters his fear at a critical time is he considered brave or cowardly.

Mention was made at the beginning of the unreasonable panic of sailors during steamship wrecks, when women and children are thrust away from boats that strong men may be saved. With a full understanding of the contagion of fear and the irresponsibility of the mob-mind, the writer does not hesitate to declare that no trained able seaman ever took part in such a rush. These rushes are invariably started by outpouring stokers and coal-passers, and by such passengers as Yussuf, the Terrible Turk (who, with a twelve-inch knife, fought his way to the boats of the Bourgogne)—strong, brave men these in their own line, but frenzied cowards and murderers when confronted with new conditions; and if any man shipped as a sailor follows such an example, he is surely of the calibre and requirements demanded of the writer when once he applied to a liner's first officer for a berth in the liner's forecastle. Waving away the proffered "discharges," or credentials, as able seaman, the officer said airily: "Any kind of a deck hand'll do here. Go and get your dunnage."

Mechanical Rope-Climbing

BY MEANS of a recently perfected device it is now as easy to climb a rope as it is for a lineman to ascend a pole.

In many of the building trades it is frequently impracticable or difficult to handle a swing-staging. In all such exigencies the rope-climbing device will be a great advantage. The invention consists of hinged clamping members which grapple the rope. The lower ends of the device terminate in peddlelike attachments which extend horizontally. To the outer ends of these standards are pivoted foot-plates.

The operator fastens his feet to the plates by means of straps. By separating and extending his feet the other ends of the forked device are opened and the whole contrivance is free to slide on the rope. The climber supporting his weight with his arms slides the clamps up or down by a simple movement of his legs. Then bringing his weight to bear on the feet supports, the jaws or clamps of the contrivance are brought securely against the rope and will stay rigidly in that position, easily sustaining as much weight as the rope itself can bear. Now the operator may stand upright and perform any work such as painting or hammering. Then when he wishes to climb higher he takes a second hold of the rope, moves his legs outwardly again, thereby releasing the hold of the clamps upon the rope, and is ready for another movement either upward or downward.

THE MAN WITHOUT A "PULL"

OPPORTUNITIES AND ABILITIES THAT HAVE MADE THE YOUNGEST ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

MR. ROBERT B. ARMSTRONG AT HIS DESK IN THE TREASURY

By Harold Bolce

NINE years ago Robert B. Armstrong, who has been named to succeed General O. L. Spaulding as Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury, entered a newspaper office in Ames, Iowa, to ask for a chance to work.

"We don't need any more help in this shop," was the proprietor's response.

"But I need breakfast; I'll work hard all morning for it," said the youth.

The editor had heard similar appeals and thought at first that the applicant was one of the nomadic improvidents that occasionally besieged the office.

"If that's all you want," said the editor, "you can have breakfast, but we haven't any work for you."

The young man flushed. "I need something to eat," said he, "but I can't accept it unless you let me work for it."

Here was a type the editor had not encountered. "Let me see," he observed, "aren't you one of the students of the State College here? How comes it that you are under the necessity of working for a meal?"

Mr. Armstrong explained that he had had the misfortune to fall sixty feet through an unfinished floor in one of the college buildings, and had finally emerged from the hospital with no funds to renew his course at school. "I'm broke," he added, "hungry, out of work, with few clothes, and a long distance from my base of supplies. You must admit that my catalogue of troubles is almost complete. The least that you can do for me, I think, is to let me work until noon for my breakfast."

"All right," said the editor, more impressed than he cared to admit; "go ahead, if you can find anything to do around the shop."

The editor of that paper was Hon. G. Hardin of the Ames Times. Under his direction Mr. Armstrong learned to set type, to ink rollers, to perform with fidelity the various other obligations of a printer's devil, and finally rose to a salary of eight dollars a month and board.

When the Printer's Devil Got Out the Paper

In May following, one year from the time of his start in the office, a circus came to that section of Iowa. The proprietor happened to be away in another part of the State. In the absence of authority and in the presence of so spectacular a lure, the editor and printers escaped from the office drudgery and hied themselves to the performance. The distractions of the big tents delayed them longer than they had intended. The time for publication for the little daily drew near. Fortunately for the paper the young man Armstrong had resolutely set his face against the circus. Unaided, he composed and set up the editorial page, rustled up the news—which included a fine account of the circus, the magnificence of which he accepted on faith—printed the paper and, taking the list of subscribers in his pocket, started out with a horse and buggy and delivered the edition.

When the editor returned and discovered that the reputation and business integrity of his publication had been preserved by his printer's devil, he raised Mr. Armstrong's wages to fifteen dollars a month and board, and made him associate editor. Shortly afterward, as a further reward, he furnished the young man with transportation and expenses to the World's Fair in Chicago and thus afforded him the first opportunity he had of traveling out of his native State.

Naturally, the story of the fidelity of the printer's devil who had stoically abstained from going to the circus in order to bring out his employer's paper attracted considerable State attention. Mr. Armstrong was offered a position in the business office of the Des Moines News at eight dollars a week. This offer he accepted. He had not been at work long before he came across an interesting news story which he wrote up and carried to the editorial rooms. It was accepted and played up conspicuously on the first page. Thereupon he applied for a position as reporter. He was told that he could have a job but at two dollars a week less than he was receiving in the business office. As he was working for the future he took it.

This paper shortly afterward suspended publication and with others he applied for a position on the Des Moines Leader. The editor of the Leader received him cordially enough, and in the course of conversation offered him a cigarette. "I don't smoke them," said Mr. Armstrong. "Good," replied the editor; "in that case you go to work to-morrow."

Before long the News was reorganized and Mr. Armstrong was offered the city editorship. While in that position the Chicago and Northwestern Railway ran the first fast mail across Iowa. Mr. Armstrong took a corps of photographers and artists to Chicago and wrote up the trip. The article was unusually thorough and attracted the attention of the editor of the Chicago Record.

"You have interested me," he wrote to Mr. Armstrong, "and made me read your article clear through. If you can have that effect on a newspaper man you ought to be able to get up stuff that would be valuable to our readers. I therefore offer you a position on the Record."

At the expiration of his contract with the Des Moines News Mr. Armstrong went on the Chicago Record. He was not there long before he was chosen out of a staff of fifty men to take charge of the Eastern business of the paper with headquarters at New York. When the Chicago Record and the Herald consolidated, the New York Herald offered Mr. Armstrong a position, first sending him to Europe to get a general view of world affairs and then placing him in charge of the Chicago office of that paper.

Before Mr. Armstrong went to New York and after his return to Chicago as manager, in that city, of the New York Herald bureau, he frequently had occasion to go to Iowa to interview the chief executive. Governor Shaw found him trustworthy and a young man of unusual discernment.

Mr. Armstrong's Start in Washington

In making Mr. Shaw Secretary of the Treasury President Roosevelt had two important objects in mind. First, he wanted a banker capable of maintaining the stability of the nation's finances, and second, it was the President's firm belief that the far-reaching plans he had devised for modernizing governmental methods of transacting business would be worked out in the Treasury Department in a masterly way by the man who had had a significant part in building up a Western commonwealth.

It was not long after Mr. Shaw had accepted the Treasury portfolio that he realized that he had assumed the management of one of the biggest institutions of the world, and that he needed as private secretary a man capable of grasping the enormous details of the Department. Nor was it long before Mr. Shaw discovered opportunities for great reforms in the Treasury. "I want," said he, "as my secretary that young newspaper man who used to interview me in Iowa. He has the most up-to-date and progressive nature of any young fellow of my acquaintance."

A telegram was accordingly sent to Mr. Armstrong. He resigned his position in Chicago paying him considerably more than the private secretaryship and went to Washington.

From the day of his entry into Treasury circles he has instituted numberless innovations; but, although he has revolutionized the workings of the Department, he has done it with such tact that instead of arousing enmity he has enlisted the coöperation of the very men whose age-worn methods he has supplanted.

Mr. Armstrong, working in conjunction with Assistant Secretary Ailes, learned that on an average 3,000,000 letters were received annually by the Treasury Department, or nearly 10,000 every business day, and that though these came in with overwhelming promptness they went out, in many instances, at the belated pace of the days of stage-coach and post-rider. Here were opportunity and demand for new methods. This great bulk of incoming mail, weighing on an average 1000 pounds a day, or 150 tons a year, was a burden which overstrained the unwieldy machinery of Treasury methods.

In the matter of telegrams Mr. Armstrong found equal necessity for a better system. The Treasury building was connected by wire with the outer world, but the Department was satisfied to get no messages over its own wire, depending on messenger boys from the central offices. The Treasury structure is a vast pile, with long, dim corridors and hundreds of rooms, and it was not an infrequent thing for messenger boys to wander from room to room and floor to floor, carrying messages that should have been received instanter by the official whom they had such difficulty in finding. Often it took longer for the messenger boy to carry a telegram from the central office to the missive's destination in the Treasury building than it required to transmit it to Washington from San Francisco, London, Paris, or even from Manila.

A thorough investigation was instituted. Mr. Armstrong determined that telegrams should come direct to the Department and from the Department be replied to.

The President's Influence in the Departments

It was included in Mr. Armstrong's program, fully indorsed by Secretary Shaw, that every one of the 10,000 letters received daily should be replied to or at least acknowledged on the day of its arrival. This is now done. A system was devised whereby all letters go to one desk. There they are opened immediately and distributed to the various divisions to which they are destined. Treasury messengers wait in readiness to travel at a rapid gait. Just before a letter is handed to a messenger it is stamped with an electric time stamp which connects with a central clock run by electricity, which records on the document or letter the time to a minute at which it arrives at or leaves a room.

Secretary Shaw's estimate of Mr. Armstrong is very high, and the Secretary adds that the up-to-dateness which has been wrought in Treasury administration has been effected by carrying out programs inspired by the President. Mr. Shaw, enjoying the confidence of Mr. Roosevelt, was appointed to the Treasury portfolio to execute reforms which had been planned by the President. Therefore the Secretary's assignment of duties to Mr. Armstrong and others has been in keeping with the purposes of the White House.

The Secretary is gratified over the coöperation of his Assistant Secretaries—Spaulding, Taylor and Ailes. Other Treasury lieutenants, including bureau chiefs and thousands of clerks, have also worked faithfully to bring about the improvements which the President has desired.

Mr. Armstrong and Assistant Secretary Ailes, who have had most to do with the personnel of the Department, say that the realization on the part of the departmental workers that they are executing not only the orders of Secretary Shaw but of the President of the United States as well has imparted to their activities, as it has to much of the industry in official Washington, a dignity and seriousness of purpose which individual effort could not assume. Similar testimony comes from other Departments. All the Cabinet officials say that Mr. Roosevelt, as no other President before him, has breathed his individuality into the Departments.

Naturally, the work of Mr. Armstrong in assisting to bring about the modernizing of the Treasury Department in keeping with the plans of the President has pleased the Administration.

The new Assistant Secretary was born in Iowa in 1873, which makes him nearly thirty years of age.

"Something has been said of his youth," observed a Senator who believes in the young man. "Hamilton was only two years older when he took complete charge of the Treasury, and Pitt was only twenty-three when he became Chancellor of the British Exchequer."

MR. HOLLISTER

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS — Miss Catherine Hollister has just found her own mind. She discovers that Lord Frothingham, to whom she is secretly engaged, is really not the man, and she has intimated as much to her mother. That lady is of a very different opinion and has immediately instituted steps to put her wishes into instant effect. As for Frothingham, he is as yet quite unconscious of his doom. So far his trip has been pleasant and bright with the prospect of early hopes. Honoria Longview, a steamer friend, has undertaken the management of his game, and to both of them it has seemed a mate for the attack in the opening.

VI — Continued

CATHERINE went to change her dress and then searched for Frothingham. He was alone in the billiard-room, half asleep on one of the wall lounges. At sight of him — she saw him before he saw her — her courage wavered. Yes, he was a decent sort of chap; and she was treating him badly, despicably — had bargained fairly with him, had used the contract publicly to aggrandize herself at his expense, was about to break her contract and humiliate him, and injure him, through no fault of his. He had been fair with her, she had been false with him, was about to be base. "I can't," she said to herself. "At least, not in cold blood."

He saw her, and his face lighted up. She smiled, nodded, hurried through the billiard-room and disappeared into the hall beyond. As she turned its angle her knees became shaky and her face white. Then Wallingford suddenly appeared at the conservatory door. He came toward her as if he were going to pass without stopping. But he halted.

"Well?" he said.

She leaned against the wall. Her throat was dry and her eyelids were trembling.

"What is it?" he asked gently.

She hung her head.

"Don't be afraid to say it to me," he urged. "There isn't anything you couldn't say to me."

"Do you — do you — do you care for me?" she said in a queer little choked, squeaky voice.

He laughed slightly and came close to her and looked down at her. "You're the only thing in all this world I do care for," he said. "Why?"

"Oh, nothing — don't follow me," and she darted back toward the billiard-room.

Frothingham was still there, seated now at the open fire. "Ah — you! I'm glad you've come back," he drawled.

"I want you to release me from my engagement," she said.

His jaw dropped and he stared stupidly at her. He could hardly believe that this impetuous, energetic creature was the languorous, slightly affected, dreamy Catherine.

"I mean it," she sped on. "I've no excuse to make for myself. But I can't marry you. And you ought to be glad that you're rid of me."

Her tone instantly convinced him that he was done for. He turned a sickly yellow and put his head between his hands and stared into the fire. His brain was in a whirl. "Just my rotten luck," he muttered.

"I don't hope that you'll forgive me," she was saying. "You couldn't have any respect for me. I'm only saving a few little shreds of self-respect. I'm ——"

"You mustn't do it, Catherine. You mustn't, you ——" he interrupted, rising and facing her.

"I must be free. I care for some one else. Don't discuss it, please. Just say you let me go."

"It ain't right." Cupidity and vanity were lashing his anger into a storm. "You can't go back — you've gone too far. Why, we're as good as married."

"Don't make me any more ashamed than I am," she pleaded humbly.

"No, I can't release you," he said with cold fury. "I can't permit myself to be trifled with." He knew that he was taking the wrong tack, that he ought to play the wounded lover. But his feeling for her was so small and his anger so great that he could not.

She was almost hysterical. She felt as though she were struggling desperately against some awful force that was imprisoning her. "Let me go. Please, let me go," she gasped.

"No!" he said, arrogance in his voice — the arrogance of a man used to women who let men rule them.

Her eyes flashed. "Then I release myself," she said haughtily, with a change of front so swift that it startled him. "And don't you dare ever speak of it to me again!"

She slowly left the room, her head high. But her haughtiness subsided as rapidly as it had risen, and by the time she reached her own apartment she was ready to fling herself down for a miserable cry — and she did. "If I could only get him out of the house," she wailed.

Frothingham debated his situation. "The only thing to do," he concluded, "is to go straight off to her father." He had not yet become convinced that in America man occupies a position in the family radically different from his position in England. He found Hollister writing in his study.

"Mr. Hollister," he began.

Hollister raised his head until it was tilted so far back that he could see Frothingham through the glasses that were pinching in the extreme end of his long nose. "Oh — Lord Frothingham — yes!" He laid down his pen. "What can I do for you?"

Frothingham seated himself in solemn dignity that hid his nervousness. "For several weeks your daughter and I have been engaged. We — we ——"

Hollister smiled good-humoredly. "Before you go any further, my boy," he interrupted kindly, "I warn you that you're barking up the wrong tree."

"I beg your pardon," said Frothingham stiffly.

"The person you want to see is the girl's mother. She attends to all that end of the business. I've got enough trouble to look after at my own end."

"What I have to say can be said properly only to her father as the head of the family."

"But I'm not the head of the family. I'm not sure that I know who is. Sometimes I think it's my wife, again I suspect Catherine."

"Your daughter now refuses to abide by her engagement," said Frothingham, in desperation at this untimely levity.

Hollister took off his glasses and examined them on both sides with great care. "Well," he said at last, "I suppose that settles it."

Frothingham stared. "I beg pardon, but it does not settle it."

Hollister gave him a look of fatherly sympathy. "I guess it does. You can't marry her if she won't have you. And if she won't have you — why, she won't."

"You treat the matter lightly." Frothingham had a bright red spot in either cheek. "You do not seem to be conscious of the painful position in which she places you."

"Good Heavens, Frothingham. What have I got to do with it? You ain't engaged to me. She's got the right to say what she'll do with herself."

Frothingham rose. "I was under the impression, sir, that I was dealing with a gentleman who would appreciate the due of a gentleman."

Hollister's eyebrows came down and a cruel line suddenly appeared at each corner of his mouth. Just then Mrs. Hollister entered. Intuitively she leaped to the right conclusion. "The idiot!" she said to herself. "Why didn't he come to me?" Then she said smoothly, almost playfully, to "the idiot": "Has Catherine been troubling you with her mood this morning?"

Frothingham's face brightened — her mood! Then there was hope.

"You ought not to pay any attention to her moods," Mrs. Hollister went on with a smile. "She's very nervous at times. But it passes."

"She told me flat that our engagement was off," said Frothingham. "I came to her father, naturally. She seemed to be in earnest."

Mrs. Hollister continued to smile. "Don't concern yourself about the matter, Lord Frothingham," she replied in her kindliest voice. "Catherine will be all right again to-morrow at the latest. She has been doing too much lately for a young girl under the excitement of an engagement."

Hollister, who had been looking hesitatingly from his wife to Frothingham, went to the wall and pressed an electric button. When the servant appeared he said: "Please ask Miss Catherine to come here."

Mrs. Hollister turned on him, her eyes flashing. "Catherine is in no state to bear ——"

Hollister returned her look calmly, then repeated his order. The servant looked uneasily from the husband to the wife, saw that Mrs. Hollister was not going to speak, bowed deprecatingly and withdrew. In a few minutes — it seemed a long time to the three, waiting in silence — Catherine appeared. Her eyes were swollen slightly, but that was the only sign of perturbation. Mrs. Hollister said to Frothingham: "I think it would be best that her father and I talk with her alone first."

Frothingham instantly rose. With eyes pleadingly upon Catherine he was nearing the door when Hollister spoke — it was in a voice neither Frothingham nor even Catherine had heard from him or suspected him of having at his command. "Please be seated, Lord Frothingham. The best way to settle this business is to settle it."

MRS. STAUNTON

Frothingham could not have disobeyed that voice and he saw with a sinking heart that at the sound of it Mrs. Hollister looked helpless despair.

"Catherine," said her father, "do you, or do you not, wish to marry Lord Frothingham?"

"I won't marry him," replied Catherine. She gave Frothingham a contemptuous look. "I told him so a while ago."

Mrs. Hollister's eyes blazed. "Have you forgotten what I said to you?" she demanded of her daughter, her voice shrill with fury.

"No, mother," Catherine answered slowly; "but—I cannot change my mind. I cannot marry Lord Frothingham."

An oppressive silence fell. After a moment Frothingham bowed coldly and left the room. Mrs. Hollister started up to follow him. "One word, Nelly," said her husband. "I wish you to understand that this matter is settled. Nothing more is to be said about it either to Catherine or to that young man—not another word."

Mrs. Hollister was white to the lips. "I understand," she replied with a blasting look at her daughter. And she followed Frothingham to try to pacify him—she knew her husband too well not to know that her dream of a titled son-in-law was over.

When she was gone Catherine sank limp into a chair. "She'll never forgive me," she exclaimed despondently.

Hollister nodded in silent assent. After a few minutes he said: "It's been fifteen years since she made me cross her in a matter I sha'n't speak of. And she remembers it against me to-day as if it had happened an hour ago. The sooner you find your man, Katie, and marry him, the better off you'll be—that's my advice. And I ought to know." He patted her encouragingly on the shoulder.

VII

FROTHINGHAM had gone direct to his apartment. "Get my traps together at once," he said to his man—Hutt, whose father had been his father's man. He threw himself into a chair in his sitting-room and tried to think, to plan. But he was still dazed from the long fall and the sudden stop. Presently Hutt touched him.

"Well—well—what is it?" he asked, looking stupidly up at the round, stupid face.

"Beg pardon, my lord," replied the servant, "but I've spoken to you twice. Mrs. Hollister wishes to know if you'll kindly come to her in her sitting-room."

Frothingham found Mrs. Hollister's maid waiting for him in the hall. He followed her to the heavily perfumed surroundings of pale blue silk, both plain and brocaded, in which Mrs. Hollister lived. He listened to her without hearing what she said—thinking of it afterward he decided that she had been incoherent and not very tactful, and that her chief anxiety had been lest he might do something to cause scandal. He remembered that when he had said he would go at once she had tried to persuade him to stay—as if leaving were not the only possible course. He gradually recovered his self-command, and through weakness, through good nature, through contempt of his hosts and through policy he acted upon the first principle of the code for fortune-hunters of every degree and kind: "Be near-sighted to insults and far-sighted to apologies."

Surveying the wreck from his original lodgings at the Waldorf, he found three mitigations—first, that the engagement had not been announced; second, that he had not written Evelyn anything about it; third, that it was impossible for "middle class people" such as the Hollisters to insult him—"if I wallow with that sort, I can't expect anything else, can I?" To cheer himself he took several drinks and an account of stock. He found that he was ninety-three pounds richer than when he landed—he played "bridge" well and had been in several heavy games at Lake-in-the-Wood, and had been adroit in noting the stupid players and so arranging partners that he could benefit by them; also he had been lucky in a small way in picking the numbers at Mansfield's the few times he had trusted himself to go there. "Not so bad," he said. "It's a long game and that was only the first hand." He hesitated at the indicator, then instead of ordering another drink went to the telephone and called up Longview's house. It gave him courage, and a sense that he was not altogether friendless and forlorn, to hear Honoria's voice again. "Shall you be in late this afternoon?" he said.

"Why! I didn't know you were in town—or are you calling me from Catherine's?"

"Yes—I'm in town," he replied, and he felt that she must notice the strain in his voice.

"Oh!"

"I'm up to stay," he went on, his voice improving.

"Oh—yes—come at half-past five."

"Thank you—good-by." He held the receiver to his ear until he heard her ring off. "Good girl, Honoria," he muttered. "Not like those beastly cads." He went to the club, lunched with Browne whom he found there, was beaten by him at billiards, losing ten dollars, returned to the hotel to dress.

At a quarter-past five he started up the avenue afoot—a very striking figure in clothes made in the extreme of the English fashion; but he would have been striking in almost any sort of dress, so distinguished-looking was his pale, rather supercilious face with one of its keen eyes ambushed behind that eyeglass, expressive in its expressionlessness. The occupants of every fifth or sixth carriage in the fashionable parade bowed to him with a friendliness that gave him an internal self-possession as calm as the external immobility which his control of his features enabled him always to present to the world.

"JUST MY ROTTEN LUCK," HE MUTTERED

He told Honoria his story in outline—"the surest way to win a woman's friendship is to show her that you trust her," he reflected. She was sympathetic in a way that soothed, not hurt, his vanity; but she sided with Catherine. "I half suspected her of being in love with Joe," she said, "but I thought he was a confirmed bachelor. He played all round you—that's the truth. I'm going to say something rather disagreeable—but I think it's necessary."

"I want—I need your advice," he replied.

"You've been relying entirely too much on your title. You've let yourself be misled by what the newspapers say about that sort of thing. You don't understand—I didn't understand until I'd been here a while and had got my point of view straight. They're not so excited about titles now as they used to be when they had no fashionable society of their own and had to look abroad to gratify their instinct for social position. If you'd come five years ago——"

"Just my rotten luck," he muttered.

"Your title is a good thing—properly worked. It will catch a woman, especially if she's not well forward 'in the push,' as they say. But it won't hold her. She's likely to use you to strengthen her social position and then to drop you, unless she has lived in England and has had her head turned—like your middle classes."

"But my family is away better than Surrey's."

"Your family counts for nothing here. New York knows nothing and cares nothing about birth. Englishmen count by title only."

"Then they ran after Surrey because he was a Duke?"

"Perhaps, to a certain extent," replied Honoria. "But I fancy the principal reason was that they wished to see what it was Helen had paid such a tall price for. If he had come here quietly to marry a poor girl there'd have been no stir."

"Money—money—nothing but money—always money," sneered Frothingham. He saw the twinkle in Honoria's eyes. "But, I say," he protested, "you know that we over there do care for other things, too."

"So do they here, but what do they care for, first and most, in both countries?"

He smiled.

"It's money first—there and here, and the world over," she went on with a bitterness under her raillery. "And among our kind of people everything else—sentiment, art, good taste even—is far behind it. How could it be otherwise? We've got to have money—lots of money—or we can't have any of the things that we most crave—luxury, deference, show. But—where are you dining to-night?"

"Probably at the club."

"Excuse me a minute. I'll just see if Mrs. Galloway will let me bring you. We're going to the opera afterward." She looked at him quizzically. "I think I'll arrange to ship you off to Boston. A little vacation just now will do you no harm. And—Boston might interest you."

When she returned from the telephone it was with a cordial invitation for him from Mrs. Galloway. He said: "I've a letter to a Mrs. Saalfield in Boston. Do you know her?"

"Yes—she's here now, I think. But you would better keep away from her. She wouldn't do you the least good."

"Is she out of 'the push'?"

"Oh, no—she leads it there, I believe. But she wouldn't let you look at a girl or a widow or any woman but herself. She's about forty years old—it used to be the woman of thirty, but it's the woman of forty now. Everywhere she goes she trails a train of young men. They're afraid to look away from her. They watch her like a pack of hungry collies, and she watches them like a hen-hawk."

There was more than the spirit of friendly helpfulness in Honoria's plan to send him away to Boston. The bottom fact—hidden even from herself—was that she was tired of him. He seemed to her helpless and incapable, worse in that respect than any but the very poorest specimens of men she had met in New York. She felt that he was looking to her to see him through an adventure of which she disapproved rather than approved. She had no intention of accepting such a burden, yet she was too good-natured and liked him too well to turn him abruptly adrift.

Mrs. Galloway took him in to dinner, and it was not until the second act of the opera that he had a chance to talk with the Boston woman in the party—Mrs. Staunton. Then he slipped into the chair behind her; but she would not talk while the curtain was up. Grand opera bored him, so he passed the time in gazing round the grand-tier boxes—the Galloway box was to the left of the centre. The twilight was not dark enough to hide the part of the show that interested him. He knew New York fashionable society well now, and as he looked he noted each woman and recalled how many ¶Mock modesty is a vice behind the mask of virtue.

¶A blank cartridge is just as effective as a misfire.

¶When a man borrows trouble there's the devil to pay.

¶"Absence makes the heart grow fonder" of somebody else.

¶The best way to make yourself wanted is to make yourself scarce.

¶A good many poets are neither born nor made. They are perpetrated.

¶The dollar that is borrowed is never so large as the one that has to be returned.

¶The good we do lives after us, but future generations can stand all we shall leave.

¶It is not what a man hears but what he believes that makes him wise or foolish.

¶The man who does the little thing well is always ready to do the big thing better.

¶Wasting time is bad enough, but getting angry over another's politics is pure extravagance.

¶The race is not always to the swift. Sometimes the judges have their money on the slow animal.

¶The trouble with most social reformers is that they insist upon looking for vice with a brass band.

¶When Mr. Rockefeller pours a few extra millions upon the torch of learning the users of all other kinds of lamps pay for it.

¶"The balance of trade," said the coal dealer after a test that showed that his scales regarded 1673 pounds as a ton, "seems to be in my favor."

A Great Lady

WHEN Jessie Benton Frémont died, a few weeks ago, in California, we lost the most noble example which the country ever has known of a type of American woman now almost extinct. It is a type, too, which probably never will be renewed in this country, for it no longer represents the ideal of our ambitious wives and daughters.

Forty years ago, during the Civil War, Mrs. Frémont was the most influential woman in this country. Wherever she went—in Washington, New York or San Francisco—her drawing-room became a salon where the vital concerns of the nation were discussed by those who controlled them. She had been born into the thick of public life: she was Benton's daughter, to whom he had given the training of a son: her mother belonged to a family which for generations had held leadership in the South (as they hold it to-day) by sheer right of brain power: she was the wife of the head of a great political party—a man with almost as large and enthusiastic a following as was Henry Clay's.

Yet it is a fact that the men who crowded into her house, the regiments that went into the war as "Jessie's Troopers," or "Jessie's Scouts," paid allegiance neither to her family nor to her husband, but to her only—to the womanliness of the woman.

There was something in her of the French grande dame. De Staël had not a more piercing wit, nor Récamier a finer quality of beauty, but below and apart from either was her singular personal magnetism. Whatever might be the room into which she came, whether in a palace or the shack of a ranch, she was the fire burning in it, the lamp that shone in it, the instrument of music that struck a note to which your secret self replied.

Whether you were a crown prince or a black slave did not matter a whit to her. She understood you. Her heart was full of kindness and help for you.

That was the secret of the power of this remarkable woman. She knew you. She had help for you. One heard much in those days of her extraordinary knowledge of history and public affairs, and of certain great political movements which it was said she had instigated. But when you had once met her you did not know nor care for these things. Those wonderful gray eyes had a message for you. She was your friend.

We recall this trait in her because it is one which her sex does not seem to value of late.

The young girl nowadays who has social position or brain force invariably becomes a public character. She runs some charity or civic reform. She belongs to a dozen clubs. Her ambition is to be as like a man as possible. When she presides at a meeting or speaks on some matter of public moment, if you shut your eyes you cannot tell whether it is a man or woman to whom you listen.

Jessie Frémont, who had more public influence than any of them, in every moment of her life was essentially feminine: the wife, the mother, the friend.

Breaking Down the Barriers

WITHIN a few days there have been two marvels which, rightly looked at, giddy the imagination and flood the future with dazzling light. But the custodians of the trumpets of publicity seem to be somewhat in the position of the girl who made the trip to Niagara Falls. She was so entranced by the beauties and wonders of Nature on the way that she exhausted her supply of superlatives; and when she stood in the presence of the awful majesty of the Falls she was silent for a moment, then said: "Ain't they cute?" Scientists and philanthropists have drained the public supply of superlatives in the last three-quarters of a century. The two latest and greatest marvels are discussed as matters of course, and imagination sits with folded wings and stupid eye.

The first of these marvels centres about the name Marconi. "A remarkable development of the telegraph," say the commenters. "We hope he's right in thinking the 'wireless' will make telegraphing as cheap as the mails." To talk of Marconi's achievement as the "wireless" is like speaking of the sun as boilerless or the progress of planets and stars as locomotiveless. The fact is that Marconi has burst through the coarse wall of matter—of the tangible and ponderable—that has isolated us in space and from each other, has transferred thought to that subtle medium called ether in whose boundless ocean swim freely all things, from the most crowded atom of your body to the remotest, loneliest star. This ocean he has found to be as subtle as it is vast—so subtle that the faint clickings of two tiny bits of metal, properly attuned to its rhythm, tintinnabulate there forever and forever without losing their identity, travel on and on into infinity and beyond, if there can be a beyond to infinity.

The warp of right progress of the human race is ability to communicate. Progress began when some two primordial ancestors of ours reached the plane of existence where they were able to shake off the selfish isolation of plant life and of the lower forms of animal life and established communication—touched each the other, and each had some dim consciousness of not being alone in the universe. Progress will be consummated when mind can look clean through racial, national and other prejudices, and can see reflected from all other minds the oneness of human nature, can grasp the ideal of brotherhood of the race, now just beginning to be understood to the confusion of war-lovers and of all kinds of promoters of and profiters by man's ignorance of man.

Marconi has broken down the barrier to world-neighborliness which the telegraph only breached. If the telegraph's breach has resulted in such wonders of widened sympathy and understanding, what will not the Marconigraph do?

The other passing marvelous marvel is a fit companion to the first. It is the Steel Corporation's so-called "profit-sharing project." To call it a "profit-sharing project" is to belittle it, just as it belittles the ether medium of human intercourse to call it "wireless." Closely studied, the Steel Corporation's project is not a mere profit-sharing enterprise, but a broad and amazing recognition of the co-partnership of human beings, a wiping out of the lines between employer and employee. That line began, so the beginnings of history inform us, with master and slave. It moved forward to master and serf, to master and vassal, to master and bonded freeman, to master and servant. It took a sudden democratic leap forward to employer and employee. And now we have Morgan heralding a new day of partner and partner, with the old acrimonious division into capitalist and laborer effaced.

Morgan's act is not so narrow as generosity or philanthropy—both of them imply strength condescending, however graciously, to weakness. It is simply a recognition of a new condition which the diffusion of intelligence has brought about. It is a bold stroke of genius, of a piece with his revolutionary financial methods which make conservatism tremble and catch its breath.

Like Marconi—like all inventors, discoverers, achievers whose names attach or should attach to the great steps forward—Morgan builded upon those who went before. Mr. Kidd says, somewhere in his first and unusual book, that the nineteenth century and its great men are in relation to the first century and its great men as the man on top of the cathedral dome is to the man on the sidewalk—not taller but higher. Regardless of their intrinsic merit, these figures stand conspicuous—and they reached that place by superiority in talent and in toil, and so deserve its honor. And both are, let it be noted, men of commerce, products of commercial conditions—not bloody men or political intriguers or otherwise professional "friends of the people."

Two Generations of Churchgoers

WHEN a man has digested THE POST on Saturday evening, why, the next morning, does he sit down to spend the day over the Sunday papers instead of going to church, as his grandfather did? Why?

The elder Smith, eighty years ago, listened to two heavy doctrinal sermons every Sunday. His grandson, Tom, subscribes to the support of a magnificent temple, to its vested choir, and to all of its charities, but for years he has not crossed the church threshold.

Is it because, as clergymen are apt to tell us, that Tom and his generation are less religious in spirit than the elder one, and more given to money getting and to vice?

That will be difficult to prove. In justice to Tom, too, we must remember that the weekly churchgoing was usually the only mental exercise within reach of his old farmer grandfather. It took the place of our social life, our theatres, our clubs, the countless books pressed on us every day. The parson's homily was the sole intellectual plat set before him.

Now, the younger Tom is just as sincere and sane a man as was his grandfather. His new possessions—literature, railways, wireless telegraphy, his share in the seething industries of this modern life do not make himself—Tom Smith—a whit less important to him.

The fact is, the most important thing in life to him and to every other man is his secret self. Where did it come from? Where is it going? What have those unknown Others to do with it? How shall he make friends with them?

A couple of years ago Tom set out to find an answer to these questions. He went from one church to the other, giving, it must be confessed, but lax attention to the prayers, but listening to the sermons like a man condemned to death, who thought to hear his reprieve in them.

Doctor A. preached on a doctrinal point with lucidity and force. "What has Apostolic Succession to do with my soul here to-day, or its chances if I catch the smallpox to-morrow?" Tom grumbled as he walked away.

He went from church to church. The next Sunday he listened to a charming monologue on the Uses of Cheerfulness, the next to reminiscences of travel in Syria, the next to a passionate appeal for a reformed civic government. He heard sermons on missions, on scientific themes (Evolution leading), and delightful essays on abstract moral questions.

"These things should be left to men whose métier they are," he complained. "Have the clergymen forgotten that, after all, their business is with my soul? Was there not once a Man who came to help it? Why do they so seldom speak of Him?"

So then he fell into the habit of staying at home and church-going folks blamed the Sunday papers and the indifference of this generation to religion.

CHAPTER XX

LEFT to herself, Laura paced the floor for another quarter of an hour. Then, going into her husband's apartments, she rang up the office of Gretry, Converse & Co. Twice the central station responded that the "line was busy," but on the third attempt Laura succeeded in getting the connection.

"Is Mr. Jadwin there?"

"He can't see no one," came the reply in the thin tones of an office-boy. "He can't see no one this afternoon."

"Tell him Mrs. Jadwin—his wife—wants to speak with him."

There was a long wait; then the same voice, preceded by an initiative click and rattle of the receiver, replied:

"He can't see no one this afternoon, ma'am."

"Did you say Mrs. Jadwin wanted to speak to him?"

"What—hey? . . . Hello! He can't see no one this afternoon. Yes'm. I told him."

"Is he there? Is he in the office there? I want to know how he is."

"No, he ain't here. He's out."

In despair Laura turned away and went back to her own room again, throwing herself down upon the couch, her chin supported on her palm.

As she crossed the room, however, her eye had been caught by an opened note from Mrs. Cressler, received the day before, and apprising her of the date of the funeral. At the sight, all the tragedy leaped up again in her mind and recollection, and in fancy she stood again in the back parlor of the Cressler home, her fingers pressed over her mouth to shut back the cries, horror and the terror of sudden death rending her heart, shaking the brain itself. Again and again since that dreadful moment had the fear come back mingled with grief, with compassion, and the bitter sorrow of a kind friend gone forever from her side. And then, her resolution girding itself, her will power at fullest stretch, she had put the tragedy from her. Other and—for her—more momentous events impended. Everything in life, even death itself, must stand aside while her love was put to the test. Life and death were little things. Love only existed; let her husband's career fail—what did it import so only love stood the strain and issued from the struggle triumphant? And now, as she lay upon her couch, she crushed down all compunction for the pitiful calamity whose last scene she had discovered, her thoughts once more upon her husband and herself. Had the shock of that spectacle in the Cresslers' house, and the wearing suspense in which she had lived of late, torn and disordered the delicate feminine nerves so that a kind of hysteria animated and directed her impulses, her words and actions—hysteria and a monstrous egoism? Laura did not know. She knew only that the day was going and that her husband neither came near her nor sent her word.

Even if he had been very busy, this was her birthday, though he had lost millions! Could he not have sent even the foolishest little present to her, even a line—three words on a scrap of paper? But she checked herself. The day was not over yet; perhaps—perhaps he would remember her, after all, before the afternoon was over. He was managing a little surprise for her, no doubt. He knew what day this was. After their talk that Sunday in his smoking-room he would not forget. And besides, it was the evening that he had promised should be hers. "If he loved her," she had said, he would give that evening to her. Never, never would Curtis fail her when conjured by that spell.

Laura had planned a little dinner for that night. It was to be served at eight. Page would have dined earlier; only herself and her husband were to be present. It was to be her birthday dinner. All the noisy, clamorous world should be excluded; no faintest rumble of the Pit would intrude. She would have him all to herself. He would, so she determined, forget everything else in his love for her. She would be beautiful as never before—brilliant, resistless and dazzling. She would have him at her feet, her own, her own again, as much her own as her very hands. And before she would let him go he would forever and forever have abjured the Battle of the Street that had so often caught him from her. The Pit should not have him; the sweep of that great whirlpool should never again prevail against the power of love.

Yes, she had suffered, she had known the humiliation of a woman neglected. But it was to end now; her pride would never again be lowered, her love never again be ignored.

But the afternoon passed and the evening drew on without any word from him. In spite of her anxiety, she yet murmured over and over again as she paced the floor of her room: "He will send word; he will send word. I know he will."

By four o'clock she had begun to dress. Never had she made a toilet more superb, more careful. She disdained a "costume" on this great evening. It was not to be "Théodora" now, nor "Juliet," nor "Carmen." It was to be only Laura Jadwin—just herself, unaided by theatricals, unadorned by tinsel. But it seemed consistent none the less to choose her most beautiful gown for the occasion, to panoply herself in every charm that was her own. Her dress, that closely sheathed the low, flat curves of her body and that left her slender arms and neck bare, was one shimmer of black jet scales, iridescent, undulating with light to her every movement. In the coils and masses of her black hair she fixed her two great cabochons of pearls, and clasped about her neck her palm-broad collaret of pearls and diamonds. Against one shoulder nodded a jaqueminot, royal red, imperial.

It was hard upon six o'clock when at last she dismissed her maid. Left alone, she stood for a moment in front of her long mirror that reflected her image from head to foot, and at the sight she could not forbear a smile and a sudden proud lifting of her head. All the woman in her preened and plumed herself in the consciousness of the power of her beauty. Let the Battle of the Street clamor never so loudly now, let the suction of the Pit be strong now, Eve triumphed, Venus toute entière s'attachait a sa proie.

These women of America, these others who allowed "business" to draw their husbands from them more and more, who submitted to those cruel conditions that forced them to be content with the wreckage left after the storm and stress of the day's work—the jaded mind, the exhausted body, the faculties dulled by overwork—she was sorry for them. They, less radiant than herself, less potent to charm, could not call their husbands back. But she, Laura, was beautiful; she knew it; she gloried in her beauty. It was her strength. She felt the same pride in it as the warrior in a finely tempered weapon.

And to-night her beauty was brighter than ever. It was a veritable aura that enveloped her, an aureole that crowned her. She knew herself to be invincible. So only that he saw her thus, she knew that she would conquer. And he would come. "If he loved her," she had said. By his love for her he had promised; by his love she knew she would prevail.

But meanwhile the time was passing. Laura descended to the library, and, picking up a book, composed herself to read. When six o'clock struck she made haste to assure herself that, of course, she could not expect him exactly on the hour. No, she must make allowances; the day—as Page had suspected—had probably been an important one. He would be a little late, but he would come soon. "If you love me, you will come," she had said.

But an hour later Laura paced the room with tight-shut lips and burning cheeks. She was still alone; her day, her hour, was passing, and he had not so much as sent word. For a moment the thought occurred to her that he might perhaps be in great trouble, in great straits, that there was an excuse. But instantly she repudiated the notion.

"No, no," she cried, beneath her breath. "He should come, no matter what has happened. Or even, at the very least, he could send word."

The minutes dragged by. No roll of wheels echoed under the carriage porch; no step sounded at the outer door. The house was still, the street without was still, the silence of the midsummer evening widened, unbroken around her, like a vast calm pool. Only the musical Gregorians of the newsboys chanting the evening's extras from corner to corner of the streets rose into the air from time to time. She was once more alone. Was she to fail again? Was she to be set aside once more as so often heretofore—set aside, flouted, ignored, forgotten? "If you love me," she had said.

And this was to be the supreme test. This evening was to decide which was the great influence of his life—was to prove whether or not love was paramount. This was the crucial hour. "And he knows it," cried Laura. "He knows it. He did not forget, could not have forgotten."

The half-hour passed, then the hour, and as eight o'clock chimed from the clock over the mantel-shelf Laura stopped suddenly rigid in the midst of the floor.

Her anger leaped like fire within her. All the passion of the woman scorned shook her from head to foot. At the very moment of her triumph she had been flouted, in the pitch of her pride! And this was not the only time. All at once the past disappointments, slights and humiliations came again to her memory. She had pleaded, and had been rebuffed again and again; she had given all and had received neglect—she, Laura, beautiful beyond other women, who had known love, devoted service, and the most thoughtful consideration from her earliest girlhood, had been cast aside.

Suddenly she bent her head quickly, listening intently. Then she drew a deep breath, murmuring, "At last, at last!"

For the sound of a footstep in the vestibule was unmistakable. He had come, after all. But so late, so late! No, she could not be gracious at once; he must be made to feel how deeply he had offended; he must sue humbly, very humbly, for pardon. The servant's step sounded in the hall on the way toward the front door.

"I am in here, Matthew," she called. "In the library. Tell him I am in here."

She cast a quick glance at herself in the mirror close at hand, touched her hair with rapid fingers, smoothed the agitation from her forehead, and sat down in a deep chair near the fireplace, opening a book, turning her back toward the door.

She heard him come in, but did not move. Even as he crossed the floor she kept her head turned away. The footsteps paused near at hand. There was a moment's silence. Then slowly Laura, laying down her book, turned and faced him.

"With many, very, very happy returns of the day," said Sheldon Corthell, as he held toward her a cluster of deep-blue violets.

Laura sprang to her feet, a hand upon her cheek, her eyes wide and flashing.

"You?" was all she had breath to utter. "You?"

The artist smiled as he laid the flowers upon the table.

"I am going away again to-morrow," he said, "for always, I think. Have I startled you? I came only to say good-by—and to wish you a happy birthday."

"Oh, you remembered!" she cried. "You remembered! I might have known you would."

But the revulsion had been too great. She had been wrong, after all. Jadwin had forgotten. Emotions to which she could put no name swelled in her heart and rose in a quick, gasping sob to her throat. The tears sprang to her eyes. Old impulses, forgotten impetuosities, whipped her on.

"Oh, you remembered, you remembered!" she cried again, holding out both her hands.

He caught them in his own.

"Remembered!" he echoed; "I have never forgotten."

"No, no," she replied, shaking her head, winking back the tears. "You don't understand. I spoke before I thought. You don't understand."

"I do, believe me—believe me, I do," he exclaimed. "I understand you better than you understand yourself."

Laura's answer was a cry.

"Oh, then, why did you ever leave me—you who did understand me? Why did you leave me only because I told you to go? Why didn't you make me love you then? Why didn't you make me understand myself?" She clasped her hands tight together upon her breast; her words, torn by her sobs, came all but incoherent from behind her shut teeth. "No, no!" she exclaimed, as he made toward her. "Don't touch me, don't touch me! It is too late!"

"It is not too late."

Tears stood in Corthell's eyes as he went on.

"God forgive whoever—whatever has brought you to this pass," he said.

And as if it were a realization of his thought there suddenly came to the ears of both the roll of wheels upon the asphalt under the carriage porch and the trampling of iron-shod hoofs.

"Is that your husband?" Corthell's quick eye took in Laura's disarranged coiffure, one black lock low upon her neck, the rose at her shoulder crushed and broken, and the bright spot on either cheek.

"Is that your husband?"

"My husband—I don't know." She looked up at him with unseeing eyes. "Where is my husband? I have no husband. You are letting me remember," she cried in terror. "You are letting me remember. Ah, no, no, you don't love me! I hate you!"

Quickly he bent and kissed her.

"I will come for you to-morrow evening," he said. "You will be ready then to go with me?"

"Ready then? Yes, yes, to go with you anywhere."

He stood still a moment, listening. Somewhere a door closed. He heard the hoofs upon the asphalt again.

"Good-by," he whispered. "God bless you! Good-by till to-morrow night." And with the words was gone. The front door of the house closed quietly.

Had he come back again? Laura turned in her place on the long divan at the sound of a heavy tread by the door of the library.

Then an uncertain hand drew the heavy curtain aside. Jadwin, her husband, stood before her, his eyes sunken deep in his head, his face dead white, his hand shaking. He stood for a long instant in the middle of the room looking at her. Then at last his lips moved:

"Old girl! . . . Honey!"

Laura rose and all but groped her way toward him, her heart beating, the tears streaming down her face.

"My husband, my husband!"

Together they made their way to the divan, and sank down upon it side by side, holding to each other, trembling and fearful, like children in the night.

"Honey," whispered Jadwin after a while—"Honey, it's dark, it's dark. Something happened. . . . I don't remember"—he put his hand uncertainly to his head—"I can't remember very well; but it's dark—a little."

"It's dark," she repeated in a low whisper. "It's dark, dark. Something happened. Yes. I must not remember."

They spoke no further. A long time passed. Pressed close together, Curtis Jadwin and his wife sat there in the vast, gorgeous room, silent and trembling, ridden with unnamed fears, groping in the darkness. And while they remained thus holding close by one another a prolonged and wailing cry rose suddenly from the street, and passed on through the city under the stars and the wide canopy of the darkness.

"Extra, oh-h-h, extra! All about the smash of the great wheat corner! All about the failure of Curtis Jadwin!"

CONCLUSION

THE evening had closed in wet and misty; all day long a chill wind had blown across the city from off the lake, and by eight o'clock, when Laura and Jadwin came down to the dismantled library, a heavy rain was falling.

Laura gave Jadwin her arm as they made their way across the room—their footsteps echoing strangely from the uncarpeted boards.

"There," she said. "Give me the valise. Now sit down on the packing-box here. Are you tired? You had better put your hat on. It is full of drafts here, now that all the furniture and curtains are out."

"No, no. I'm all right, old girl. Is the hack there yet?"

"Not yet. You're sure you're not tired?" she insisted. "You had a pretty bad siege of it, you know, and this is the first week you've been up. You remember the doctor——"

"I've had too good a nurse," he answered, stroking her hand, "not to be fine as a fiddle by now. You must be tired yourself, Laura. Why, for whole days there—and nights, too, they tell me—you never left the room."

She shook her head as though dismissing the subject.

"I wonder," she said, sitting down upon a smaller packing-box and clasping a knee in her hands—"I wonder what the West will be like. Do you know, I think I am going to like it, Curtis?"

"It will be starting in all over again, old girl," he said with a shake of his head. "Pretty hard at first, I'm afraid."

She laughed an almost contemptuous note.

"Hard! Now?" She took his hand and laid it to her cheek.

"By all the rules you ought to hate me," he began. "What have I done for you but hurt you and, at last, bring you to——"

But she shut her gloved hand over his mouth.

"Stop!" she cried. "Hush, dear. You have brought me the greatest happiness of my life."

"Not during the time when I lost my head, when I left you alone so——"

But again she interrupted him.

"We were never to speak of those days again, never. They belong to the past. We were both different then. How do you know?—maybe I, too, 'lost my head.' But never mind all that now," she added hastily. "The 'world is all before us where to choose' now, isn't it? And this big house and all the life we've led in it was just an incident in our lives—an incident that is closed."

"Looks like it, to look around this room," he said grimly. "Nothing left but the wall-paper. What do you suppose are in these boxes?"

"They're labeled 'books and portières.'"

"Who bought 'em, I wonder? I'd have thought the party who bought the house would have taken them. Well, it was a wrench to see the place and all go so dirt cheap, and the 'Thetis,' too, by George! But I'm glad now. It's as though we had lightened ship." He looked at his watch. "That hack ought to be here pretty soon. I'm glad we checked the trunks from the house; gives us more time."

"Oh, by the way," exclaimed Laura, all at once opening her satchel, "I had a long letter from Page this morning, from New York. Do you want to hear what she has to say? I've had time to read only part of it myself. It's the first one I've had from her since their marriage."

He lit a cigar.

"Go ahead," he said, settling himself on the box. "What does Mrs. Court have to say?"

"'My dearest sister,'" began Laura. "'Here we are, Landry and I, in New York at last. Very tired and mussed after the ride on the cars, but in a darling little hotel where the proprietor is head cook and everybody speaks French. I know my accent is improving, and Landry has learned any quantity of phrases already. We are reading George Sand out loud, and are making up the longest vocabulary. To-night we are going to a concert, and I've found out that there's a really fine course of lectures to be given soon on "Literary Tendencies," or something like that. Quel chance! Landry is intensely interested. You've no idea what a deep mind he has, Laura—a real thinker.

"'But here's really a big piece of news. We may not have to give up our old home on North State Street opposite St. James' Church, after all. Aunt Wess' wrote the other day to say that if you were willing she would rent it, and then sublet all the lower floor to Landry and me, so we could have a real house over our heads and not the under side of the floor of the flat overhead. And she is such an old dear, I know we could all get along beautifully. Write me about this as soon as you can. I know you'll be willing, and Aunt Wess' said she'd agree to whatever rent you suggested.

"'We went to call on Mrs. Cressler day before yesterday. She's been here nearly a fortnight by now, and is living with a maiden sister of hers in a very beautiful house fronting Central Park (not so beautiful as our palace on North Avenue. Never, never, will I forget that house). She will probably stay here now always. She says the very sight of the old neighborhoods in Chicago would be more than she could bear. Poor Mrs. Cressler! How fortunate for her that her sister ——' and so on, and so on," broke in Laura hastily.

"Read it, read it," said Jadwin, turning sharply away. "Don't skip a line. I want to hear every word."

"That's all there is to it," Laura returned. "'We'll be back,'" she went on, turning a page of the letter, "'in about three weeks, and Landry will take up his work in that railroad office. No more speculating for him, he says. He talks of Mr. Jadwin continually. You never saw or heard of such devotion. He says that Mr. Jadwin is a genius, the greatest financier in the country, and that he knows he could have won if they all hadn't turned against him that day. He never gets tired telling me that Mr. Jadwin has been a father to him—the kindest, biggest-hearted man he ever knew——'"

Jadwin pulled his mustache rapidly.

"Pshaw, pish, nonsense—little fool!" he blustered.

"He simply worshiped you from the first, Curtis," commented Laura. "Even after he knew I was to marry you. He never once was jealous—never once would listen to a word against you from any one."

"Well—well, what else does Mrs. Court say?"

"'I am glad to hear,'" read Laura, "'that Mr. Gretry did not fail, though Landry tells me he must have lost a great deal of money. Landry tells me that eighteen brokers' houses failed in Chicago the day after Mr. Gretry suspended. Isabel sent us a wedding present—a lovely medicine-chest full of homœopathic medicines, little pills and things, you know. But as Landry and I are never sick and both laugh at homœopathy, I declare I don't know just what we will do with it. Landry is as careful of me as though I were a wax doll. But I do wish he would think more of his own health. He never will wear his mackintosh in rainy weather. I've been studying his tastes so carefully. He likes French light opera better than English, and bright colors in his cravats, and he simply adores stuffed tomatoes.

"'We both send our love, and Landry especially wants to be remembered to Mr. Jadwin. I hope this letter will come in time for us to wish you both bon voyage and bon succès. How splendid of Mr. Jadwin to have started his new business even while he was convalescent! Landry says he knows he will make two or three more fortunes in the next few years.

"'Good-by, Laura, dear. Ever your loving sister,

"'PAGE COURT.

"'(The next day.)

"'P. S.—I open this letter again to tell you that we met Mr. Corthell on the street yesterday. He sails for Europe to-day.'"

"Oh," said Jadwin, as Laura put the letter quickly down. "Corthell—that artist chap. By the way, whatever became of him?"

Laura settled a comb in the back of her hair.

"He—he came to call the day after your—your failure—and several times since."

"Why, what a lot of people came to ask how I did!" exclaimed Jadwin. "There are a lot of decent people in this world, Laura. I don't deserve to have such good friends. Corthell, too, hey? Who would have thought that, now? Sorry I didn't see him before he went away. What did he have to say?"

"When he called, you mean?" She shook her head. "I didn't see him. I think," she said quietly—"I think he is a little tiresome at times. Oh, there's the carriage."

They rose, gathering up their valises.

"Hoh!" said Jadwin. "No servants now, Laura, to carry our things down for us and open the door, and it's a hack, old girl, instead of the victoria or coupé."

"What if it is?" she cried. "'What do' things,' servants, money and all amount to now?"

As Jadwin laid his hand upon the knob of the front door he all at once put down his valise and put his arm about his wife. She caught him about the neck and looked deep into his eyes a long moment. And then, without speaking, they kissed each other.

In the outer vestibule he raised the umbrella and held it over her head.

The driver, descending from the box, held open the door of the hack. Jadwin handed Laura in, gave an address to the driver, and got in himself, slamming the door after. They heard the driver mount to his seat and speak to his horses.

"Well," said Jadwin, rubbing the fog from the window-pane, "look your last at the old place, Laura. You'll never see it again."

But she would not look.

"No, no," she said. "I'll look at you, dearest, at you and our future, which is to be happier than any years we have ever known."

Jadwin did not answer other than by taking her hand in his, and in silence they drove through the city toward the train that was to carry them to the new life. A phase of the existences of each was closed definitely. The great corner was a thing of the past; the great corner with the long train of disasters its collapse had started. The great failure had precipitated smaller failures, and the aggregate of smaller failures had pulled down one business house after another. For weeks afterward the successive crashes were like the shock and reverberation of undermined buildings toppling to their ruin. An important bank had suspended payment, and hundreds of depositors had found their little fortunes swept away. The ramifications of the catastrophe were unbelievable. The whole tone of financial affairs seemed changed. Money was "tight" again, credit was withdrawn. The business world began to speak of hard times once more.

But Laura would not admit her husband was in any way to blame. He had suffered, too. She repeated to herself his words again and again:

"The wheat cornered itself. I simply stood between two sets of circumstances. The wheat cornered me, not I the wheat."

And all of those millions of millions of bushels of the wheat were gone now. The wheat that had killed Cressler, and had—with the breaking of the corner—brought privation and suffering to so many hundreds of families, that engulfed Jadwin's fortune, and all but unseated reason itself—the wheat that had intervened like a great current to drag her husband from her side and drown him in the roaring depths of the Pit, released from all control had passed on upon its ordered and predetermined course, from West to East, like a vast Titanic flood; had passed, leaving death and ruin in its wake, but bearing life and prosperity to the crowded cities and centres of Europe.

For a moment, vague, dark perplexities assailed her, questionings as to the elemental forces, the forces of demand and supply that ruled the world. This huge, resistless Nourisher of the Nations—why was it, then, it could not reach the people, could not fulfill its destiny, unmarred by all this suffering, unattended by all this misery?

She did not know. But as she searched, troubled and disturbed, for an answer, she was aware of a certain familiarity in the neighborhood the carriage was traversing. The strange sense of having lived through this scene, once before, took hold upon her.

She looked out quickly on either hand through the blurred glasses of the carriage doors. Surely, surely, this locality had once before impressed itself upon her imagination. She turned to her husband, an exclamation upon her lips; but Jadwin, by the dim light of the carriage lanterns, was studying a railroad folder.

All at once, intuitively, Laura turned in her place, and raising the flap that covered the little window at the back of the carriage looked behind. On either side of the vista in converging lines stretched the tall office buildings, lights burning in a few of their windows even yet. Over the end of the street the lead-colored sky was broken by a pale faint haze of light, and silhouetted against this rose a sombre mass, unbroken by any glimmer, rearing a black and formidable façade against the blue of the sky behind it.

And this was the last impression of that part of her life that that day brought to a close; the tall, gray office buildings, the murk of rain, the haze of light in the heavens, and raised against it the pile of the Board of Trade building, black, grave, monolithic, crouching on its foundations like a monstrous sphinx with blind eyes, silent, grave—crouching there without a sound, without sign of life, under the night and the drifting veil of rain.

BETWEEN THE LINES

"Big Sellers"

THE books which are most eagerly bought and read in a country give us a shrewd hint as to the condition of the mind and morals of that country.

It is fair, then, to take the books which have been sold here during the last ten years by the hundreds of thousands as thermometers to show the present temperature, mental and moral, of the American people.

These "Big Sellers," as the trade calls them, have all been novels. Why? And why the sudden enormous sales? Twenty years ago a book of which fifteen thousand copies were sold was considered a success.

Simply because, owing to the general prosperity, a different class of readers are able now to buy books.

The chief effort of the Republic for a century and a quarter has been to educate her working-classes. Now, here is a gauge to measure their education. They are now able to buy books. What do they buy?

First—and let us thank God for it—they want clean books. No filthy novel ever has had a large sale in this country.

It is a significant fact, however, that three notable books issued during the last two years had noble motifs which were tainted and debased with impurity. They were read chiefly by idle, emotional women; men laughed at their hysterical outcries—the decent, sane general public did not read them at all.

Then what does this healthy-minded public read and want to read?

Let us see. The first novel which was heartily liked by the rank and file of American readers was published before the Civil War. It was Beulah, by Augusta Evans Wilson. It was a mild, weak story, but the flavor of piety in it was sincere and pure. That brought its success.

Next came Ben Hur, of which literally millions of copies have been sold. Again the popularity of the book was not due to literary ability, nor dramatic power, but to its religious element. No subject, after all, is so interesting to any man as his own soul, and its chances beyond the dark. Ben Hur satisfied the desire of the ordinary man to come closer to the Christ in His personal presence, to find Him human like ourselves.

Next to Ben Hur in popularity probably have come E. P. Roe's novels. Without the usual aid from critics they had enormous sales. The critics always have sneered at them as a gourmand would do if asked to eat boiled mutton without sauce.

They were stories of every-day life, told with great directness and simplicity. There were usually two old people—gray and wise and saintly as old people are in such books—and a pair of lovers with all the virtues divided between them, and a villain, wicked even to his finger-nails. There were fearful complications and dangers, but true love always came out victorious in the end. The story was set usually among the farms and hills and woods which have for most of us a homely, kindly familiarity.

There was no hot spice of passion in these commonplace pages—no tempting, half-covered indecency. The dish of mutton was plain, if you will, but wholesome and nourishing. In any case it suited the American palate.

The enormous sales of Uncle Tom's Cabin were due to another characteristic of our people. It was read because its subject was the one which at that instant was upheaving the country to its foundations. The American is apt to tear and rend an idea to tatters in the fervor of the moment. But, the moment gone, he suddenly regards the whole matter de haut en bas, and with good-humored indifference refuses ever to be bored by it again.

During the Civil War he daily either lauded or cursed Mrs. Stowe and her book with righteous fury. But when the war was over he promptly forgot them both. Her later novels, which offered much more accurate and finer work than Uncle Tom's Cabin, had but a small sale.

The popularity of other recent favorites had another equally characteristic cause. In the last thirty years the average American has discovered that he had grandfathers, and each year grows more anxious as to their conditions and doings while they were above ground. Before that time there was a singular apathy among us on the subject of our genealogy. We were wholly satisfied that to be an American was to be greater than a King. Why then trouble ourselves to trace our descent from long-dead baronets or farmers or carpenters?

But nowadays "Ego sum" does not cover the whole story of existence for the average American. He has a keen hunger for the facts of his origin, and the more romantic and picturesque these facts can be made to appear the better he is pleased. It is not enough for him that he is a citizen of the Great Republic; he wants to think that his grandfathers wrote Armiger after their names, and bore a knightly part in the chivalric doings of those older times.

Hence the sudden and brilliant success of Miss Mary Johnston's To Have and To Hold and Audrey, with their revelation of the stately dames and courtly cavaliers who, she holds, were the first settlers in this country. We had long pictured our ancestors as grim old farmers in homespun, sitting by the kitchen chimney, Bible in hand, after a day's active ploughing or killing of pigs or bears or Indians, as the case might be, while their wives, after much frying of bacon, or dripping of candles, or boiling of soft soap, sat listening to the Word.

We were not ashamed of their day's hard work, and the inevitable reading of the Bible at the end of it lifted them for us into the region of saints and haloed martyrs of the past.

But these ancestors whom this little Southern girl has unearthed for us are of another pattern. There is some pleasure in choosing our grandfathers from among her disguised sons of dukes, Paladins of chivalry, one of whom in a short July afternoon slaughtered the four great champions of Europe. How much more satisfactory as grandmothers, too, her haughty Lady Evelyns, perpetually occupied in rejecting earls, than the homely old women, who, like Martha Washington, salted down pork and made jelly, and boxed the ears of their daughters when they brought suitors of low degree to the house.

Miss Johnston has such absolute faith in her own creation of this fairyland in old Virginia that she has converted us all to a half belief in it. Granted that her books are romance, pure and simple, they will make life easier for the hundreds of thousands of hard working modern young people who, against the angry protest of Mr. Howells, delight in them. They are written, too, with an aplomb, a simplicity and distinction of style which prove that Miss Johnston has been brought up on the Spectator, Addison and Scott, like many Southern women. She may—let us hope she will—simplify and strengthen the English of her readers of this later generation.

Several other novels which claimed to be historical have been popular owing to this present spasm of eagerness in Americans to make the past real to themselves. They give us Colonial life, the time of the Civil War, what you will, not as they actually were but as they have appeared to the heated fancy of the writers. Our great men during the Civil War did not declaim and stalk to and fro as in these books, like Cato or Mark Antony. They were tediously commonplace. One of them—the greatest of them all—went about his work of saving the Republic with black finger-nails and buttonless shirt-fronts loosely pinned together.

Another told jokes in season and out of season, and still another, a wise and great leader, ended every sentence with a weak giggle.

Shall we sketch our heroes with imaginary halos or as they really are, with all their moles or wrinkles?

The first method seems just now to be the most popular among the rank and file of readers.

Ellen Douglas has been a faithful historian of the Civil War, but her books, probably because of their fidelity and realism, are voted disagreeable by the mass of novel readers.

The popular book, as we said, is the one which happens to meet a popular want.

millions she represented. "Gad, how rich they are—these beggars," he thought enviously. And he was seized by a mild attack of what a distinguished New York lawyer calls "the fury of the parasite"—that hate which succeeds contempt in the parasite as its intended victim eludes it.

When the curtain went down on the last of seven uproarious calls—the opera was Carmen, and Calvé was singing it—Mrs. Staunton's supercilious expression gave him the courage to say: "Ghastly row they make, eh?"

Mrs. Staunton was perhaps fifty years old, long and thin, with a severe profile and a sweet and intelligent, if somewhat too complacent, front face. "Calvé sings rather well—in spots," she said. "But I doubt if Boston would have given her seven calls."

The mirthful shine of Frothingham's right eye may have been a reflection from his glass; again, it may have been really in his eye where it seemed to be—Mrs. Staunton was so seated that she could not see him as he talked over her shoulder into her ear. "Really," was all he said.

"You've not been at Boston?" asked Mrs. Staunton.

"Not yet. I thought it would be well to get acclimated, as it were, before I ventured away from New York."

"You will have it to do over again," said Mrs. Staunton. "We are very different. Here money is king and god, and ——" Mrs. Staunton cast a disdainful glance round the brilliant and beautiful and even dazzling grand tier. "You see the result. Really, New York is becoming intolerably vulgar. I come here rarely, and leave as soon as I decently can. But one can't stay here even for a few days without being corrupted. The very language is corrupt here, and among those who call themselves the best people."

"Really! Really, now!" said Frothingham.

"Indeed, yes. In Boston even the lower classes speak English."

"You don't say." Frothingham's drawl was calm; he put upon his eyeglass the burden of looking astonished interest.

"It must fret your nerves to listen to the speech here," continued Mrs. Staunton. "It's a dialect as harsh and vulgar—as most of the voices."

"It will be a great pleasure to hear the language spoken as it is at home—though I can't say that I mind it here. Yes—I shall be glad to see Boston."

Mrs. Staunton lifted her eyebrows and looked politely amused. "But we don't speak as you speak in England. I didn't say that."

"Oh—I thought you were saying that they spoke English at Boston."

"So I did. I mean that we speak correctly. You English speak very incorrectly. Your upper class is even more slovenly in that respect than your middle class."

Frothingham looked interest and inquiry. "Ah—yes—quite so," he said. "I believe we do let our middle class look after all that sort of thing. It saves us a lot of bother."

"I'm glad you admit the truth." Mrs. Staunton looked gracious and triumphant. "Last winter we had the president of one of the colleges at Oxford with us—a very narrow man."

"Frightful persons, all that sort, I think," said Frothingham.

"I'm not astonished that you think so," replied Mrs. Staunton. "He—it was Mr. Stebbins—scoffed at the idea that Boston spoke English. He insisted that whatever your upper class speaks is English, that they have the right to determine the language."

That was Frothingham's own notion, but he gave no sign. "Stebbins is a hideous old jabberwock," he said, glad that the orchestra was beginning.

He had accidentally but naturally stumbled into the road to Mrs. Staunton's good graces. She wanted acquiescent listeners only; he disliked talking and abhorred argument. She was living at the Waldorf also, and this gave him his opportunity. She found him most agreeable. He had the great advantage of being free all day, while her New York men friends were at work then—and she did not like women. She insisted it was only the New York woman—"so trivial, so childish in her tastes for show and for farcical amusements"—that she did not like; but the fact was that she did not like any women anywhere. Nominally, she was in New York to visit her sister, Mrs. Findlay, but she rarely saw her. "I can't endure staying in Henrietta's house," she explained to Frothingham. "She has fallen from grace. If anything, she out-Herods the New York women—always the way with renegades. And she lets her housekeeper and her butler run her household—dust everywhere, things going to ruin, the servants often drunk. If I were in the house I could not be silent; so I stay at a hotel when I make my annual visit to her."

She invited Frothingham to come to her at Boston in the second week in January—and he accepted. She had said never a word to him about her niece, Cecilia Allerton, and for that very reason he knew that she was revolving some plan for bringing them together. He also knew that Cecilia Allerton's father, head of the great Boston banking house of Allerton Brothers & Monson, was rich enough to give his daughter the dower necessary to her admission into the Gordon-Beauvais family.

In the two weeks between Mrs. Staunton's departure and his engagement to follow her he did not neglect his business. But his assiduity was wasted. He saw chances to marry, and marry well—but no dowers worth his while. Many mothers beamed on him and their daughters brightened at his approach; but not one of the families that might have had him for the faintest hinting showed any matrimonial interest in him. One mother, Mrs. Brandon, actually snubbed him as if he were a mere vulgar, poor and untitled American or fortune-hunter—and the snub was unprovoked, as he was only courteous to Miss Brandon. When Frothingham laughed over this incident to Honoria she said: "Mrs. Brandon purposes to marry Estelle to Walter Summit."

"That chuckle-head? Why, I found him in the cloak-room at the Merivale dance the other night sitting with his big damp hands in his lap and his mouth hanging open. And he wasn't drunk, either."

"But Estelle isn't marrying him. She's marrying his twenty millions. With what she'll inherit from her father and her uncle that will make her the third richest woman in New York. The fact that Walter is slightly imbecile is rather in his favor—she'll have a free hand, and that's everything where a woman's ambitious. If you Englishmen hadn't the reputation of being masterful in your own households you'd have less difficulty in marrying over here. It was a bad day for English marriages when the American woman learned that England is a man's country. A girl brought up as our girls are nowadays hates to abdicate—and she doesn't have to if she marries an American."

"I've heard that all women like a master," suggested Frothingham.

"So do men. Every one likes to bow to real superiority and serve it, when he or she finds it. But the difficulty comes in trying to convince a man or a woman that he or she has met a superior."

"Well, then—perhaps women are more easily convinced than men."

Honoria smiled satirically. "They seem to be," she replied, "because they are prudent. But if some husbands only knew what their wives really thought, they might be less easy in their vanity than they are."

"That isn't true of our English women," said Frothingham.

"No—and why? Because, milord, they don't think."

"Well—my wife can do as she jolly pleases if she'll only let me alone."

"If she's an American you may be sure she will do as she jolly pleases—and you may also be sure that it won't please you to be jolly as she does it."

Just then a servant came to say that Catherine was at the door in her carriage and wished to know whether Honoria was at home. Honoria looked at Frothingham inquiringly.

"As you please," said Frothingham, settling his eyeglass firmly and clearing his face of expression.

Honoria left him in the large drawing-room and waited for Catherine in the adjoining smaller room. "Lord Frothingham is here," she said in an undertone, after they had kissed each the other.

Catherine paled and her eyes shifted. "Does he know I'm here?" she asked.

"Yes," replied Honoria, "but you needn't see him if you do not wish."

Catherine reflected. "I'm certain to meet him again some time, ain't I, dear?" she said. "And it might be more awkward than this."

She advanced boldly with Honoria and put out her hand to him, her face flushing and a delightful pleading look in her eyes. "I'm so glad to see you again, Lord Frothingham," she said.

"Ah—thank you—a great pleasure to me also, I'm sure," he answered in his most expressionless tone. "Are you living in town?"

"We came up yesterday—to stay. Won't you come to see us? Are you at the Waldorf? I do hope we can get you for a dinner mamma's arranging for the latter part of next week."

"Very good of you. But I'm just off to Boston."

He shook hands with her, then with Honoria. At the door he turned and a faint smile showed in his eyeglass and at the corners of his mouth. "Oh, I almost forgot—give my regards to Wallingford—when you see him—won't you?"

Catherine looked gratefully at him. "Thank you—thank you," she said. "I know he'll be glad of a friendly message from you. He's very fond of you."

"Really?" drawled Frothingham. "That's charming!" He smiled with good-natured raillery. "He had such a quaint way of showing it that I wasn't quite certain."

When he had bowed and dropped the heavy portière behind him Catherine went to the window. She stood there until she had seen him enter his hansom and drive away.

"How beautifully he dresses," she said absently to Honoria. "And what distinguished manners he has—as if he'd been used to being a gentleman for ages and ages."

She seated herself near the fire—the tea-table was between her and Honoria. "You didn't know that we were engaged, did you?" she went on, looking dreamily into the fire.

"Were you?" said Honoria—she never betrayed confidences.

"Yes. But I broke it off."

"Why?"

"I think," Catherine answered slowly, "I think perhaps it was because I didn't feel at home with him—and I do with—Joe. He knows how to manage me."

"Joe? Why, I thought you disliked him."

"So did I think so." Catherine sighed. "I wish," she said after a moment, "that Joe had Beauvais House and—the title."

A Window-Side Vineyard

IN ALL probability, very few untraveled Americans have ever seen a grapevine growing in a flower-pot. For the most part we have been content with growing the tender varieties far enough south to enable them to live through the winter outdoors, planting only the hardy sorts in the colder parts of this very extensive country. In Europe, on the other hand, where fruit brings enormous prices, especially when out of season, hot-house grapes grown in pots are common.

About a year ago the Agricultural Department began to experiment in this direction, and now announces that any one who is willing to take a little trouble can have the finest and tenderest French and Italian grapes fruiting in his yard year after year, while any one with a small conservatory can make these fruit in winter time and can then put them out of the way and make room for plants of other species.

Heretofore these fine European grapes have not been grown in the north or east of the United States.

The vines are grown from cuttings, treated exactly as any other cuttings are treated, except that they are rooted under shelter in pots or boxes and allowed to become thoroughly established. Later, if intended for winter fruiting, they are forced in the greenhouse in early spring, then pruned back severely and set out of doors in pots, against a lattice or sunny wall, and allowed to ripen their wood.

About October, when their leaves have all fallen, they are cut back again and moved to the greenhouse, where they at once put forth fruit buds and in a few weeks are covered with blooms and leaves.

Along in January they ripen their fruits, after which they may be moved to the cellar or any other protected place and allowed to lie dormant until the approach of spring.

If intended for summer fruiting they are treated in the fall like any other tender plant which it is desired to carry through the winter: cut back, and taken to the pit or cellar and allowed to remain there until the approach of warm weather again.

A ten-inch pot, which is plenty large enough for a vine of almost any size, is easy to handle.

Like Lending at Good Interest on "Gilt Edge" Security

The Majestic Copper Mining and Smelting Co., in Beaver County, Utah, has ore lying on its dumps worth between $1,500,000.00 and $2,000,000.00 and several million dollars more all ready for mining—ore blocked out or in sight.

THESE are simple facts easily determined. The entire capitalization of this Company, which owns eight groups of mines, namely: Hoosier Boy, Vicksburg, Harrington-Hickory, Old Hickory, O. K., Larkspur, Copperfield and Treasure Groups—wonderfully rich in Copper, Gold, Silver, Lead, Iron and Zinc, is but $6,000,000.00. The mines are estimated by the leading mining experts to be worth many times the capitalization, and still the Majestic Company is selling some of its treasury stock at a price, $7.50 (par value $10.00), which will quickly raise the necessary money to complete its development work and make the last payments on its smelting plant. This plant will be in running order in a few weeks.

Once the smelters are running, the "Majestic" will be absolutely independent, as it owns outright all of its wonderfully rich property.

The price of stock will be advanced in February and only persons writing in at once will be able to secure stock at the present figure.

We will mail free handsome 44-page illustrated book, "ABOVE AND BELOW THE SURFACE," which fully describes this great group of mines. Every statement we make is literally and exactly true, and may be verified by a visit to the mines with one of our parties of investors. Private car with every convenience leaves in a few days. Send in reservation now and pay for the stock when proof positive regarding its value is given you. Letters and telegrams will have immediate attention.

A Woman's Washington

By The Congressman's Wife

SURELY the language of the human face is universal, and any one to be convinced of this would need only to sit in the galleries of Congress and watch the faces of our legislators just before a holiday adjournment, and then again later, just after the play-spell is over. For if there ever was a shorthand of the human mind it is crowded into every face on the floor below and is easily read by any one, whether he is a student of Lavater or not, and one cannot help thinking of the expressive pictures on old-time medicine bottles of "before and after." I sat in the gallery the day of adjournment, waiting to bear Robert away to a function. Every man was shaking hands and smiling. Quips and jests flew about like confetti at Mardi Gras. Some were going to rush off up North to catch up with their legislatures, or patch up their fences, or hunt up coal along with the Christmas tree. Some were going South to thaw out their orange groves, while a few, with knowing looks on their faces, were going to stay here to "look after the President," and incidentally work up a little frost for Cuban reciprocity, but all were hopeful, buoyant and smiling, for school had let out for two weeks.

Then when they had assembled again after the recess, I drove up to the Capitol to join Robert and Senator P——, for Senator P—— was giving a little informal luncheon in his committee-room. I asked in surprise:

"What's the matter with Congress?"

"Why?" queried Robert and Senator P—— together.

"Well, I've noticed all over the Capitol this morning that every man has a look as though he had just sipped hemlock and was awaiting his final end, like poor old Socrates," said I.

"No man ought to look as though he had sipped hemlock on the Senate side of the Capitol, Mrs. Slocum, after the munificent invitations which your Sergeant-at-Arms, Ransdell, has just issued," said a young Member of the House, who is reported to be grooming for the Senate, and who was one of our party.

Robert and Senator Blank smiled, and Mrs. Blank and I said:

"We have not heard of any munificent invitations——"

"Oh, you're not included," said Robert. "Ransdell has just secured two hundred and fifty tons of coal and he has decided to keep open house up in the Capitol, and has asked the whole Senate to bring their cots up here and camp down and bask in the warmth of old King Cole."

"Think of having two hundred and fifty tons of coal on hand for no other purpose than to keep our talk-box going," said the Member of the House, "when most of us poor mortals can buy coal only by the basketful. Butler, of Pennsylvania, says, and he ought to know, that it's even worse than that, for a man takes his money in his basket when he goes to buy coal nowadays, and brings the coal home in his pocket."

"It isn't coal that makes an old fellow like me sober, Mrs. Slocum," said our host. "It's the fear that any minute I shall hear that bell jangle for executive session. They have a way up in the Senate Chamber of waiting till a man becomes comfortably settled with his friends at luncheon, then they hunt up some two-penny appointment and go into executive session with it and bring us all on the run. I've never forgotten Hoar's luncheon last winter. He never got in a bite with his guests."

And the Senator prepared to attack a bowl of bread and milk that was flanked by a generous wedge of pumpkin pie, for, no matter what fashionable dainties the rest of us were being served with, the Senator was always true to pie and milk. Then he went on:

"We have come to the time of year when we have got to become sober-minded, for we must buckle down to work. This is the crucial period in a short session when a man has got to maintain a nice balance between zeal and moderation, for fire must not burn his zeal, nor yet frost touch his moderation, and time is short and——"

"And constituents clamoring," put in the Member of the House.

"Yes, and it's also the time of the year for everybody to get out a set of new rules," said Senator Blank testily. "If you happen to go to any of the Departments on pressing business it is to find a brand-new roll of red-tape unrolled in every direction, and notices posted up in the corridors that make a man go on tiptoe lest he unwittingly violate the law of the land. Why, these notices in the Departments seem to have become a craze."

"Ah! but you should have seen the masterpiece in the way of a notice that I once saw," said Senator P—— with a reminiscent twinkle. "It was over in the Interior Department more than thirty years ago, and was the work of a backwoodsman who had never been off his own patch of land until he was made a Commissioner in the Land Office. This notice read, 'Clerks must not pamberate in the corduroys or they'll get ketched up with.'"

This raised a shout of laughter, and Mrs. Blank said:

"That order surely must have been written by some relative of a certain Secretary's wife, of about that same period, who, when she was remonstrated with for making her official visits in the Department wagon, said in a vernacular entirely her own, 'Oh! law me, there ain't no skulduggery about me!'"

"Ah!" said the Member of the House, taking up the chain of yarns, "I was up at the Treasurer's office yesterday to get some information about this plethora of gold in the vaults and its effect on our currency and on our world relations in general, and I found the whole office with a big smile on its face. They had just received a letter which contained the halves of four one-dollar notes, notes that had evidently been in a scrapping match. The letter said:

"'I haf a fight with the boarding-lady, an' she grab an' tear haf the mon', an' then she burn the mon' through madness, an' I onderstan' that the mon' vault of this land gif me back all what I lose to the boarding-lady, which I hope herewith——'"

"I suppose," said I, when the laugh had subsided, "that since Treasurer Roberts is starting the new year with more gold in his vaults that this or any other Government on earth ever had before, he was willing to redeem these torn bills?"

"Oh, yes, of course. They were going to redeem four-fifths of it, but that letter about the boarding-lady will be on tap for many a day in that office, and also the letter of a little chap, who wrote:

"'I ain' got any boots, an' it's mighty cold trampin' over the mountain paths to school, an' I'd like three or four dollars to buy me some; please, please, Mr. Treasury, send me some for boots.'"

"What did they do about the boy?" we asked interestedly.

"Oh, the Chief Clerk wrote that the Treasury could not send the money, but that the clerks in the office would forward the amount as a gift from Santa Claus, and they did forward the money and they got a rapturous letter of thanks which wound up:

"'The boots is just O. K., an' when Billy Myers tackled me for a lickin' at the crossroads I just up with them boots and let fly, an' golly! how they could kick!'"

The spirit of that boy was appreciated by every one of us. Then Robert, who was anxious to get into the conversation, began with a yarn.

"I know of one happening," he said, "in a Department that was somewhat in the nature of a boomerang. I know of one head of a bureau who made a new rule last week which was not posted up in the corridors. It was about reporting tardy clerks, and went into secret effect on the second of January, and fifteen minutes after it was in working order that chief caught his own brother and his own disbursing clerk, to the intense delight of all the other clerks in that bureau, at whom, of course, the order had been aimed."

"But," said I commendingly, "there's a good deal of the 'fat king and lean beggar' fairness in that chief's policy that I like."

"Yes, but the joke was," said Robert, "that that chief had a net out for minnows and he caught a whale."

Then Senator P——, as though to change the theme, said to me:

"I hear you were out in Colorado this autumn helping on the campaign for our old friend Wolcott and that the canvass among the women was great. What with a box of candy for every Democratic woman voter and a feather boa for every Republican woman voter, the whole State was in an uproar."

"Yes," chimed in Robert in high glee; "Mrs. Slocum thinks universal suffrage as

The South American El Dorado

By JACK ST. ARMONT

SO LIVELY is the interest aroused in the subject of Venezuela that everything written is attentively read. Notwithstanding the fact that Caracas, the Capital of the country, is but one week's run from New York, and, if we are to consider our most southerly possession, Porto Rico, but forty hours from the United States, few Americans have a very clear idea of the wonderful rich country lying so near at hand. The dazzling stories told by the old Spanish conquerors, long thought to be highly exaggerated, are more or less believed by the very few adventurous explorers who have given time to investigation and research. The gold mines of Venezuela have produced $40,000,000 during the last 20 years, under the most crude methods of management. Silver and copper and other metals have been mined in a desultory way for years by the natives whenever they could spare the time from their fiestas.

VENEZUELA

is the most fertile country in the world, possessing most excellent geographical and commercial advantages, and, in fact, offers opportunities and resources such as few countries enjoy. The southern part of the country where it borders on Brazil, in the equatorial belt, produces in its natural state a plant strictly indigenous to the country, the Hevea brasiliensis, known commonly as the rubber tree, and so great is the demand for rubber that the natural forests of Venezuela are to-day regarded by authorities as of more value than the richest gold mine. Gold mines will exhaust; rubber forests protected in their natural state will produce indefinitely, a tree will continue yielding its milk for 35 or 40 years, and, meanwhile, the young plants constantly growing will perpetuate the forest of "gold-bearing trees" to the end of time. From the ports of Para and Manaos on the Amazon were shipped last year $50,000,000 worth of the highest priced rubber in the world. Besides the Hevea brasiliensis, the forests are filled with rosewood, teak, mahogany and other precious woods, with the cacao, cinchona, cocoa nut, tonka, vanilla and hundreds of necessary products of commerce.

In the Light of Recent Events

America and Venezuela will doubtless grow very close together within the next few years, as Venezuelans do not possess the necessary vim and energy to win success in the development of their country. They depend upon the United States for their imports and regard her as the natural market for their exports. Let good, live, energetic, resourceful men take hold of this country and develop it on the same lines as have been followed in the North American Continent, and I predict that in a few years Venezuela will have developed under this energy to one of the richest producing countries on the globe. Already far-seeing and shrewd financiers, who have amassed vast fortunes in America, are seizing the opportunities offered, and to-day a powerful United States corporation is operating and rapidly perfecting its system in the southern part of Venezuela, using the same methods which made for the phenomenal success of the great Hudson's Bay Company in trading for furs in North America, and the Company which founded the John Jacob Astor fortune. This Company owns one million acres, or 1,400 square miles, comprising the largest standing body of natural rubber trees in the world, a careful "cruising" of which has shown an average of more than six trees to the acre, fifteen years and over old, to gather the milk from which will require the labor of 40,000 people, most of whom are available. Through this enormous tract flows the which connects the Rio Orinoco and the Rio Negro, and the Company owns a strip three miles wide on one side and five miles on the other throughout the entire 175 miles of this river. At convenient points along the river are being established "trading posts" where will be carried merchandise consisting of calico, beads, tobacco, food stuffs and all the varied commodities used by the natives, which will be traded for rubber. Situated so far from cities or villages, the native has no use for money and is dependent upon the trader; their wants are few, and in the majority of cases actual necessities are a luxury. This great Company finds itself placed in the same relationship with the natives of South America as was the Hudson's Bay Company in the Northland and the West India Company in the Indies. For nearly 1000 miles up the Amazon and the Negro the country lying tributary holds untold possibilities, which only await the advent of the trading post, conducted on a fairly honest basis, to develop its wonderful wealth. It is the purpose of the Para Rubber Plantation Company to trade with the natives far into the interior, and to that end will send its factors with great stores of merchandise into these regions, where they will be welcomed as benefactors. They will be in a position to barter for the products of the rubber forest and the treasure trove of this vast storehouse of nature. Operating their own boats, the transportation problem is solved, and the profits possible in this business are enormous. The management of the Company's affairs in the interior is in the most competent hands. Their chief, Mr. Kenneth Rose, has been for years a resident of this country and is a thorough business man and trader. His headquarters are located at the main station of the Company at San Carlos, at the mouth of the Rio Casiquiare where it joins the Rio Negro. Under Mr. Rose is a corps of efficient men, several of whom could fill his position should the necessity arise, so that by no known possibility could the business suffer through lack of men thoroughly trained for this peculiar work. Every detail has been so carefully worked out and well systematized as to give ample assurance of absolutely trustworthy and efficient handling of affairs at that end of the line.

It is Desired to Call the Attention of the thoughtful reader of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST to the unprecedented opportunity offered to the person of small or large means, and in every walk of life, to so invest his earnings or surplus capital as to insure an income for years to come, and one which may steadily increase year by year, giving a competency for old age far better than life insurance or any other form of assets to be left to the loved ones, a security as stable as a Government bond. The capital stock of the Company is divided into 500,000 shares of common stock, having a par value of $10 per share, at which price it is offered to the public and for a short time only. Application will be made to list the stock on the exchange. There is but one kind of stock; a fortune has already been expended in acquiring the property and establishing trading stations and transportation equipment, and the public is invited into an established business already earning large returns, their money to be used for further developments. It is figured that each tree will produce five pounds of rubber every season, which costs, packed for export, 35 cents per pound, and sells for 90 cents per pound in New York to-day. 2,000 laborers will earn a six per cent. dividend upon the entire capital stock, and when it is considered that it will require the 40,000 laborers available to gather the entire crop each season, the figures exceed comprehension. Besides the profit on the rubber one must figure at least 50 per cent. net made on the merchandise traded for the commodity, and the extraordinary profit realized from the trading posts up the river. With this great earning capacity the selling price of the stock is likely to rapidly increase as soon as the entire project is in full working shape. If 2,000 laborers can earn a six per cent. dividend, it takes but a moment's calculation to figure the earnings possible when 40,000 are employed.

The Hudson's Bay Company

has paid millions of dollars in dividends to its stockholders, and its stock to-day is worth four thousand for one, and none for sale. They traded with the fur hunters; this Company trades with the rubber hunters. Why should not this stock be worth as much as the Hudson's Bay Company, eventually, as the uses for rubber are constantly increasing? As the fur-bearing animals decreased, so is the wild rubber-bearing tree decreasing in number throughout the world. Tapping the wild trees, under competent overseers, and cared for as this Company will care for them, perpetuates the industry for all time, and is the only way by which this most valuable commodity can be conserved. An illustrated booklet treating on this subject and all desired information will be furnished upon application to PARA RUBBER PLANTATION CO., Dept. A, 52 Broadway, New York City, or Canadian Office, 64 Canada Life, Montreal, Canada.

managed in Colorado is a magnificent success. Ask her how it was that she, a non-resident, became the possessor of both a box of candy and a feather boa. It will take me all the rest of my term to square myself with either Teller or Wolcott, whichever wins out."

Whereat the Member of the House came to my rescue:

"Let them laugh, Mrs. Slocum; you know a kite never soars to the skies with the current but against it. I was asking Mondell, of Wyoming, the other day how the universal suffrage plan works in his State, and he was most emphatic for it. He says it works first-rate and that there is a good deal of variety and gayety at the polls. According to Mondell a man in his State practically has to dance through the campaign, and he must be a good dancer, too, for the fair ones won't put up with a lagging, indifferent partner. During a canvass when the speech-making is over they clear their halls and everybody turns in and trips the light fantastic. A man has to be as careful in his choice of a partner as he is in his choice of his candidate. He must not pick out all the pretty girls and waltz with them, but he must do the Lancers and Virginia reel with their mothers and aunts, for the mothers and aunts like to dance, and as they do most of the voting the wisdom of the Lancers and Virginia reel is obvious. So, according to my colleague, a Wyoming campaign is rather a complex matter."

"And speaking of complex campaigns," said Senator P——, "how is the campaign coming on, socially, here this winter?"

"Oh," said Mrs. Blank, "we have started out with two or three mild sensations. One is the entirely novel sensation of having an eligible bachelor Secretary, with every girl in town doing her best to find where the chief of the Navy is vulnerable. Another sensation was when the Spanish Minister and his suite, and the new Cuban Minister and his suite, and the Porto Rican Commissioner all elected to call at the same time at Admiral Dewey's on New Year's Day. And the third sensation is that the Cabinet ladies have finally concluded that they have 'slumbered long enough in the tents of their fathers,' and they are going to keep open house on every Wednesday, and return all their visits. My dinner-book is already four weeks deep, and everything else is in proportion."

"Isn't the dinner mania in this town stupendous?" said the Member of the House, who has just begun his dinner career and is not inured yet. "It makes a man wish he could belong to that tribe in India who live wholly on pleasing odors."

"But the dinners are all shorter and simpler," breathed Robert with satisfaction.

"That is true," said I, "but they are also full of wonderful surprises this winter: just fancy ham masquerading as a fashionable joint, or the good old-fashioned pork and beans of our forefathers frisking at a smart dinner, on the menu, as 'Fèves de Marais à l'Ecarlate,' and sodden, heavy plum-pudding covered over inch thick with white French sauce and the whole frozen stiff, staring up at you from your plate, and worst of all, half the women around the table decked with black pearls."

"For my part," spoke up the Member of the House, "I am glad to see the old-fashioned viands again. I like the simple dishes they serve at the White House. I remained to luncheon the other day with the President. We had a little matter to discuss and carried it to the luncheon-table with us. We had bouillon and lamb chops and peas, with no frills, and a bit of fruit, the President winding up with a monstrous cup of tea, and it was as jolly and bright as possible. And last summer," he continued, "I went to Oyster Bay by appointment and was asked to take luncheon. There was an Englishman there, Mr. B——, and also William C. Whitney was a guest. And the luncheon was as unpretending as possible, winding up with watermelon and tea and served by two brisk maids. I was curious, after the manner of all Americans, to know the Britisher's opinion of our President, and I learned sometime afterward that he had spoken in London of his impression in this way:

"'President Roosevelt is an ideal model of one of our British 'squires of the old school, plus much vivacity and a manner of speaking that impresses one as being tremendously in earnest. You feel that no trivialities can encumber speech like that. He seems to bite off each word from a solid staff of truth, exposing incidentally a set of the finest teeth, that do not gleam with gold, as ninety-nine per cent. of American teeth do, and this luncheon with him was not only the best but the brightest meal I had in America.'"

THE OPTION

(Concluded from Page 7)

"That's what you found," said Burnham, continuing to laugh. "And how did you find out that?"

"Mr. Eckert is in love with Daisy Brown and tells her a great deal, and, of course, she tells me. I don't understand you," she continued, gazing at her father, who continued to laugh immoderately.

"Never mind me," he said. "And so Northup and Eckert didn't take the land because you told Northup that?"

"But they did," she cried triumphantly.

"What!" exclaimed Burnham, falling into sudden silence and straightening himself up.

"Mr. Northup would not use the information that he got in that way and he didn't tell Mr. Eckert and Mr. Eckert bought the land."

"He did!" called Burnham, starting to his feet.

"Yes, papa. What is it?"

"Never mind. Go on."

"I never heard of anything finer. Mr. Northup's showing such niceness about it and such consideration for me."

"I should say so!" said Burnham, picking up his cigar which had fallen to the floor as he laughed again. But he laughed with a short, sharp laugh this time—not the laugh of full, contented enjoyment of a moment before.

"I don't understand you," Julia cried.

"It's too good a one on me to keep," Burnham answered. "Though, mind you, don't say anything about it this time. Don't you see I told what I did on purpose to have you tell Northup?"

"Papa!" exclaimed the now scandalized daughter.

"I know that it wasn't quite up to the elevated heights of good taste that seems to be the thing. But I haven't been accustomed to breathing that attenuated atmosphere. I told you that I was a pirate and a shark."

"But, papa——" remonstrated Julia.

"If you wanted something dramatic, here it is. Northup and Eckert had their option on the land. The plant cannot possibly go anywhere else than at Rocky Point. If they had let it go we could have got it. If they could be made to think that the company was going on the river they would not buy."

"It wasn't right," said Julia decidedly.

"You told," her father continued, "but he doesn't seem to have behaved as I expected."

"It was outrageous," asserted Julia hotly. "You should not have done it."

"I know that," answered Burnham, laughing again, "but you see there are inconveniences in having a pirate for a father."

"It seems nicer in a book," gasped Julia.

"It is," assented Burnham emphatically. "I don't defend myself and I don't forgive myself."

"But I do, papa," she said gently. "If—if you'll promise never to do anything like it again."

"I do," replied Burnham decidedly.

"And," cried Julia ecstatically, "I've been surrounded by mysteries."

The door opened and her own maid appeared.

"Mr. Northup, Miss Julia," said the woman.

"Oh," Julia exclaimed, jumping up, "I—I must go at once."

"Well, why don't you?" her father asked as she lingered.

"Because—because," she stammered. "But you don't bear any ill will toward Mr. Northup for getting the land?"

"No," asserted Burnham, bringing his fist down on the arm of his chair. "I may have been a good deal of what they call me—I've had to be in my time—but I can understand something else in another. Any young man that'll be guilty of that kind of foolishness is all right—and the kind to tie up to."

"Oh, papa, I'm so glad," Julia cried, darting at her astonished parent, kissing him quickly and vanishing from the room.

In the dimly lit drawing-room a little later Northup spoke with the manner of one coming down to earth again—as if struggling for a realization of mundane things after a flight in the clouds.

"I must see Mr. Burnham. I hope that he doesn't disapprove of me."

"He admires you immensely," said Julia as she leaned her head against his shoulder, "just as much as I do."

"I wonder what he'll say."

"I know," she replied.

"What?"

"What any properly constituted parent should say," she murmured happily—"'Bless you, my children, bless you!'"

A Personal Note to the Public

I firmly believe that if every man and woman of moderate means, young and old, married or not, would read the series "How We Saved for a Home" in The Ladies' Home Journal, that thousands would date the beginning of their true living from that day.

Here are 100 young couples, and men with families, working girls and unmarried young men, who tell, step by step and dollar by dollar, how each now own their own home, — some on salaries of $14. per week: none higher than $30. The average is $15.

For Only One Dollar you can have this series beginning with the February issue, just out.

It Sings Everything

It Plays Everything

A Real Musical Instrument

Not a mere novelty—for curiosity and fun. The Victor is a musical instrument, like a piano. More than a piano; it is orchestra if you want it; band if you want it; piano if you want it; voice if you want it.

And it plays itself. It is not like an idle piano standing around with nobody to play it.

It brings the talent of the great singers, players, orchestras, entertainers of every sort, right to your home. You could not get the originals—even for a single performance—for less than $100,000, if you get them at all. You can have them, with the Victor—whenever you want them, as long as you want them—for a few dollars.

There can be but one best. The judges at the Pan-American Exposition unanimously decided that the Victor was it.

Send for catalogue of the new Victor (with the rigid arm); also for catalogue of VICTOR AND MONARCH RECORDS the best records in the world: first, because they fit the Victor; second, because they give the finest details of sound and expression; third, because they are almost indestructible; and fourth, because of the immense library from which you can select.

A LIFE STRUGGLE

THE TRAGIC PROGRESS AND DISAPPEARANCE OF MME. ELOA, WHO SUCCUMBED TO A PERSECUTION FROM WHICH NOT EVEN LEO XIII COULD RELIEVE HER

I AM GOING to publish one more narrative of a mysterious event in which I was involved now many years ago, an event which left upon me a profound and almost painful impression, the memory of which now and again arises to besiege and to darken with melancholy shadows my thoughts and imagination.

This memory once laid, I shall begin in these columns the publication of my more purely professional memoirs. I shall recount my early years, the elements of chance in my existence, and the unexpected circumstances which have made me now, during thirty-two years, a journalist whose name is sufficiently widespread, and arouses sufficient curiosity in the public, to justify my pretension in setting down my recollections.

But I have desired to preface my memoirs with these four preliminary articles revealing certain unknown incidents in which I have been mixed up, together with the rôle which I played in these adventures and the intimate bearing of these and similar events upon my journalistic activity; for these chapters, if they do not in themselves constitute "memoirs," yet belong to that class of incidents which a man who has taken part in them reveals to the public only when their revelation can in no way be disastrous. Moreover, when my readers shall have perused the following pages, and followed the whole history of this dramatic narrative, I shall be sufficiently well known to them for them to be able to follow attentively the consecutive chapters of my life, where I recount the difficulties I have had to overcome, my entrance into journalism, and the acts which, as a journalist, I have been able to accomplish, and which I should like to preserve in the memory of certain persons.

A journalist's life is so ephemeral, what he writes is so speedily swept away by the wind blowing at the moment, and the sheet on which he writes has so rarely time to dry before falling into oblivion, that the journalist who has reached the end of his career perceives, almost with fright, that nothing tangible and visible remains standing of the construction reared on the sand of a newspaper, and that if he wishes to live on, even for a passing moment, he must go back over his life's work and try to coördinate and construct it anew, so that it may assume the shape of an edifice and resist that forgetful indifference of his contemporaries under which, once he has quitted them, his memory lies buried.

In February, 1882 (for it was during the years following upon the Congress of Berlin that the most mysterious incidents in my career took place), I was living in the Avenue Marceau, then called the Avenue Josephine after the Empress, but which with the advent of the Republic changed both its sex and its name. One morning, while I was at work in my study, my servant announced to me that a lady, the bearer of a letter of introduction from the manager of the Times, wished to speak to me.

The manager of the Times was then Mr. John MacDonald, a Scotchman, a rigid Protestant, exceedingly simple in his habits, and by no means easily got at by the numerous persons who naturally besieged a man in his position. During the seven years in which he had been manager of the Times, as successor of Mr. Mowbray Morris, he had only once sent me a letter of introduction, namely, to introduce to me Mr. George Buckle, then on the Times staff, but now editor-in-chief of that paper. I realized instantly, therefore, and especially on learning that my visitor was a lady, that thus heralded she could not be the première venue; that, either because of her own merits or because of those of her sponsors to Mr. MacDonald, she must be a person of importance whom I was bound to receive with consideration. I ordered her to be ushered into the salon, as my writing-room was somewhat encumbered, and I went in to see her.

—FLUNG UPON THE AIR A HORRID CRY OF ANGER AND DESPAIR

On entering the drawing-room I found her seated in one corner in the shadow holding in her hand a letter bearing the stamp of the Times, which, rising, she immediately delivered. Mr. MacDonald's letter, as is the English way, was closed, for even in these details English and French customs differ. In France letters of introduction are left unsealed. French politeness requires that the person introduced should know in advance the terms in which he is presented. In England, where pure formalities have less importance than the real thing, a letter of introduction is sealed, so that the writer may be free to say only what he wishes to say, and not be obliged, for politeness' sake, to write what from conviction he would not be inclined to say.

Mr. MacDonald's letter introduced to me Madame Georgina Eloa, and informed me that Mr. MacDonald did not give me her family name, which she desired to keep secret. He earnestly insisted that I should do all in my power to satisfy the "bearer of these lines," her cause being most interesting and one to the success of which he should be most happy to contribute. He added that the lady herself would give me verbally all the information which I might wish to ask of her, and that, in obliging her, I should be rendering a service to persons dear to my manager while defending a cause worthy of my intervention.

Having taken cognizance of this letter I turned toward its bearer and asked her by what name I should address her. She replied that I must call her Madame Eloa, and added that she had something confidential to ask of me. I begged her accordingly to come into my working-room and she rose to follow me. Then for the first time I could examine her at my ease and I was forthwith struck by the strangeness of her person. Very tall, dressed in a dark gray robe of an extremely delicate stuff, with her mantle folded under her left arm, her figure seemed to be of an extreme elegance. She had the supple and slender grace and the refined vigor of a huntress of the forest or the mountain. Her hands, carefully gloved, had an unmistakably aristocratic air; her neck, fairly vigorous, but somewhat long, remained flexible and graceful, and to crown all, an energetic but beautiful head, high-bred and melancholy, constituted an ensemble the rare beauty of which deeply impressed me. Her hair was more than dark, and slightly wavy, with a fine lustre as the sun shone upon it through the window of the room. Her brow was beautiful in its intelligence and energy, while her dark blue eyes seemed darker than they really were under the shadow of her long lashes. Her nose, proud, not to say high-born, was of a profile absolutely correct, and her mouth, a little large, but richly colored when she smiled—which was rare—displayed teeth which, if somewhat big, were dazzlingly white; while her cheeks, pale but warm and full, were slightly elongated toward a chin, the girlish and poetic outlines of which, in spite of the air of energy, gave to this physiognomy, in many respects so strange, an expression of infantile sweetness, softening and pacifying, as it were, this willful, proud, imperious and saddened feminine face.

The Strange Persecution of the Inconnue

I was struck by the majestic and imposing prestige attaching to her person, and by the aristocratic finesse which gave her a sort of royal air, and it was not without embarrassment, caused by the grandeur of her attitude, that I besought her to tell me what had brought her to see me. She took a seat, and in a voice sonorous and tender, and exceedingly flexible, but easily warming with passion, even becoming now and then somewhat hoarse and rough, she said:

"Ever since I have been able to think for myself and to reflect upon my own feelings and emotions I have been a prey to the strangest contradictions. I am twenty-three years old, and for ten years my mind and soul have been troubled and tormented by an unending struggle. I have surrendered myself to the most ardent religious faith, given myself up to untiring charity. I have dreamed of being a saint among the saints; I have traversed this world my eyes turned ever toward Heaven, yet never have I been able to find real peace of mind. I cannot tell you now how far I have gone, nor what means I have adopted, in order to secure that peace of soul of which I am forever in search and which forever flees my footsteps. I have remained virtuous, I have preserved my honor. I have obeyed my conscience and imposed silence upon my heart. I have accepted all the severities that have been ordered by my spiritual advisers, and I have wept my eyes out in order to conjure away the sorrows which are undermining me. I fancied I had found a refuge, but I had to abandon it, and I have been once more plunged into the whirlpool of life where I remain incapable of discovering the path which I should follow.

"In all this world there is but one being whose will could calm me, the sight of whom could have an effect upon me, whose words could bend my will: it is the Pope. I want him to hear me, to listen to me. He is the shepherd of our souls, for I am a Catholic and a Roman Catholic. He is the will that directs, the force that binds, the reason that guides, the voice that speaks; and what I ask you, for I know you can do it, is to get him to receive me, to hear me, to heal me.

"I have long been seeking how to attain this object. I have made inquiries and taken advice, and finally those interested in me, powerful persons, men able to realize their desires, have asked Mr. MacDonald to give me a letter to you, a letter as urgent as possible, and to beg you in my name to open up to me the road to the Vatican and the doors behind which Leo XIII listens patiently to those who come to appeal to those infallible consolations which he holds in reserve for suffering souls seeking the path of salvation and peace. I would not and cannot tell you more at present, and it is upon what I have said that I beg you to do what you can to realize my wishes, that the Holy Father may open up to me the treasures of his bounty.

"I am leaving for Rome to-morrow. I do not ask you to give me a letter of introduction. It might be confounded in spite of you with thousands of such letters addressed to the Holy Father.

"I ask you to do what you feel at liberty to do, so that I may obtain not the audience but the kind greeting which I need. From Monday next I will go every day to the post-office in Rome for the letter in which you will announce to me either the failure or success of your efforts, and either indicate that I must renounce my hopes or point out to me the course to be taken in order to realize them."

And without waiting for an answer she handed me a sheet of paper on which was written: "Georgina Eloa, Poste Restante, à Rome," made a low bow, and then, the figure proud and erect with the head slightly bent toward the ground, she prepared to cross the salon to take her leave.

I arrested her almost imperiously, for I felt that in quitting me thus, in leaving without waiting for my reply, she was giving me a sort of order.

"Do not hurry away, Madame," said I, "for I see absolutely no means at present of attaining the end which you have in view. I do not say that if you go to Rome you will find no way of being received by the Pope, who has a prodigious faculty for displaying almost superhuman force, but as far as I am concerned I cannot give you anything but a letter of introduction, and, however pressing it may be, it would no doubt remain barren of results, or at least meet the usual fate of all such letters, and thus, as it seems to me, disappoint all your hopes. But I am myself going to Rome within a few weeks. Here is the address of a friend of mine in the Eternal City. Call there from time to time in my name in order to learn if I am shortly expected or if I have arrived, and in case you have not already succeeded in your enterprise when I arrive, ask to see me and I will consider what can be done. And now, Madame, I have only to bid you God-speed."

She remained for a moment perfectly still, a prey, as was evident, to bitter disappointment. As always, my power had been exaggerated. She had fancied that a letter from me would suffice to banish all difficulties. She thought, also, perhaps, that it was merely my own will which stood in the way of the immediate realization of her desire. She gazed at me with a saddened eye, the nostrils swelling, ready to let escape some half-word from her imperious lips. But as she gazed she no doubt read on my face an expression of real sincerity, and even of regret at being unable to be of service. Instantly her features softened. The look of anger they had worn fell from them as a mask lifted by an invisible hand. Her extremely mobile features expressed painful regret; her eye drooped toward me with a touching expression of repentance and gratitude, and with a melancholy smile she said:

"I thank you very much, ah, yes, very much. I ask your pardon for the unjust movement which you surprised. I am going to leave for Rome. I will do what I can. If I succeed I shall not trouble your stay in the Eternal City. If not, I shall follow your orders and ask you to receive me."

Whereupon, with a sovereign grace, she bowed, not, however, offering her hand, and I escorted her to the door of my apartment.

A few days later I called on Monseigneur Di Rende, the then occupant of the Nunciature in Paris, at the entrance of the Avenue Bosquet. My visit to Rome had been planned some time before, but I did not care to go thither without meeting with the reception which I had at heart. I knew I should see King Humbert and the leading personages of his Government. But I did not want this meeting to prevent my obtaining from Leo XIII the kindly reception to which I aspired.

Monseigneur Di Rende had been for some time dealing with this problem, employing in my behalf a zeal corresponding to the sympathy which he always displayed toward me, and also because convinced that in preparing my visit to the Vatican he was serving the cause which he defended. Monseigneur Di Rende had succeeded Monseigneur Czaski, who had honored me with his friendship, and he knew through his predecessor that I had certain rights to his own good will. Monseigneur Di Rende, in the post which he had held now only since a very short time, had followed the policy of his predecessor—that is to say, instead of being a partisan of reactionary ideas in France, he had become the exponent to the French Government of Leo XIII's liberal policy.

He informed me that he had every reason to believe that he would settle the question of my journey to Rome in a way agreeable to me, and he announced that in all probability he would have a favorable reply before the end of March, so that I might prepare to quit Paris toward the end of the month, so as to arrive in Rome at about the fourth of April. And indeed on March 7 he sent for me to go to see him and gave me a letter for Cardinal Jacobini, with whom he had settled the question and who was ready to receive me.

The Famous Interview with Leo XIII

A few days later I left Paris with a friend who consented to be my secretary, and I reached Rome on April 4, 1882.

I went to a hotel in the Corso where rooms had been taken for me. On the morrow I learned that King Humbert would receive me on April 8, and on April 6, after having delivered Monseigneur Di Rende's letter, Cardinal Jacobini informed me that the Holy Father would receive me on April 10, at noon, in his private oratory, for an interview. On the same day, the sixth, my servant, who accompanied me, informed me that the lady I had received some weeks before in Paris was in the small waiting-room adjoining my salon and asked to see me.

The salon doors slowly opened and I beheld Madame Eloa. She was dressed in black. Her features were sad, almost as if in pain. Hardly had she taken a seat when she burst into tears. She told me that all she had done had proved in vain, that the persons to whom she had appealed had asked her to formulate with precision the object of the audience which she desired, and that when she demurred, one and all they had refused to act. She had then appealed to Sir Augustus Paget, but he had observed to her that he was accredited to the Quirinal and could in no way serve her at the Vatican. Thereupon she had come to me, supplicating me on her knees to intervene, since I was in Rome, and to obtain for her that gracious reply which I alone could obtain. She had written to Cardinal Jacobini, and naturally her letter, somewhat obscure, had gone without reply, and she dared not write to the Pope himself from fear that the letter, by passing under Cardinal Jacobini's eyes, might entail, as far as he was concerned, not his support but his relentless opposition.

I promised her I would do what I could and bade her come to see me on April 11—that is to say, on the morrow of my audience with the Pope.

On April 8 I had with King Humbert an interview which lasted during the life of two very big cigars. On the tenth, at noon, I found myself in the anteroom, waiting to be introduced into the presence of the Holy Father. With a graciousness by which I had been deeply moved, he had informed me that he had granted an audience to a foreign lady after mine, but that, as he did not wish to be hurried by this audience, he had inverted the rôles, and was to let the lady pass before me in order to be able to remain with me without being interrupted.

Twenty minutes later I entered Leo XIII's private oratory. Later, no doubt, I shall have occasion to speak of this interview which without having been recounted has remained famous; but after two hours' conversation, recalling my promise to Eloa, I submitted the ardent prayer of my protégée to the Universal Father of Catholics.

Hardly had I broached the subject when he interrupted me. "Yes," said he, "I know, without, however, possessing definite details, the case of the person of whom you speak. One of my bishops of Great Britain has spoken of her to me. I did not suppose that you could have occasion to speak to me about her, but, since you have done so, introduce her to the Cardinal, and tell him from me to arrange with her the day when I can receive her, and that he submit this arrangement to my approval."

I warmly thanked His Holiness, as I quitted him, on receiving his final benediction.

The Fair Penitent's Joy at Her Success

On the morrow, the eleventh, Eloa came to see me. This time she offered me her delicate, aristocratic hand, which was hot and feverish. She flung herself at my feet.

"If it is a refusal which you bring me prepare my reason to receive the blow. If it be the realization of my hopes, blessed be you in advance for the good you are to do me, for during the last few days I have been troubled with insomnia due to frightful dreams that torture me, and every mortal enemy of the peace of human souls in this world seems to have laid siege to my soul and to have entered into it to inflict upon it tortures for which there is no name."

With a word I reassured her: "The Pope will receive you."

I thought for an instant that she was about to faint; then, with a cry of joy which I shall never forget, and clasping her hands, she burst into tears, exclaiming:

"My God, my Saviour, my angel who protects me, blessed be Ye!"

She was as one transfigured. A supernatural calm hovered over her visage, and her beauty, made so to say divine, radiated all about her, filling the commonplace hotel drawing-room with an air of grandeur and solemnity which produced a real emotion upon me.

Two days later I guided her into the presence of Cardinal Jacobini by that straight, interminable staircase which climbed to the very uppermost floor where the Cardinal had his study. The Under-Secretary of State had received the Holy Father's orders. He listened to Eloa with paternal kindness, mingled with a sort of tender and indulgent pity. He settled with her the day when she was to be received by the Pope, and he was about to continue the conversation when the door of his study was pushed suddenly open, and I beheld, in the ray of sunlight which penetrated thither by the door now ajar, a priest of imposing aspect, in ecclesiastical robes cut out of some heavy silk stuff, the rigid folds of which fell in long, impressive lines. The dark hair crowning a powerful forehead which sheltered deep and sombre eyes, almost hard in their gaze and veritably shining in the midst of the face, made up a sudden and unexpected vision of an incontestable beauty.

The Cardinal rose with eager deference, introduced me and gave the name of Cardinal Ledochowski. Eloa fell on her knees almost in front of the Cardinal whose pastoral ring she kissed timidly and we went out together. She enlarged on the impression made upon her by Cardinal Ledochowski, and it seemed to me that her sympathies and admiration were much more directed toward the dignified priest than toward the amiable Cardinal Jacobini who had been so gracious and pleasant, and whose sympathetic but hardly imposing manner in no way corresponded to the ecclesiastical ideal which filled Eloa's imagination.

But she had attained her end. Her joy was immense, almost overwhelming. She was to be received by the Holy Father within a few days. She entered St. Peter's to pray. My own mission was accomplished. I bade her good-by, I left Rome for Naples, and I supposed that I should never again have occasion to see her.

A few weeks after my return to Paris, just when the memory of Eloa was beginning to fade out of my mind, I received the following letter from her:

I have had the immense joy of being received by the Holy Father, and the mere sight of him sufficed to induce in me a peace of mind and a calm which for a long time I had not known. I explained to His Holiness the cause of my suffering, of which he appeared already to have had some inkling; and after what has taken place I am constrained to apprise you in turn of the object of my journey, of the nature of my struggle, and of my hopes and my defeats. You have carried delicacy so far as never to ask me what my object has been, and why I had wished to go to Rome, and it is of my own free will that I come to you now to tell you, for you must be informed in order to help me. Ever since my childhood I have been troubled with strange contradictions. I don't care to prolong my tale by relating to you my early years. But as soon as I entered upon the age of reason the struggle began in my soul between the highest good and the greatest evil, and I have been obliged to combat with the same ardor the invasion of evil when I was doing what was right as the empire of good when I felt drawn into sin. At the age of twenty, in order to escape from this battle, I entered a convent where the rigid discipline is a constant protection against human temptations. I remained there two years and was about to take definite vows when an act of startling revolt led the Superior to remove me from the convent. I was in such despair that she later took me back, but once again, just as I was to take my vows, my spirit of insubordination induced another outburst which frightened the entire Order, and I was once more excluded. Ever since then my soul has constantly been tempted to do evil. I am haunted by ideas of the greatest crimes, and I perceive clearly that my salvation or my destruction depends upon a final effort which will restore me to God or condemn me to Hell. Hence my visit to the Holy Father. I came to ask him to impose upon the Superiors of my Order a final effort in order to wrest my soul definitely from the haunting powers which torture and besiege it. The Holy Father had pity on me. He said that he would do what he could. He has done it, and I have just been informed that he had expressed to the Superiors of the Order his ardent desire to see a fresh novitiate imposed upon me. The reply was that I had already made two attempts and that it was utterly futile and impossible to grant me a third. And the Holy Father thereupon had me informed that his authority does not exceed the expression of a wish, and that he has neither the power nor the right nor the will to express an order. But I am told that there are exceptions to this rule, and that if an English Ambassador were to ask the Holy Father to do this for him as a personal favor he would be sure to obtain it. So, in presence of all the kindness you have shown me, I venture now to ask you to obtain the intercession of the British Ambassador in Paris who is a friend of yours. Have pity on me. Take pity on my soul, which otherwise is irremediably lost.

This letter both affected me deeply and irritated me. I had obtained for Eloa all that it was humanly possible to attain, and I began to look upon her as really a soul beyond all cure, haunted by visions to which she dared not confess and which troubled both her ambitions and her soul; and after long reflection I replied:

Madame: I am very grateful to the Holy Father for the kindness he has shown you, and the signal favor manifested toward you in taking into account your painful situation and in intervening for you with your Superiors. But I cannot possibly join you in insisting further with him, and the energetic, I venture to add almost indomitable, persistency which you employ in striving by main force to open sacred doors that have been closed to you proves to me that your Superiors and the Pope, better informed as to your character, know you better than you know yourself, and that the refusal opposed to your perseverance is the just and logical consequence of the intimate acquaintance which your Superiors have of you. See if you have not the courage to master yourself in the world, outside of convent walls. Make your novitiate all alone, and having accomplished it prove that you deserve other treatment as having within yourself the energy and spirit of submission requisite for such a change.

A single line was the reply to this letter: "My soul is irremediably lost." And thereupon all was still.

In the summer of 1881 I paid a visit to an old friend who was living at Les Petites Dalles, on the Norman coast. I was struck then by the exquisite grace of this little port as seen from the coast of St. Martin. It is quite one of those picturesque and poetic landscapes to be observed on the Côte d'Azur along the Corniche between Nice and San Remo. My friend, to whom I expressed my admiration for this little landscape, said to me:

"Why do you not build here a temporary refuge where you may find repose amidst the ceaseless agitations of your existence?"

We were promenading at the time in the single street of the village which leads from the valley to the beach. I looked up at the cliff on my left and said to my friend:

"If I can buy that little plateau there on the edge of the cliff with the clump of beeches behind it I will take it and build there my retreat."

My friend was delighted with the idea, and as I was leaving that very evening he promised to investigate the matter for me. I had not been back in Paris forty-eight hours when he informed me that the proprietor accepted my price.

In 1883 my little châtelet, called by the peasants Les Lampottes, because of the two small towers incrusted in the façade, was finished. I had only to settle down there. But between the two little tourelles or lampottes, as may be seen in the drawing of the Norman façade accompanying these pages, there was a large empty space under the sharp angle of the roof. I ought to say that this façade has obtained a great reputation among architects, and that not a season goes by without some of them visiting it as the type of a Norman façade. But I repeat that the angle between the lampottes and the summit of the roof was then empty, and this formed a veritable gap which it was a constant worry to me to see filled up. One afternoon at Rouen, in the courtyard of a dealer in antiquities, I was struck by the tender and artistic aspect of a statue of the Virgin with the Child Jesus in her arms. The statue had been carved out of one immense half of the bole of an oak. I took the measurements of the statue, and as I had in my pocket the plan of my country house I noticed that this statue, including its pedestal, would exactly fit into the empty space of my Norman façade. The next day I asked the antiquary to sell me the statue.

"Oh," said he, "that is a statue of which I am very fond, for its harmony rests the eye, but I will gladly sell it to you. I bought it at the demolition of a nunnery demolished on the plea of public utility, but ever since I have had it it has taken away my peace of mind. It always seems to me that an infinitude of little sounds are buzzing about it by night. And I cannot succeed in keeping it recumbent; yet, upright, it annoys me. A dozen times I have sought to extend it on the ground, but on the morrow I found it upright without being able to explain how or why, and my wife, frightened by this phenomenon, begged me to get rid of it."

"Very well," said I with a smile, "as I want to place her upright against a wall she won't wish to change her position."

I had the Virgin transported in a hay cart directly from Rouen to Les Petites Dalles, and a week later the fisher-folk and peasants of Les Petites Dalles with their playful spirit had baptized my little château: Notre Dame des Lampottes.

It is the statue to be seen in the drawing herewith, silhouetted so appropriately against the background of the Norman façade.

In 1887, at about the beginning of August, I was seated on my terrace, in the radiant silence of the countryside. Only the regular respiration of the sea under the cliff troubled the spell, when a peasant belonging to the village approached me rapidly and lifting his hat said to me:

"There is a lady, sir, at the foot of the path, who begs you to come down to see her, for she is here only for a short time and cannot come up."

I seized my hat and stick and descended to the road where my unknown visitor was waiting for me. As I approached the open carriage stationed there in the ample shadow of a great tree I uttered a cry of surprise. It was Eloa. Her face was pale and worn, but the eyes burned with a feverish light. She wore an extremely elegant traveling dress, and an immense hat adorned with brilliant black ostrich feathers. On seeing me she uttered a sort of suppressed and raucous cry, but her movement was one of joy, which she explained by her delight at having found me again. I drew near.

"How is it you are here?" I asked, "and why did you not come up to my door?"

"I am here because I was told to go to you," she replied. "I didn't go up to see you because I perceived from a distance on your façade the statue of the Virgin whom at the nunnery we called the rigid Virgin, at whose feet so often I have worn my knees and my forehead, and because I do not care to enter a house over which she seems to watch."

"No, no. I entreat you," said I, "come up to the house. We will take the path by the other side if the sight of the rigid Virgin impresses you so deeply. You will spend several days here and the calm of my interior will bring you peace."

"Never, never. She has made me suffer too much. She has been too inflexible. She hates me. I will not sleep under the same roof with her."

I was filled with an immense pity. I felt that I was in the presence of a being utterly absorbed by an incurable ill, in whom reason had given way to imperious visions which had henceforth nothing whatever to do with logic or will.

"But why did you come up here?" I asked.

"Because I was directed to go to Eletot with you and to take you as a witness in the meeting which is to take place there. I entreat you to get into the carriage with me and to guide me thither, for I do not know the road."

It is an hour's drive from Les Petites Dalles to Eletot. The road passes by Sassetot, leaving on one side Les Grandes Dalles, the shady and embowered villas of which along the sea you perceive on the right. You traverse the village of St. Pierre en Port, and thence by a road which to-day is an exquisite avenue shaded by great trees, where the air is balmy and delicious, you reach Eletot. On the way Eloa related to me her despair on receiving my letter, because she knew she should never succeed in inducing the Superior to grant her a new trial. She told me of the nights she had tried to spend in prayer, in search of what she called her peace of mind, the

MRS. KELLOGG PROMPTLY TOLD IRA TO BORROW $10,000

HOW A FORTY-THOUSAND-DOLLAR FORTUNE WAS BUILT ON A NEWSPAPER CLIPPING AND A TWO-CENT STAMP

IT IS probable that Ira Kellogg was less excited than any of his friends when the news of the legacy was received. This was not because he discredited it, but because he was an easy-going man: he took things as they came, without either jubilation or complaint. He never had been rich and he never had been poor, and until now neither wealth nor poverty ever had been near enough to seriously disturb him. Though luxury had been lacking, so had privation; he had just lived comfortably, and he was satisfied with reasonable comfort. This, perhaps, explains why he was so unemotional. At no time in his life had he been violently swayed by hopes or fears, at no time had he had to struggle, at no time had he been the prey to ambition. So, with no financial worries and just enough business to keep him occupied, he had learned contentment.

The legacy was neither expected nor unexpected. The existence of a wealthy uncle never had been forgotten, but Ira Kellogg had had nothing in common with him for many years, and there were other heirs. If he had left the bulk of his fortune to one of the others, with only a slight "remembrance" for Ira, it would not have been surprising. As it happened, however, he had left the fortune to Ira and the "remembrances" to the others. At least, that was the report received. The first news came in a newspaper dispatch, and immediately thereafter the neighbors flocked in to congratulate the fortunate man.

"But it may not be true," he protested.

"Why, of course it is," they replied. "You can see that it's no idle rumor, for the dispatch gives the substance of the will. He has remembered all his nephews and nieces, but he leaves his fortune to you."

"Oh, well, I suppose it's so," he answered carelessly, "but there is no use bothering about it now."

However, he had to bother about it. Mrs. Kellogg had long-cherished plans that it was now possible to carry out. She wished to go to California with the girls.

"But I haven't the money yet," Ira urged.

"You can get all you want, though," insisted Mrs. Kellogg. "Any one will be glad to let you have it."

Ira was not so sure of that, but, in his easy-going way, he said he would "see about it."

With this he let the matter rest until he received a verification of the report from a prominent legal firm of Galveston, Texas, where his uncle had lived for many years. The letter informed him that there would be approximately a million dollars for him, but that some time must elapse before he would come into possession of it. The minor bequests were somewhat involved, necessitating the sale of some securities before a division could be made, and it was expressly stipulated that all these details should be settled by the executors before any of the estate was turned over to the principal legatee. There were also some business deals to be closed up.

"However," the writer said in conclusion, "I am authorized by Mr. Calvin Marley, one of the executors and a close friend to your late uncle, to say to you that he will gladly make you a personal loan of any sum that you may desire to use while awaiting the settlement of the estate."

When Mrs. Kellogg was informed of this she promptly told Ira to borrow $10,000 of Mr. Marley, in order that she might not be delayed in the execution of her plans.

"Now, what's the use of doing that?" asked Ira. "We're reasonably comfortable, and we might as well wait."

"I want to go to California with the girls," asserted Mrs. Kellogg, "and besides, more will be expected of us now than before: we must live better. Think of a millionaire living in a flat, even if it is a fairly large one and in a good locality! We ought to get into a house right away."

"All right," returned Ira good-naturedly, "I'll borrow $10,000 from him."

"While you're about it, Dad," put in Harry Kellogg, the son, "you'd better make it $20,000, and take that stock my boss offered you. He says I'm doing well, and this is your chance to get me an interest in the concern."

But Ira demurred. The firm by which his son was employed had just been incorporated, and Ira had been given an opportunity to identify his son more closely with the corporation. There was every likelihood that it would prove a good investment, too, but Ira was not disposed to ask for more than $10,000.

"Wait until the estate is settled," he urged. "Perhaps I'll invest $20,000 in the business for you then."

"You won't have the chance then," returned Harry. "You know well enough that it's a money-making concern and the stock is not going on the market. As a matter of business policy, a little of it has been offered to the employees at par, although it's easily worth 150. When that's gone, the opportunity will be gone forever."

"Well, I'll see about it," said Ira.

The next day at his office he had an exemplification of the fact that credit is as good as cash. His credit always had been good, but that was because he never strained it. He had met his obligations promptly, and tradesmen and others were glad to let him have anything he wanted. Nevertheless, until now he had not had money and credit forced upon him. The new order of things began with the offer of Mr. Marley, of Galveston, to loan him any sum that he desired, but it did not end there. He was writing to Marley in care of the legal firm when Stephen Dunstan called to see him. As the local agent of a large importing house, Ira had had some dealings with Dunstan, and they were friends, although not intimate.

"Had any verification of the good news yet?" asked Dunstan.

"Well," replied Ira, "I have reasonably good evidence that it's authentic." And he told him of the Marley offer.

"That ought to satisfy anybody," asserted Dunstan. "But what's the use of bothering people in Galveston that you don't know? If you want any money I'll be glad to let you have it. I have $40,000 or $50,000 lying idle now, and you can have any part of it."

"I have no present security to offer," suggested Ira.

"That letter is good enough security for me," replied Dunstan. "All I want is the assurance that the legacy is really coming to you, and such an offer from one of the executors settles that."

"I confess I'd rather get it from you than from a stranger," said Ira, "and I was just about to write for $10,000."

"Better make it $20,000," advised Dunstan. "It may be a year before the estate is closed up, and if Mrs. Kellogg is like other women she'll want to make a change in your style of living right away."

"All right," said Ira. "Make it $20,000."

When Dunstan had gone Ira leaned back in his chair and communed with himself. "A fellow doesn't have to have money in this world," he mused, "if only he is supposed to have it. I'm really not a cent richer to-day than I was two weeks ago, but people are hunting me up to hand me things." And further proof came in a call from the president of the company that employed his son.

"I happened to be in this vicinity on other business," explained the president, "and I thought I'd drop in. Your boy told me you'd like to take that $10,000 of stock for him now. He's a bright young fellow—just the kind of an employee that we like to have get an interest in the business. We're satisfied that it's good policy. Shall I put it in his name? Of course, I understand that it may be some time before you will get this money, but you can give your note for it at five per cent., and the stock will pay not less than ten per cent. in dividends. It's not our purpose to make money on it, you know, but simply to make a few of our best employees more deeply interested in our success. In the market the stock would bring 150 or more."

"Why, yes, I'll take the stock," said Ira, "but I believe I'll pay for it. You can have it put in Harry's name, and I'll send you a check in a day or so—probably to-morrow."

"Quite unnecessary, Mr. Kellogg," protested the president. "I infer that you will have to borrow the money, and, under the circumstances, your note is quite as satisfactory to us as it would be to any one else."

Ira hesitated. He would have the $20,000 by the following morning, and he had planned to use $10,000 of it for this very purpose, but—well, he thought of his wife and her plans, and in his easy, careless way he replied: "All right."

His bank balance at that moment was $562.18. The next day he had to his credit $20,562.18, and his son was worth $15,000, if one figured the actual value of the stock in his name. His two daughters were shopping, and his wife, having already written for rooms at a California resort, was now looking at houses. "And a newspaper clipping and one letter have done this," he mused. "To him that hath the reputation of having shall be given. If there were two clippings and two letters, I'd probably be buying private yachts."

His wife and his two daughters left in about ten days, but just before leaving his wife informed him that she had arranged for a house.

"But why rent a house just as you are leaving?" he asked.

"I haven't rented it," she replied calmly. "I've arranged to buy it. It's a bargain—only $22,000, and in a splendid neighborhood. The agent will be in to see you."

The agent came, and he demonstrated that it really was a bargain. Residences of that nature are not readily marketable. This one had cost $5000 or $6000 more than the price asked, but people who wish to invest that much in a residence usually prefer to build, so the owner, who was leaving the city and desired a quick sale, was ready to let it go at a sacrifice.

"The value of the land has increased since the house was built, too," explained the agent. "It's really worth not less than $30,000, if one could afford to wait for a purchaser. Of course, we understand your circumstances, Mr. Kellogg, and do not expect a cash transaction. Say $5000 down and the balance, secured by a mortgage, to be paid in one year, or, if you prefer, eighteen months."

Ira took the precaution, unusual for him, of verifying the statement as to its cost and value, and then gave his customary reply. "All right," he said.

He made the cash payment of $5000 and drew a long breath. As he put it to himself, "there was a swiftness about the way things were coming his way that was startling." He had a house and lot, a block of paying stock, his wife and daughters were in California, and he was $47,000 in debt.

"I never knew people were so kind and considerate before," he told himself, "but I think I'll quit right now. One clipping and one letter do not entitle a man to assume the national debt."

It was not so easy to quit, however. He had just settled down to the prosaic affairs of life again when another friend stopped him on the street one day. Ira's business friends were for the most part men with influence and money, and this one suggested that L., D. & X. was a good purchase. It was only an insignificant road, of course, but the friend happened to know that recent developments made it important to two trunk lines to control it, and the stock would soar when the fight began. "It's the chance of a lifetime," said the friend. "If you're quick you can get it for 28 now, and it will be above par in thirty days. It's better than letting your money lie idle."

"But I haven't got my money yet," protested Ira.

"Well, I'll carry it for you," returned the friend. "You're as good as gold with me, and I like to put a chance in the way of a fellow I like. Besides, you'll have chances to do me a good turn when you get your money."

Again Ira decided that the limit had been reached, and again he was mistaken. "What a lot of financial friends a fellow has when he has enough money so that their financial friendship isn't likely to cost them anything. But I'll stop right here." In a day or so, however, he got a letter from the headquarters of the importing house he represented. There was to be a merging of several large establishments in that particular line, and $15,000 of stock had been put aside for him. If he cared to take it, would he please wire, as this opportunity was being given only to a few of their principal agents? He deemed it unwise to take it, but when he mentioned it to Dunstan the latter was enthusiastic.

"I know something about that," he said, "and you really ought to get into the deal. I'd like to have the chance."

"Take it," said Ira.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," returned Dunstan. "I'll advance the necessary money for the deal, and let you have a half-interest, to be paid for on your own time, without interest."

"All right," said Ira.

When Ira next wrote to his wife he told her that, if the newspaper clipping had been a column long instead of about two inches and the letter from the lawyers had had a few more pages to it, he was satisfied that he should now own on credit a little more than a half-interest in the United States.

"I suppose it's all right," he added, "but, if anything goes wrong, I'll strike the earth with a thud that will jar the State."

She replied that, of course, nothing would go wrong, and then informed him that the young California millionaire, who had been attentive to Clara while he was in the East the year before, had joined them, and the engagement would be announced shortly.

"That's what comes of having money," she asserted. "We probably should never have seen him again otherwise."

Ira steadfastly refused to go into any other large deals, but he did get into a few minor ones, and he joined two clubs. He tried to live the same old life, but he found it impossible. Men were always coming to him with propositions of one kind or another, and he was interviewed on the slightest pretext. He found himself very much in the company of men who previously had been only business friends. Some of his deals prospered and some did not, but he had become accustomed to being wealthy, and he stood his losses with equanimity—especially as most of them were only on paper as yet. No one thought of pressing him for money. It is only the poor man who has to pay promptly.

The morning of the day Ira woke up the house agent came to him with an offer to return the $5000 he had paid.

"I don't believe I care for it," said Ira carelessly.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," urged the agent. "I'll return the $5000 and pay you $2000 additional to be released from the bargain."

"No," returned Ira. "Mrs. Kellogg likes that house, and I can't afford to let it go."

Two thousand dollars was nothing to him then, but that afternoon it looked like a large sum. His son, Harry, found him curled up in his office chair, the picture of misery. Harry carried a paper in his hand, and was excited himself.

"HOW THEY DO PILE IT ON A MAN WHEN HE'S DOWN!"

"The paper says a new will has been found, Dad!" cried Harry. "Is it true?"

For answer Ira pushed a telegram over to the youth. The telegram announced that a later will had been found, and that Ira received only a small "remembrance."

"And I owe, Harry," he moaned, "I owe enough to make a respectable sinking fund."

"Well, it's sunk," returned Harry.

"I wish I'd taken the $2000 offered me for a release in that house deal."

"Who offered you that?"

"The agent."

"Then he's found another purchaser who's willing to pay high for it," announced the youth. "Wake up, Dad! There's a chance yet."

"No use, Harry," answered Ira disconsolately. "If I could get $5000 for it it wouldn't pull me out. Why, just think what I owe, Harry. I've gone on the theory that I'm a national bank and now I find I'm not even a toy savings-bank."

"Well, just you keep cool and wait," urged Harry. "I'm going to find out who wants that house."

"Won't be a drop in the bucket, Harry. I can see the end; I'm ruined. I might let the stock go for what I owe on it, but there's $20,000 in cash, and the trouble will just about cost me this agency."

Nevertheless, Harry, who developed unexpected business sense, insisted upon making his investigation, and left his father brooding.

"Cash, $20,000," muttered Ira; "due on house, $17,000; due on Harry's stock, $10,000; due on stock of house I represent, $7500; due on L., D. & X. speculation, $10,000; total, $64,500. That's a pretty good indebtedness for a man who has nothing. Oh, it's no fun being a millionaire—that is, a newspaper millionaire, with only a letter for capital. But——" He suddenly sat bolt upright. "By George! I've got about $10,000 in the bank yet. I'm tempted to skip."

Then he thought of his wife and daughters and Harry; he would have to stay and fight it out for them. His predicament was serious, but he could do nothing else. Perhaps his creditors would be lenient.

He was in this mood when the house agent entered.

"Well," said the agent brusquely, "I suppose you don't want that house now."

"I suppose not," returned Ira resignedly.

"Under the circumstances," said the agent, "I don't feel at liberty to give you any bonus for a release now, but I'll return the payment you made."

"You must have seen the newspapers," said Ira wearily.

"I have," replied the agent. "I know that you can't carry out your part of the bargain, so I'm going to take the whole thing off of your hands."

"All right," said Ira.

"And you'll have to stand the expense incurred so far in the matter of the mortgage and the transfer of title."

Ira looked startled.

"I suppose so," he returned, "but I'm in no condition to do business now. Wait until to-morrow."

A little delay was necessary to arrange the details, so the agent agreed.

"How they do pile it on a man when he's down!" groaned Ira. "That fellow and his principal are going to make money out of my misfortune, but they'll stick me for the expenses just the same. And when I was supposed to be prosperous they were ready to pay me a bonus for doing this."

He was still waiting for Harry to return when Harry's employer came in. He also had heard the news.

"Of course I'll have to ask you to transfer that stock back to me," he announced, "and I may say I'm pretty thoroughly disgusted."

"So am I," said Ira.

"It looks bad," asserted the employer. "It looks like a scheme that miscarried because of a premature exposure. You might have made a nice little profit on that stock if the truth hadn't come out so unexpectedly. I rather suspect you had planned some such underhanded deal as that."

Ira winced, but admitted that the affair did have a bad look. "Bad!" exclaimed the employer; "it looks like a confidence game. I ought to prosecute you, but I won't. Just turn over the stock and I'll return your note."

"It's in Harry's name," said Ira, "and I'll have to wait until he comes back. I'll straighten it out with you to-morrow morning."

Ira was so miserable, so discouraged, that he was tempted to lock the door. And yet the way they had turned on him seemed so unjust, in view of their previous encouragement, that he was tempted to rebel, to fight. He would straighten himself up in his chair with a vigorous expletive, and then sink back again. They were crowding him to the limit of his endurance, but—it seemed so hopeless. He had been perfectly honest in the matter, but he was accused of trickery. That was the hardest thing to bear.

He had just reached the door, with the intention of locking it, when Dunstan entered, and Dunstan was angry.

"It looks like a swindle!" Dunstan announced, without preliminaries. "You and some confederate in Galveston put up the job, and you've got into me for $27,500." Ira tried to protest, but Dunstan wouldn't listen to him. If Dunstan had been an observing man he would have noticed a dangerous gleam in Ira's eyes. Even a discouraged man may have a little spirit left. "But, thank Heaven!" Dunstan went on, "the circumstances make the $7500 safe. I'll take the stock for that."

A few minutes before Ira would have surrendered it without question, but now he had been goaded to mental activity. It occurred to him that that stock was worth $15,000, and he had given his note for only $7500 in payment for it. When Ira began to think he thought rapidly. At any rate, he would not submit to this sort of treatment any longer; he would make a stand.

He pulled himself together with a jerk. The limit of endurance had been reached, and the dead man came to life.

"This is my office," said Ira, "and I won't submit to such language here." He reached for his check-book. "I'll pay you for that stock now, and then I want you to get out and stay out."

"But the $20,000 note," protested Dunstan, disconcerted by this sudden change of front.

"It isn't due," asserted Ira shortly. "When it is, I'll take care of it." Ira tendered his check. "Hand over the $7500 note I gave you for the stock, and the stock is mine."

Dunstan blustered; he wanted Ira to pay for the stock and then give it to him to secure the larger note; but Ira was thoroughly roused now. He wouldn't secure the note; it had been accepted without security, it wasn't due, and it would have to stand as made.

"And I don't want any more words with you," said Ira. "You annoy me. That's why I'm clearing off the indebtedness on the stock ahead of time. I don't want to be bothered."

When Harry came back he found his father a different man—an angry man of action.

"How much for the house, Harry?" he asked.

"Thirty thousand dollars in cash," answered Harry. "I got the man's name by pretending to have an offer for it myself, and he wants it badly. If you can raise the money to complete your bargain, Dad, you can sell to him."

Ira walked the floor thoughtfully.

"Harry," he said at last, "we've got some quick work to do, but I guess we can do it. Do you know any one who wants your stock?"

"John Bartley offered $15,000 for it a day or so ago."

"Tell Bartley to have that sum ready in currency at his office to-morrow morning and you will deliver the stock to him—in currency, mind. Then tell the man who wants the house to have his money ready, also in currency. Telephone your employer that I want to see him at 11:30, and to bring my note along. Get the house agent here, too. He's coming, anyway, but we might as well specify a time. I'll see Brown & Darwin myself, for I happen to know they're anxious to get the stock that Dunstan tried to beat me out of. And be here yourself, Harry; I'll need you."

"You seem to have waked up, Dad," suggested Harry.

"Well," said Ira, "I can stand being knocked down, Harry, but I don't like to be kicked. I've been jumped on so hard that it seems to have made a financier of me."

When Ira entered his office a little before eleven o'clock the following morning he carefully deposited a large wallet in the little safe that stood in one corner of the room.

"Here's where we give a few lessons to Napoleons of finance, Harry," he said cheerfully. "There's a little matter of $18,000 in that. Brown & Darwin paid me $16,000 for the stock, and I drew out $2000 of the little I had left in the bank. Has any one been here yet?"

"No," answered Harry, "but Conkling telephoned that you'd have to put up the money on that L., D. & X. deal right away or he'd have it transferred to his own account. He says he can't afford to give you the profit if you're not able to stand the possible loss."

"Telephone him to come over and get his money," instructed Ira.

"But you can't pay them all," urged Harry.

"You watch your poor old waked-up Dad," retorted Ira. "Conkling's so busy watching quotations that he can't get here inside of an hour or more, and a real live man can do lots of business in that time. Have you got a cab, Harry?"

"No."

"Get one. You'll need it."

Harry did the telephoning and went for a cab. Meanwhile Ira settled himself at his desk, and then things happened with the rapidity he had expected. Harry's employer was the first to arrive.

"Are you ready——" he began.

"Quite ready," interrupted Ira, as he reached into his safe and drew out the wallet. "I don't like to have business transactions with people who get nervous every time they see an item in the newspapers, so we'll just close the deal." He counted out $10,000, pushed it across the desk, and threw the rest carelessly into a drawer. "Kindly surrender my note, and the stock belongs to Harry."

"Really, Mr. Kellogg——"

"Please don't delay. I'm very busy to-day. There's your money."

The sight of $10,000 in currency frequently makes a man change his mind, and Harry's employer was disposed to think he had been hasty.

"Really, Mr. Kellogg——" he began again.

"I don't like to be disturbed by these trifles," said Ira. "I have a really important appointment in five minutes with a man who isn't nervous. My note, please."

The note was surrendered, and a dazed man left the office with $10,000 in his pocket. He had tried to explain and apologize, but Ira had cut him short with the statement that it spoiled his appetite to have people doubt his financial standing, and he didn't wish to take any chances.

Five minutes later Harry was speeding away in a cab, with the stock in his inside pocket, intent on letting Bartley have it for the $15,000 in currency he had agreed to have ready. Meanwhile Ira was entertaining the house agent.

"I have a check here for the $5000 you paid," said the agent, "and I will give that to you and release the mortgage on the payment of the costs and the re-transfer of the property."

"I don't like to do business with checks," asserted Ira. "People are so suspicious these days that it's better to deal in currency. Why, some men have even doubted me."

The agent looked bewildered.

"Surely," he said, "you didn't expect me to bring $5000 in cash here?"

"No," said Ira, "I merely expected you to bring the mortgage and I will give you $17,000 in cash and take the house."

"You're going to take the house!" exclaimed the agent.

"Certainly. Why not? I—— Pardon me," as a boy entered with a telegram. Ira opened the telegram and found the following message from his wife: "Clara's engagement announced. Both want to be married here. Shall we delay wedding for your arrival?" To this he hastily wrote the reply: "We need a millionaire in the family. Rush wedding. I can't come."

"You see," said Ira, turning to the agent as the boy left, "it is most distressing to be bothered by little affairs when there are really important ones requiring attention. There's not less than a million in that deal I just closed by wire."

"Would—would you accept a bonus of $2000 for the house?" ventured the agent.

"What's $2000 to me when I want a particular house?" demanded Ira.

"You talked in a different strain yesterday."

"Yes; you annoyed me, and when I'm annoyed I don't sleep well, so I'm paying you in cash to-day. I consider the payment of this money as nothing but a sleeping-potion. Ah! here's the boy now."

Harry entered, carrying a little satchel, which he deposited on his father's desk.

"How much, Harry?" asked Ira.

"Fifteen thousand," answered Harry.

"Dear, dear; no more than that. Why, Harry, you know I can't transact business for one morning with that. While you were at the safe deposit vault you should have got at least double that sum. But never mind! I had a few thousands left over at the close of business yesterday." He added the money in the drawer to that in the satchel, and then counted out enough to pay the agent his $17,000 with interest. A little later the agent left, as dazed as the man who had preceded him; and ten minutes after that Harry was speeding away in his cab again, carrying all the necessary papers to transfer the house to the new purchaser. Then Ira telephoned to a broker and asked how L., D. & X. was quoted.

"Seventy-six and still going up," was the reply.

"No wonder he wanted to take it off my hands," commented Ira.

Harry was back before Conkling arrived, and when the latter came Ira had a large stack of $1000 bills from which he counted out ten.

"I didn't like your message, Conkling," he said. "It betrayed a want of confidence in me that was displeasing, so I decided to pay you in currency, and then sell. As soon as you get back to your office please let the stock go at the market price."

"I didn't mean to offend you, Mr. Kellogg," urged Conkling, "but the reports were disquieting——"

"I know, I know," interrupted Ira, "but a man of my standing should be above rumors and reports."

"The stock is going higher."

"A few points one way or another is of trifling importance," said Ira. "I'd rather lose a little something than be annoyed. I understand it's still going up, but close it out just the same and telephone me the price and the margin of profit."

Conkling was also dazed, and he was disposed to kick himself. It seemed to him that he had lost a good customer.

An hour or so later Ira leaned back in his chair and smiled at his son. He had taken up the $20,000 note that Dunstan held and had about $5000 left.

"Not so bad, Harry; not so bad," he commented. "They really ought not to crowd a man when he's down, and then these things might not happen." The telephone bell rang. "See what it is, Harry."

"Conkling says he has sold your L., D. & X. and has $33,456 to your credit," announced Harry, after a brief conversation over the telephone.

"Tell him," said Ira, "that I always prefer currency to checks, but—well, he can send me a check this time, if it's certified."

"He hopes his unfortunate mistake won't prejudice you against him when you have any other business in his line," said Harry.

"They're all hoping that now," asserted Ira.

The next day he received another telegram from his wife. "Just heard the news from Galveston," it read. "Clara's fiancé says to draw on him for any sum you may need to protect your deals. They will be married next Saturday."

To this Ira replied: "Don't need anything. If I did, I could raise $50,000 here in two hours."

"And that's no lie, either," he remarked to Harry. "There's nothing like clever financiering to give a man credit; it's better even than a telegram and a newspaper clipping."

The Western "Gold Bugs"

By Clarence H. Matson

HOW THE MONEY BARONS OF THE EAST ARE BORROWING FROM THE WHEAT BARONS OF THE WEST

TWO men interested in financial matters were recently discussing the trend of business affairs. One was from the East and had just been touring the West; the other lived in the West. The Eastern man made this statement: "I shall not be greatly surprised if the end of the present decade sees the West the creditor of the East. A few years ago the East had a mortgage on the West, but I am not sure but what conditions are about to be reversed, at least in a degree."

This may seem like a startling statement when one considers the past relations of these two sections of the country, but events in the financial world during the past few months lend color to the prophecy.

Ever since the development of the West began in earnest the West has been more or less in debt to the East. The development cost more money than the Western pioneers possessed. They had to borrow. They were compelled to mortgage their farms and wait for the returns from the soil to pay off the mortgages. But now a change has come—the West has paid off its mortgages; it is no longer in debt. The change was first distinctly noticeable last summer when the West failed to send East for money to "move the crops," as had been its custom, and more recently additional evidence has been piling up to add force to the change.

For several years there has been a heavy drain on New York banks during the summer months. With the beginning of the harvest in Southern Oklahoma about the first of June there has come to New York a demand for money. It was needed in the West to "move the crops." The farmers needed cash to pay the expense of harvesting and threshing their grain. The grain buyers needed cash to buy the grain after it was threshed. The farmer borrowed from his local bank, and the local bank in turn had to borrow from the money centres. Therefore, when the Oklahoma farmers needed money to pay their harvest hands the little banks in Oklahoma drew on Kansas City for it, and Kansas City drew on New York. The harvest traveled north, twenty miles a day, and by the last of June the great Kansas wheat belt was busy—and still Kansas City drew on New York for the money to pay the harvest hands. During July the harvest traveled across Nebraska, and Omaha called for money. By August the wheat in Minnesota and the Dakotas was falling before the binder, and the demand for money came from Minneapolis and St. Paul. By the time the wheat was all gathered New York had sent from twenty-five to forty millions of dollars into the West for the express purpose of "moving the crops."

In the fall, when the wheat had started to market, the wealth began to flow back into the New York banks and those of other money centres. Not only the twenty-five or forty millions came back, but with them came millions more in interest and part of the principal of the mortgages.

So regular had this process become that the bankers of New York and other Eastern money centres learned to prepare for it. Two years ago, in the summer of 1901, when Kansas alone produced nearly one hundred million bushels of wheat, the demand for harvest money was greater than ever because of the great crop. Each year, however, the interest payments dropped off because the principal of the mortgages had been decreased, and when the money came back which had been borrowed to move the 1901 crop, the sum which came with it to pay off the mortgages and interest was small compared with what it had been two or three years before.

During recent years the West has paid every claim promptly. Each year it sent East a big slice of its profits and it borrowed no more except temporarily. Money became cheap. The West kept adding to the idle money in the East by paying off its debts. Interest dropped to three, four and five per cent. There were no more Western mortgages to buy and the East began to put its money into industry and trade. Business "boomed." Everybody made improvements, from the big railroad companies with their betterment of equipment and roadbed, to the humble owner of the two-room cottage, who built himself a chicken-coop or a pigsty.

Last spring the banks of New York prepared for the usual demand from the West for money to move the crops. It would be a profitable investment, they thought, for at least a part of their idle millions for a few months. The harvest began in Oklahoma, but there was no demand from Oklahoma for money. Word came that the Kansas harvest was in full blast, but Kansas gave no hint that she wanted to borrow. When Nebraska began gathering her wheat without asking financial aid, the East inquired what was the matter. The answer came back, "The West has plenty of money of its own to move its crops."

And it proved true. Not only had the farmers sufficient money to pay their harvest hands, but they also had fat bank accounts besides. The recent biennial report of Morton

Albaugh, State Bank Commissioner of Kansas, shows that sixty-eight per cent. of the deposits in the State and private banks of Kansas are those of farmers and stockmen. On the basis of figures given in Mr. Albaugh's report it is estimated that fully one-half of all the farmers in Kansas now have bank accounts.

For this reason the West has paid off its Eastern mortgages. Now, if a Western farmer wants to borrow money his neighbors are only too glad to lend it to him. He no longer sends a mortgage East in exchange for a loan. A few years ago the agents of Eastern or foreign loan companies were among the "leading citizens" of every Western town; now one can scarcely be found.

What Caused the Recent "Squeeze"

Because the West had paid off its debts the profits of the harvest of 1902 did not flow to the Eastern money centres last fall as they had done every year before when a good crop was raised. Consequently this accustomed supply did not replenish that which went out in other directions. In the mean time vast sums had been steadily going into the channels of industry and permanent investment. Railroad companies issued new securities and the money secured on them went into extensions and improvements. Business expanded at a wonderful rate. New industries were established and the money that went into them became tied up in a permanent investment. Consequently New York began to experience a falling off in its supply of ready money as the fall of 1902 opened. As the season advanced and but little cash came in payment of Western mortgages to take the place of that going into permanent investments, a shortage developed. Borrowers found that interest rates were advancing. The shortage became a stringency and interest on ready money went still higher.

But the shortage did not touch the West. The West sold its crops to the East and then kept the money. Like the East, it is beginning to put a little of its surplus into factories and other industries. It needs them, and there is a wide field for their products. The West, too, has money to lend—not a great abundance, to be sure, but enough to become a lender.

During the fall the State of Massachusetts wished to float $500,000 of bonds. The investment was, of course, gilt-edged from a standpoint of security, but the interest was only 3¼ per cent. Eastern money commanded a much higher rate than that. New York banks were not anxious to tie up their ready cash in any 3¼ per cent. investments. The bonds did not have to go begging, however. The State of Nebraska was so anxious to secure them as an investment for its permanent school fund that the State officers took a test case through the Nebraska Supreme Court to ascertain if the State could legally purchase the bonds of another State. The Supreme Court decided in the affirmative, and on the first day of December, 1902, the prairie State of Nebraska, which was not settled fifty years ago, became the creditor of the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

When one remembers the hard times of a few years ago, when practically the entire region west of the Missouri River was mortgaged to Eastern or foreign investors, it seems almost beyond the range of possibilities that the West should have amassed so much wealth as to enable it in so short a time not only to pay off its great debts, but even to loan money to its former creditors; but when one considers that the farms of Kansas alone last year produced wealth to the value of $371,109,467, and that, too, in the face of a comparatively small wheat crop, one can readily see that the total wealth produced by all the farms of the West each year is something enormous, running into billions of dollars. And to this should be added the products of the mines and factories, the oil wells and smelters—and the wealth produced by these is by no means inconsiderable. The total wealth produced by the State of Kansas alone in 1902 probably aggregated $450,000,000, or $1500 for every family in the State—an increase in the actual wealth without considering increased values of wealth existing before.

There was a time—and it is not remote—when the farm in Kansas, Nebraska or Oklahoma that was not covered by a mortgage was an exception to the general rule. In the older States east of the Missouri the conditions were not so bad, but they might have been better. During the boom days of the latter eighties the loan agent was a prominent and numerous member of every Western community. He flourished like a green bay tree. In many instances he was an Eastern man sent to the West by trusting friends or a loan company organized to invest Eastern money in Western securities. His advice was sought on all questions of public interest and he was a "leading citizen" in every community. He financed all sorts of schemes. The spirit of speculation was rife. Nearly every one borrowed. Farmers borrowed to improve their farms, to build houses and barns, and to buy machinery they did not need; and the townspeople borrowed to boom their towns, to lay out new additions and to build water-works and street-car lines where there was no one to use the water or to ride on the street cars.

Then came a day of reckoning. Investments did not turn out as well as expected. Money became short and interest rates advanced. The town booms collapsed. Everything was mortgaged, and the mortgages were practically all in the hands of Eastern investors. At a forced sale much of the property would not bring enough to pay the mortgage. A series of partial crop failures followed. They spread all over the West to a greater or lesser extent, but the newer States felt their evil effects most. Farmers could not meet their interest payments, to say nothing of the principal which was falling due. In many instances the mortgages were foreclosed and the former owners became mere tenants. The country newspapers lived to a considerable extent on the income derived from the publication of sheriffs' sale notices. Those who retained the ownership of their homes did so only because their creditors saw more hope in extending the loans than in foreclosing them. In the extreme western parts of Kansas and Nebraska, which had only recently been settled, the people were unable to exist. They had not yet learned the peculiarities of climate and soil, and vast areas became depopulated.

The memory of those four or five years in the first half of the last decade is a nightmare in the region between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains. They were years of untold privation and suffering and hardship—years in which the farmer and his wife lay awake night after night wondering how they could pay their debts. The debts were the first consideration. The people were honest and industrious, and they lived on only the bare necessities of life while they struggled to pay what they owed.

The Lessons of the Lean Years

But those years were not wholly without their lessons. They taught frugality and economy of the strictest sort. The farmer studied the soil and sought the crops best adapted to it. He learned that it would not do to pin his faith to a single crop, but that he must have diversity. He learned that sorghums and kaffir corn would provide him with forage for his cattle no matter how dry the summer might be. He learned the value of alfalfa, and at the same time he learned more about the great staple crops of wheat and corn.

Then the skies began to brighten. The farmer turned defeat into victory, and little by little he whittled down his mortgage even in the face of adverse conditions. Then came better crops. The mortgages rapidly became less. Bank accounts were started. The more well-to-do began to buy back the land that the Eastern loan companies had foreclosed. Rubber-tired buggies appeared on the roads and the melody of the piano crept into a few farmhouses. Good crops continued; the bank accounts of those out of debt continued to grow, and there was a steady flow of money to the East to liquidate the remaining mortgages held there. From 1897 to 1901 the West sent millions upon millions to the East. It is no wonder that money became a drug in the financial centres.

The big wheat crop of 1901 practically completed the payment of the mortgages held in the East and the cash began to accumulate faster in the Western banks. The deposits were so great and the calls for loans so few that many banks ceased to pay interest on deposits. Humorous stories have been told of Western farmers compelling bankers to receive their deposits at the muzzle of a revolver. These stories are, of course, imaginary, but there have been instances where a debtor has invoked the aid of the law to compel his creditor to accept payment for a debt so as to stop the interest.

After its Eastern debts were paid and it had had a breathing spell, the West began to look for ways to invest its money. It had learned the lesson of wild speculation and it demanded safe investments. It began to build factories, and some of the money which has heretofore gone East for manufactured goods now remains in the West—only a comparatively small amount, to be sure, but it is a beginning and the amount is constantly increasing. More than half of the zinc produced in the United States comes from the southeastern corner of Kansas. Since the discovery of the great gas fields near the same locality gigantic zinc smelters have sprung up with millions of dollars of capital, besides a great variety of other industries.

No Further Fear of Hard Times

A large amount of capital has gone into telephone lines. Not only have exchanges been built in nearly every Western town and village, but the wires stretch away across the prairies in all directions. The farmers are rapidly learning the value of the telephone and they are putting their own money into telephone lines. The creamery industry is another which has developed with great rapidity in the last two or three years, and with its development it has added to the farmer's wealth by bringing him higher prices for his butter and enabling him to handle a greater product from his cows with less labor than under the old system of making butter by hand. A single creamery company which operates in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma makes as high as fifty thousand pounds of butter a day during the summer season, and it recently sold seventeen carloads of butter in a single shipment to the United States Government for use in the Navy.

The growth of investments in the West is well indicated by the increase in the number of banks in Kansas in the past two years. The recent report of State Bank Commissioner Albaugh shows that during the biennial period ending September 30, 1902, 117 new State banks were incorporated, an increase of thirty-four per cent.

The West no longer fears a return of the hard times of the middle nineties. It is no longer in debt. If crop failures should come it would not have to borrow money to live. And crop failures are no longer the possibility they once were. The farmer knows better how to manage his farm. A partial failure in one line may enhance the value of another crop, so that the aggregate value is maintained. If the West continues to have good crops its wealth will continue to pile up. If the East needs money, the West will follow the example of Nebraska and repay the favors received while the country was developing; if not, the West can use its wealth in still further development.

J. Drew and John Drew

THE conversation drifted upon autographs and Mr. John Drew related several amusing anecdotes of his experience with collectors. The best of these was the account of a clever scheme to secure choice seats for the play without paying for them—a piece of fraud which was frustrated by the astute vender of tickets.

The famous actor received a note one day asking for his autograph. The writer, a woman, informed him that she should be quite satisfied if he would merely inscribe his full name on the blank half of the note sheet. Accordingly, the signature, John Drew, was affixed and the note returned forthwith.

On the following day a fashionably-gowned lady, stepping up to the window of the box-office, presented a half-sheet of notepaper bearing the words, "Three tickets. John Drew." The ticket-seller darted a keen glance at the woman.

"I am sorry, madam, but I cannot honor this," he said.

"Why not?" she demanded, in amazement and offended dignity. "Mr. Drew signed the order and sent it to me himself."

"Are you acquainted with him?" queried the man in the window.

An almost imperceptible hesitation, then, "Certainly," said the woman.

"Then you must know," was the triumphant rejoinder, "that Mr. Drew never writes his full name except when granting a request for his autograph. When he signs an order for seats it's plain J. Drew!"

The American Adventures of a Fortune-Hunting Earl

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS

Copyright, 1903, by The Curtis Publishing Company Copyright in Great Britain

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING INSTALLMENTS — The Earl of Frothingham has just met with a dizzying rebuff. Miss Catherine Hollister, who had seemed to solve all his difficulties, has reconsidered her decision to marry him, but not until she had made all possible social capital out of his public devotion. So Frothingham's American manager, Honoria Longview, a shrewd and friendly young girl who has taken him under her protection, with her eyes wide open and just for the sport of the game, has advised his acceptance of an invitation from a Boston friend.

VIII

AT HALF-PAST four o'clock on a raw January afternoon Frothingham descended from a Pullman fiery furnace to adventure upon Boston. As he drove to Mrs. Staunton's the rain sifted through the cracks round the windows and doors of the musty cab and was deposited upon his face in a greasy coating by currents of the iciest air he had felt since he was last in Scotland. It was air that seemed to mangle as it bit, that sent the chilled blood cowering to the depths of the body instead of bringing it to the surface in healthful reaction.

"A loathsome town," he muttered as he looked out on either side. "Looks something like London — no, Liverpool. The people look English, too." A big, dingy street car with bell wildly clanging darted from a narrow side street into the narrow main street which the cab was following. There was a bare escape from a disastrous collision. "It's America, right enough," he said.

The rain was whirling in the savage wind; umbrellas were tossing and twisting, impeding without in the least sheltering the sullen throngs on the sidewalks. Everything looked wet and sticky and chilly and forbidding. "They certainly are English," he said as he noted the passing faces; and he did not like it. In New York he had been amused by the variety — specimens of all nationalities, often several nationalities struggling for expression in the same face. Here the sameness was tiresome to him, and he missed the alert look of New Yorkers of all kinds.

He began to feel somewhat better, however, when he reached the wide front hall of Mrs. Staunton's big, old-fashioned, comfortable house on the water side of Beacon Street. And he felt still better when the butler showed him to the room he was to occupy — the furniture and hangings, the woodwork and wall-paper, sombre yet homelike in the light and warmth of an open fire. At half-past five he entered the drawing-room in fairly good humor now that he and Hutt were established and safe from the weather. He joined Mrs. Staunton and her daughter-in-law at the fire where they were cozily ensconced with a tea-table between them.

"You must have a cheerful impression of Boston," said young Mrs. Staunton, called Mrs. Ridgie — her husband's name was Ridgeway.

"That wind was a bit nasty," replied Frothingham. "But I've forgiven and forgotten it. I always spill my troubles as soon as ever I can."

MR. GILSON — A DISCIPLE

"You'll detest Boston after New York," continued Mrs. Ridgie. "I've lived here ten years. It's — it's a hole."

Her mother-in-law's expression was not pleasant, and Frothingham saw at a glance that they disliked each the other. "Virginia is from New York," she said to him apologetically. "She determined in advance not to like us, and she does not change her mind easily."

"Us." Virginia smiled mockingly. "Mother, here," she said to Frothingham, "was born at a place a few miles away — Salem, where they burned witches ——"

"Hanged witches — none was burned," interrupted Mrs. Staunton.

"Thank you, dear — hanged witches. At any rate, she was born at Salem. And her people removed to this very house more than forty years ago. The other day I was talking to old Judge Arkwright and spoke of my mother-in-law as a Bostonian. 'But,' said he, 'she's not a Bostonian. She's of Salem town.' Think of it, Lord Frothingham! She's lived here nearly half a century and she married a man whose family has lived here two hundred years. And they still speak and think of her as a stranger. That's Boston."

"It reminds me of home," said Frothingham. "Very different from New York, isn't it? I asked the woman I took in to dinner the other night where her parents came from. 'Good Lord, don't ask me!' she said. 'All I know about it is that they came in a hurry and never went back.'"

"How sensible!" said Mrs. Ridgie, the more enthusiastically for her mother-in-law's look of disgust. "You'll notice that people on this side never talk of their ancestors unless there's something wrong with themselves."

Mrs. Staunton restrained herself. "You'll give Lord Frothingham a very false idea of this country, Virgie," she said with softness in her voice and irritation in her eyes.

"Oh, he's certain to get that anyhow. He'll see only one kind of people while he's here, and though they think they're the whole show they don't amount to that." At "that" she snapped her fingers so loudly and suddenly that both Mrs. Staunton and Frothingham started. "If you came really to know this country," she went on, "you'd find out that just as soon as people here begin to pose as 'our best people,' 'our best society,' and all that rot, they begin to amount to nothing. They're has-beens, or on the way to it. We don't stand still here — not even in Boston. We're always going up or coming down."

After a silence Mrs. Staunton ventured to say, "I think you'll find, Lord Frothingham, that the tone of Boston is, as I told you, far higher than New York's."

"Really!" Frothingham looked slightly alarmed. "That's bad news," he said. "I don't go in for a very high tone, you know. I'm keyed rather low, I should say."

"You needn't be frightened," said Mrs. Ridgie. "They beat the air a good deal here. But, if you'll be patient and not encourage 'em, they'll soon get down to the good old business of raveling reputations. At that they're far superior to New York."

Mrs. Staunton looked vigorous dissent, but said nothing. They listened for a few minutes to the drowsy crackling of the wood fire and to the futile beat of the storm against the windows. Then Mrs. Ridgie rose. "I'll see you at dinner," she said to Frothingham. "I forgive you for being so cross to me, belle-mère," she said to Mrs. Staunton, patting her on the cheek. Then her pretty little figure and pretty, pert face vanished. Mrs. Staunton frowned at the place where she had been — she disliked Virgie's hoydenish movements almost as much as her demonstrativeness; in her opinion, "no thoroughly respectable woman laughs loudly, uses slang or indulges in public kissing and embracing."

They were ten at dinner that night, and Frothingham, seated between Mrs. Staunton and a middle-aged, stiff and homely Mrs. Sullivan, tried to keep his spirits by drinking the champagne steadily — "Vile stuff," he said to himself, "and bad cooking, and a dull old woman on either side. And what's this rot they're talking?"

The conversation was of a Buddhist priest who was making converts among "the very best people." Mrs. Sullivan was contending that he was a fraud and that his teachings were immoral. Mrs. Staunton was defending him, assisted by a sallow, black-whiskered, long-haired young man on the opposite side of the table — a Mr. Gilson.

THE BOOK WAS A BURKE'S PEERAGE

Frothingham would not even pretend to listen. His look and his thoughts wandered down the table to Cecilia Allerton.

Her slender paleness was foiled by two stout red and brown men — Ridgeway Staunton and Frank Mortimer. They were eating steadily, with the slow, lingering movements of the jaw which proclaim the man or the beast that wishes to get food into the mouth rather than into the stomach. Between mouthfuls they drank champagne, holding it in the mouth and swallowing deliberately. Cecilia was evidently oblivious of them and of the rest of her surroundings. "She looks sickly," thought Frothingham, "and an iceberg."

She had a small head, a high, narrow forehead, a long, narrow face — pale, almost gaunt. The expression of her mouth was prim to severity. But her eyes, large and brilliant brown and full of imagination, contradicted the coldness of the rest of her face, and gave her a look that was certainly distinction, if not beauty. "I wonder what she's thinking about?" said Frothingham to himself. "Buddhism, I wager. How English she looks. But they all do, for that matter, except this long-haired beast opposite. He looks a Spaniard, or something else Southern and dirty."

"Did you find that the New York women swore much, Lord Frothingham?"

He started. It was the Puritanic-looking Mrs. Sullivan. "I beg pardon," he said, turning his head so that his entrenched eye was trained upon her.

"The New York women," repeated Mrs. Sullivan. "Were they very profane?"

"Ah — well — that is —— Now, what would you call profane?" asked Frothingham in his dryest drawl. "Devil and that sort?"

"I should call that profane in a woman, and worse. I should call that vulgar."

"Really!"

"Shouldn't you?"

"Ah, I don't know. I don't call things. What's the use?"

"But you must have opinions."

"Lots of 'em — lots of 'em — a new set every day. It's a good idea to look at everything from all sorts of directions, don't you think?"

"If one has no sense of responsibility. But I know you have. One of the characteristics I particularly admire in the English upper class is their sense of responsibility. I think it splendid, the way they support the church and so set an example to the lower classes."

"I don't go in for that yet — I lie abed. It's not expected of one until he's head of a family. When I am, of course I'll tuck my book under my arm and toddle away on Sunday morning to do my duty. I think it's rather funny, don't you? We do as we jolly please all week and then on Sunday, when there's nothing naughty going on anyhow, we do our duty. Cleverest thing in the British Constitution that!"

"But you believe in your — your church, don't you?"

"Believe? To be sure. Every one does, except ghastly middle-class cranks. Some of 'em go crazy and are pious every day. Others go crazy and chuck it all. They run to extremes — that's bad form. I don't like extremes."

Mrs. Sullivan looked at Frothingham suspiciously. His face was always serious, but the eyeglass and the drawl and a shadow of a hint of irony in his tone raised a doubt. She returned to her original question: "They tell me that the women — the fashionable women — swear a great deal in New York now — that it's the latest fad."

"I can't say that they ever swore at me — much," replied Frothingham. "But then, you know, I'm rather meek. It's possible they might if I'd baited 'em."

"A few of our women here — those that hang round horses and stables all the time — have taken up swearing. It is said that they contracted the habit in New York and Newport. But I doubt it."

"Perhaps it's the horses that make 'em swear," suggested Frothingham. "Horses are such stupid brutes."

"And they smoke — but that's an old story. All the women smoke in New York, don't they?"

"I'm not observant. You see, I don't see well unless I look sharp."

Mrs. Sullivan smiled amiably. "You're very discreet, Lord Frothingham. You don't gossip — I detest it myself."

She talked to the man at her left, but soon turned to him with: "Doesn't it shock you, the way divorce is growing nowadays? It's almost as bad in England, I understand, as it is with us. We're taking up all the habits of the common sort of people. Really, I try to be broad-minded, but I can't keep up with the rising generation. A young married woman called on me this afternoon — she and her husband are of our best families. She told me she was engaged to a young married man in New York. 'But,' said I, 'you're both married.' 'We're going to get our divorces in the spring,' she said. She asked me not to say anything about her engagement — 'for,' she said, 'we haven't announced it. I haven't told my husband yet that I'm going to get a divorce, and my fiancé hasn't told his wife.' What do you think of that, Lord Frothingham?"

"Deuced enterprising, isn't it, now? That's what we call a Yankee notion. Do you think it'll go through?"

"I've no doubt of it. She's extremely energetic — and conscienceless — I'd say brazen, if she weren't a lady."

When the women went into the drawing-room, Ridgeway Staunton brought to Frothingham a tall, ascetic-looking man with the bald, smooth, bulging temples and the sourly curled lips of habitual bad temper. "Lord Frothingham, Mr. Allerton." They bowed stiffly and looked each at the other uncertainly.

"I've heard much of you from my sister-in-law, Mrs. Staunton," said Allerton.

"She's been very good to me," replied Frothingham cordially.

"She is an admirable woman," said Allerton. "She has been a mother — more than a mother — to my little girl for years."

"Your daughter was most fortunate," replied Frothingham in a tone of what was for him enthusiasm.

Allerton began to talk English politics; and Frothingham who, like Englishmen of all classes, knew his country's politics thoroughly, was astonished at the minuteness and accuracy of the American's knowledge. But he was amazed to find that Allerton, though an aristocrat and a Tory in the politics of his own country, with narrow and bitter class views, was in English politics a Liberal of the radical type — a "little Englander" and a "Home Ruler." And he presently discovered that there were other inconsistencies equally strange. For example, Allerton was savage in his hatred of all social innovations, was fanatical against the morals and manners of the younger people in the limited Boston set which he evidently regarded as the pinnacle and pattern of the whole world, yet was almost a sensualist in literature, art and music. He sneered at superstition, yet believed in ghosts and in dreams. Finally, he was a theoretical democrat, yet had a reverence for his own ancestry and for the title and ancestry of Frothingham that, even to Frothingham, seemed amusing and contemptible.

At first Frothingham was afraid lest he should express some opinion that would rouse the cold and tenacious dislike of Allerton. But he soon saw that, for the sake of his title and descent, he was regarded by the banker as privileged and exempt from criticism. Just as Mrs. Staunton and Mrs. Sullivan thought Frothingham's slang trenching on profanity not only tolerable but proper in him, so Allerton smiled with frosty indulgence upon his light and not very reverent criticisms in politics, religion, morals and art.

"What do you think of him?" Mrs. Staunton asked her brother-in-law when the men rejoined the women.

"A fine type of English gentleman," replied Allerton. "Manly and dignified, and his mind is keen. I liked him."

"I'm going to take him to Cecilia," said she.

"I'm sure Cecilia will like him. I don't think she's looking well, Martha."

"Poor child! You can't expect a girl of her depth of feeling, her spirituality, to recover soon. You must remember, it's been only a year and three months. This is the first time she's been out, isn't it?"

SHE SMILED PENSIVELY. "I'M TOO SERIOUS FOR FADS, I FEAR"

"I should not have believed she could be so disobedient as she has been in the past year," said Allerton sourly. "The night of the opening of the gallery I ordered her to come down and help me receive. I shall never forget that she locked herself in her room. It shows how the poison of the example of the young people nowadays permeates."

"But that was nearly a year ago, Edward. Be careful not to be harsh to her. She inherits — your imperiousness." Mrs. Staunton hesitated after "inherits" because the look in her brother-in-law's eyes reminded her that his wife — her sister — after enduring for eight years the penitentiary he made of his home, fled from him and refused to return, and lived by herself in a cottage at Brookline until her death.

After talking to several of her guests so that her action might not seem pointed, Mrs. Staunton took Frothingham where Cecilia was listening to Gilson's animated but not animating exposition of the true or Gilson theory of portrait painting. A moment after Frothingham was introduced Mrs. Staunton took the reluctant Gilson away.

Cecilia looked after him, a quizzical expression in her eyes. "Do you know Mr. Gilson?" she asked.

"No, I've only just met him."

"What do you think of him?"

"I can't say. I've barely seen him."

"But isn't Schopenhauer right where he says, 'Look well at a human being the first time you see him, for you will never see him again'?"

"I should say Gilson was — not very clean, then. Who is he?"

"He came here four years ago from we don't know where, and exhibited a lot of his own paintings, most of them portraits of himself in all sorts of strange attitudes and clothes. Everybody ran after him — we have a new craze here each year, you know. That year it was Gilson. A girl, a Miss Manners, married him. If it hadn't been for that he'd have been forgotten and would have disappeared. As it is, we still have him with us. That's his wife on the sofa."

Frothingham looked toward the enormously fat woman, disposed there and gazing round vaguely with a sleepy, comfortable, complacent smile. "How do you know it's a sofa she's sitting on?" he asked.

"Because I saw it before she sat down," replied Cecilia. "Her fad is a diet of raw wheat. If she'd been where you could see her at the table you'd have noticed that she ate only raw wheat. She's served specially everywhere since she got the idea last autumn. She brings her wheat with her."

"And what is your fad — you say every one has a fad?"

"Every one except me." She smiled pensively. "I'm too serious for fads, I fear."

"Then you're not a Buddhist or a Spiritualist?" he said with a sigh of relief.

The color flared into her face. "Spiritualism." Her lips compressed and seemed even thinner. Her expression vividly suggested her father. "But that is not a fad. Only the thoughtless and the ignorant call it a fad."

Frothingham's face became blank. "This is a time to sit tight," he said to himself. "She's looking at me as if I were a witch and she were about to burn — no, hang — me."

"It would be a dreary world, it seems to me," she went on, her voice low and a queer light in her softening eyes, "if it were not for the friendship and guidance of those in the world beyond."

"Really!" His tone might have meant almost anything except the wonder and amusement it concealed.

Her father came to take her home. "We should be glad to see you, Lord Frothingham, at our house," he said graciously. "I hope you will let Mrs. Staunton bring you."

"Thank you — I'll ask her to."

As he watched her leave he said to himself, "She's mad as a hatter — or is it just Boston?"

IX

ABOUT a week after he met Lord Frothingham at Mrs. Staunton's, Edward Allerton left his bank an hour before luncheon-time and went to the Public Library. His look as he entered was undoubtedly furtive; and as he drifted aimlessly round the reading-room, declining the offers of assistance from the polite and willing attendants, his manner was such that had he been a stranger he would have been watched as a suspicious character. He took several reference books from the cases; finally and most carelessly of all, a Burke's Peerage. Half concealing it with his overcoat, he bore it to a table and seated himself. He turned the pages to where "Frothingham" appeared in large letters. There he stopped and read — at first nervously, soon with an attention that shut out his surroundings:

> Frothingham — George Arthur Granby Delafere Gordon-Beauvais, ninth earl of Frothingham, Baron de Beauvais, b. at Beauvais House, Surrey, March 9, 1865, s. of Herbert Delafere Gordon-Beauvais, eighth earl of F., and Maria Barstow, 2nd dau. of the Marquess of Radbourne. Succeeded on the death of his father, Aug. 4, 1890.

Allerton studied the coat-of-arms, which originated, in part, in the tenth century, so Burke said. He read on and on through the description of the secondary titles and other honors of his sister-in-law's guest, into the two columns of small type which set forth the history of the Gordon-Beauvais family — its far origin, Godfrey de Beauvais, a great lord in the time of Charlemagne, so Burke declared; its many and curious vicissitudes of fortune, its calamities in old France through the encroachments of the Dukes of Burgundy, which finally drove it, in poverty but with undiminished pride and unabated resolution, to live only by the sword and the tax-gatherer, to England in the wake of William the Conqueror; its restoration there and long and glorious lordship, so glorious that it scorned the titles a mere Tudor or Stuart or German nobody could give until 1761, when it condescended to receive from George III the Earldom of Frothingham. There were places in the narrative so weak that even the adroit and sympathetic Burke could not wholly cover them. But the Milk Street banker saw them not. No child ever swallowed a tale of gnomes and fairies and magic vanishings and apparitions with a mind more set upon being fooled. He read slowly. And when he came to the end he read it through again, and found it all too short.

He started from his trance, glanced at his watch, noted that no attendants were in sight, and stole hastily away from the scene of his orgie. But in his agitation he was guilty of the stupidity of the novice — he left the book on the reading-desk; he left it open at the second page of "Frothingham." An attendant was watching afar off; as soon as Allerton had slipped away he swooped, full of idle yet energetic curiosity.

When he saw that the book was a Burke's Peerage he was puzzled; then he turned back a page and his eye caught the name "Frothingham." Like all Boston, he knew that the Earl was in town, was staying at the Mrs. Staunton's, "on the water side of Beacon Street." And like all Boston, he had heard the rumor that the Earl was trying to marry "Celia" Allerton, the second heiress of Boston. Thus, the sight of that name caused a smile of delight to irradiate his fat, pasty face. He looked round for some one to enable him to enjoy his discovery of a great man's weakness by tattling it. He saw Gilson, industriously "loading up" for a lecture on "color in Greek sculpture and architecture."

He hastened to him and touched him on the shoulder. "Come with me," he whispered.

Gilson, a natural gossip, had not lived four years in Boston without becoming adept in the local sign language of his species. He rose and followed to the table whereon was spread the damning proof of Allerton's guilt.

"Look at this," whispered the attendant, pointing to the name "Frothingham."

Gilson looked, first at the page, then at the attendant. His expression was disappointment — he cared not a rap about Frothingham or Burke's genealogical romances.

"But who do you think was sitting here," whispered the attendant, "reading away at this for more than an hour?"

"Frothingham?" said Gilson, in the reading-room undertone. "Those adventurers are always crazy about themselves."

"No — Edward — Allerton!" As he hesitated on the name the attendant shot his big head forward; at the climax he jerked it back, regarding the artist with delighted eyes.

"You don't say so!" exclaimed Gilson, and then they had a fit of silent laughter.

"Don't give me away," cautioned the attendant.

By nine o'clock the next night there was not a member of the Beacon Street set, whether living in Boston or in Brookline or other adjacent suburbs, who had not heard the news; and the mails were carrying it to those at a distance. And wherever it was repeated there was the same result — derision, pretended contempt of such vulgar snobbishness, expressions of wonder that an Allerton had descended to such low trafficking. Of course, none dared tell the Stauntons and the Allertons or Frothingham. But Frothingham, who saw everything through that monocle of his, noted the curious smiles that always greeted him, saw the grins and nudgings and cranings when he and Cecilia Allerton appeared in public.

One of the many rules which Mr. Allerton had established for the guidance of his household in the lines he regarded as befitting the establishment of a gentleman of family and tradition was that Cecilia must be at the half-past seven o'clock breakfast with her father. Usually he did not speak after his brief, formal salutation — a "Good-morning, Cecilia," and a touch of his dry, thin lips to her forehead; but he might wish to speak, and it would be a grave matter if he should wish to speak and no one were there for him to speak to. Besides, he always gave his orders at breakfast — his comments on the shortcomings in the servants or in Cecilia's housekeeping; his criticisms of her conduct. These "breakfasts of justice" were not held often, because Cecilia made few mistakes, and the maids — Allerton kept no men servants but a coachman — had been long in the family service and had therefore been long cowed and trimmed and squeezed to the Edward Allerton mould for menials. But when there was a "breakfast of justice" it was memorable.

Toward the end of the second week of Frothingham's Boston sojourn Mr. Allerton laid aside his paper at breakfast and looked at Cecilia. Agnes, the second waitress, who always attended at breakfast, understood the signal and at once left the room, closing the door behind her. Cecilia gave a nervous little sigh, dropped her eyes and put on the pale, calm expression behind which she hid herself from her father.

"You were at Doctor Yarrow's lecture yesterday afternoon, I believe?" Allerton began.

Cecilia's nerves visibly relaxed as she noted that his voice was not the dreaded voice of justice. "Yes, sir," she replied.

"It was on the evidences of communication with the spirit world, was it not?"

"Yes, sir — the fourth in the series."

"Who accompanied you?"

"Aunt Martha and Lord Frothingham."

There was a pause, then Mr. Allerton coughed slightly and said: "How do you like the young Englishman, Cecilia?"

Cecilia lifted her eyes in a frightened glance that dropped instantly before her father's solemn, rigid gaze. "He's — well-mannered and agreeable," she replied. "I like him as much as one can like a foreigner."

"I'm surprised at your speaking of him as a foreigner. He — in fact, he seems to me quite like one of our own young men, except that he lives upon a higher plane and shows none of the degeneration, the vulgarization, I may say, with which our young men have become infected through the overindulgence of their parents and contact with New York."

Another long pause, and when Allerton spoke there was a suggestion of combating opposition in his voice. "I have been much impressed with the young man. Titles are very deceptive. As you know, I have no regard for them or for the system which produces and maintains them. But, his title aside, the young man comes of a family that has the right sort of blood. You must have noticed the evidences of it in his face and in his manners and character?"

As the statement was put interrogatively, Cecilia knew her duty too well not to reply. "He has a strongly-featured face," she said. "But it seemed to me to indicate rather a race that had been great, but was now — small."

Allerton frowned. "I am sure that, properly established, he would have a distinguished career." He paused, then went on in a tone Cecilia understood and paled before: "It would be most satisfactory to me to have my daughter married to him. I should regard it as satisfactory in every way. You would be established in an honorable and dignified position. You would exert in society and the wider world the influence to which your birth and breeding entitle you. You would maintain the traditions of your family and strengthen his."

Cecilia shivered several times as he was speaking; but when she spoke her low voice was firm. "But father, you know my heart is with Stanley."

Her father looked steadily at her — the look she felt like a withering flame. "I requested you more than two years ago — months before he died — never to mention his name to me and never to think of him seriously again. I repeat, it would be gratifying to me if you were to marry Lord Frothingham. When is he leaving your Aunt Martha's?"

"Next Monday, I believe. He goes down to Brookline — to Mrs. Ridgie."

"You are invited for the same time?"

"Yes."

"I shall expect you to go." Mr. Allerton rose. "I trust, in thinking the matter over, you will appreciate that I am more capable to judge what is best for you than you are, with your limited experience and the narrow views of life and duty not unnatural in youth." He left the room, severe and serene, master of himself and of his household.

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

THE RIVALRY FOR THE DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP OF THE HOUSE AND THE NOW ASSURED SUCCESS OF THE ADMINISTRATION TRUST MEASURES

THE first two months of the present session of Congress have brought little of the personal or spectacular order. They have been preoccupied with movements rather than with men. The period has been singularly fruitful in developments of momentous and far-reaching importance, but they have not been accompanied by the dramatic incident or the personal scenes which excite and absorb human interest. The actors have not found other occasion for appearance or have waited while the great events were shaping.

There have been two movements of the highest consequence — one in foreign and the other in domestic affairs. The Venezuelan dispute, with the vigorous and successful interposition of our Government, gives a new and living force to the Monroe Doctrine and opens a new chapter, as keen-sighted men perceive, in the relations of our country to the nations of this continent. The evolution of the trust legislation, now reasonably certain to be worked out, has the largest business and political significance at home. Behind the effective management of the first the President has gained stature as a still greater figure. Behind the skillful handling of the second Attorney-General Knox has engaged interest as an acute and deft adviser.

But in Congress the scenic display has been moderate. In the House a single passage at arms between General Grosvenor and Champ Clark has barely suggested the combats which we are wont to look for in that arena. These doughty champions of the two opposing parties are the keenest of antagonists and the best of friends. Each knows the strong points of the other and the weak points in his harness. They thrust each other in public and chum together in private. Their clashes in the House are good practice for their joint debates under the auspices of the lyceum or the Chautauqua, and vice versa. Both have sharp wit, ready repartee, large experience and strong forensic power.

General Grosvenor has long been one of the most effective leaders of his party in the House. His aggressive spirit and pungent sarcasm have left their stings, but when it comes to a rough-and-tumble contest on the floor they give him a rare equipment. Champ Clark is making a strong and promising play for the leadership of his side. He had an able competitor in the delegation from his own State of Missouri. Mr. De Armond is a fluent and forceful speaker, with a trained mind and quick penetration, but he is painfully serious. He has no humor and little adaptability, while Champ Clark is full of both. This has given Clark the precedence.

His only real rival on the Democratic side for the Speakership nomination and the recognized leadership is Mr. Williams, of Mississippi. Mr. Williams has decided qualifications for the place. He is facile and fertile. His humor is not so broad and radiant as Champ Clark's, but he has enough to redeem him and it is sometimes subtle and scintillating. He has much of the old style of the florid and exuberant Southern orator, and with his attractive personal qualities it wins a large following. Mr. Clark combines intense earnestness with true bonhomie. He is a stalwart, robust man with a hearty nature, and it gleams in his eyes. He is forceful and vehement as well as humorous and picturesque, and his native original powers are united with literary tastes and marked historical bent. If the leadership of the Democratic side be committed to him he will give it a piquant flavor.

In the Senate the real interest of the session has been behind the scenes rather than on the surface. Nothing has apparently been done, and ample, even superfluous, time has been taken in doing it. Yet it would not be fair to reproach the Senate with wasting time. Perhaps it was best employed. That body has an imposing way of filling the days and weeks with voluble and impressive emptiness before the public while it is privately preparing the way for important conclusions and quick action in the end. It often debates one subject with tedious prolixity while all its thoughts and efforts are centred on another. The cloak-room and the dinner-table are frequently the scenes of its real deliberations rather than the Senate Chamber. The secondary figures occupy the stage while the master spirits are behind the flies arranging for the dénouement.

The languid debate on the omnibus Statehood bill has served the purpose of consuming the time while the plans were being laid for the more vital questions. At one time it seemed that there might be a stormy contest on this subject. Strong personal interests were enlisted for the admission of the Territories and deep feeling against it. But as time passed by interest declined, though it may flame out again, and Senator Quay's bold challenge and defiant ultimatum look as if he reckoned on his votes for the bill even more confidently than his opponents on their majority to side-track it. It is not yet clear what the outcome will be.

Meanwhile, what was little more than an episode served to whet the appetite for the moment. The reappearance of Senator Vest in the field of debate deepened the general regret that his career is coming to an end. Feeble in body, scarcely able to hold himself up, his intellect flamed out with much of its old brilliancy. He has been one of the most trenchant debaters of his side and at times has blazed forth with a splendor of oratorical power which has enchained the Senate. He was bold, incisive and radical. He neither asked for quarter nor gave it. He did not "mince the sin nor mollify damnation with a phrase"—but what he considered the sin he assailed with unsparing denunciation. Peculiarly strong as an aggressive debater, he flung aside on rare occasions the helmet and sword of the gladiatorial arena and appeared caparisoned only in the lighter and brighter colors of the gentle tourney, and then the glow of his imaginative eloquence charmed all within its spell. The extinguishment of his light will be a distinct loss to the Senate.

What the "Iowa Idea" Means

In the by-play on the tariff—for it was only by-play incident to the exigent coal question—the speech on the Republican side which arrested most attention was that of Senator Dolliver. Naturally, since it was the one speech which struck out of the fixed lines. Senator Dolliver vigorously espoused what has come to be known as "the Iowa idea." That idea is itself rather indefinite. It depends chiefly on the interpreter. In the translation of Governor Cummins it means one thing; in that of Secretary Shaw quite another. In the one case it means early and signal tariff revision; in the other it means delayed and conservative action at the chosen time. Under the one leadership it signifies reciprocal trade arrangements which shall give and take even at some sacrifices; under the other it signifies reciprocity agreements with full home protection.

Senator Dolliver cast in his lot fully with Governor Cummins. This is a declaration which is not without political significance. Governor Cummins is the leader of those Republicans who hold that some of the tariff rates are too high and openly advocate a reduction. They inferentially admit that these rates sustain monopolies and imply that to strike at monopolies we should strike at the tariff. There is nothing in the terms of the Iowa platform, as they stand, to which all Republicans cannot assent. But Governor Cummins puts upon them an interpretation which makes them mean more than they say. Perhaps the interpretation of others makes them say less than they mean. The prevailing Republican sentiment does not go so far as Governor Cummins, but, though holding that there is nothing sacred about the schedules and that they should be governed and modified by conditions of production and price, holds at the same time that revision should be regulated by a conservative spirit and by business security.

Thus "the Iowa idea" may not be altogether harmonious with itself. It is partly economic and partly political. Probably Governor Cummins fully believes in the policy he expounds, and probably also he sees in it a way of making an issue and gaining the leadership of the Republican party in Iowa. In this respect the contest is more political than economic. When Senator Dolliver joins Governor Cummins he gives new force to his view. The junior Senator is less wary and more positive than the senior. During the campaign the astute Senator Allison showed that the Iowa platform is entirely in harmony with the National platform. So it is upon the plain construction of its language, but whose interpretation is to be followed? Senator Allison, with his great experience, his cautious temperament and his adroit methods would avoid an issue. But Senator Dolliver follows Governor Cummins and plants himself with the advanced revisionists. He is a vigorous and courageous advocate and adds strength to any cause he accepts.

On one phase of the question he was partly right and partly wrong. He was right in contending that the Dingley law was framed with a view to reciprocity and in repelling the charge that the contemplation of such a purpose in fixing the rates was a reflection on Mr. Dingley's honor and good faith. Certainly there is nothing in the idea of reciprocity which is open to criticism. It is a legitimate national policy. The door was opened in the McKinley law. The plan was carried out in the Blaine treaties. And if reciprocal trade arrangements are right and wise, it is indisputably legitimate to fix tariff rates so as to prepare the way for them. Senator Dolliver's defense of the policy of putting tariff rates higher than was needful in order to use them to trade on was effective and complete.

But he was wrong in urging that the obligation of reciprocity involves the duty of ratifying the Kasson treaties. Because the Dingley bill was constructed with a view to reciprocal agreements it does not necessarily follow that any particular agreements which may happen to have been made must be confirmed. They are to be judged and determined on their own merits. The general policy is morally obligatory and economically wise. But the measures for carrying it out are matters of detail, and are to be considered with reference to the question whether they are best adapted to the end. If the treaties sacrifice some important interests for the sake of others, it is legitimate to weigh the question whether the gain justifies the loss. If they can be dropped and more advantageous arrangements made, there is no reason why it should not be done.

The anti-trust bill of Senator Hoar was so extreme and radical that much interest attached to his explanation of its assumptions. But his speech was rather a discussion of general trust evils than an exposition of proposed remedies. As an ethical discourse on corporate dangers and needed restraints it was brilliant and impressive. Senator Hoar is never lacking in the elements of moral atmosphere and strong portraiture. But as an analysis of his own measure and a justification of its provisions the speech left something to be desired. His bill was revolutionary in the scope of its governmental supervision of business, in the sweep of its trade prohibitions and inquisitions, in the extent of its individual responsibility and in the character of its personal penalties. There was curiosity to see how he would explain and vindicate these sweeping and searching powers, and his speech did not go so far into these questions as was hoped.

The bill has been spoken of in these articles as monumental, but this was rather because the question it presents is transcendent than because of its own intrinsic importance. The legislation which will be the outcome of the trust agitation will be the supreme measure of the session in its immediate significance and in its future import; but it soon became plain that though Senator Hoar's bill crystallized in drastic form the new idea of governmental control and regulation, it was too extreme for an initial experiment and too theoretical for ultimate attainment.

To the President the Credit

The policy which will prevail is the President's, and the master-hand in shaping the concrete act is the Attorney-General's. The genius and courage of the President initiates a new departure for the country, and the skill and grasp of Mr. Knox as an expert in law and constitutional power give it practical form. They have command of the situation, and to those who can rightly estimate moral forces it has been plain from the first that sooner or later, in one form or another, they would control. It needed the moral insight, energy and purpose of the President to propel the blow. A man of less will and resolution would have dallied with the delicate and difficult question. When he saw the dangers and evils of unregulated corporate power and insisted upon regulation for the public protection, he not only struck the popular chord but touched the root of a subject which involves both public safety and political success.

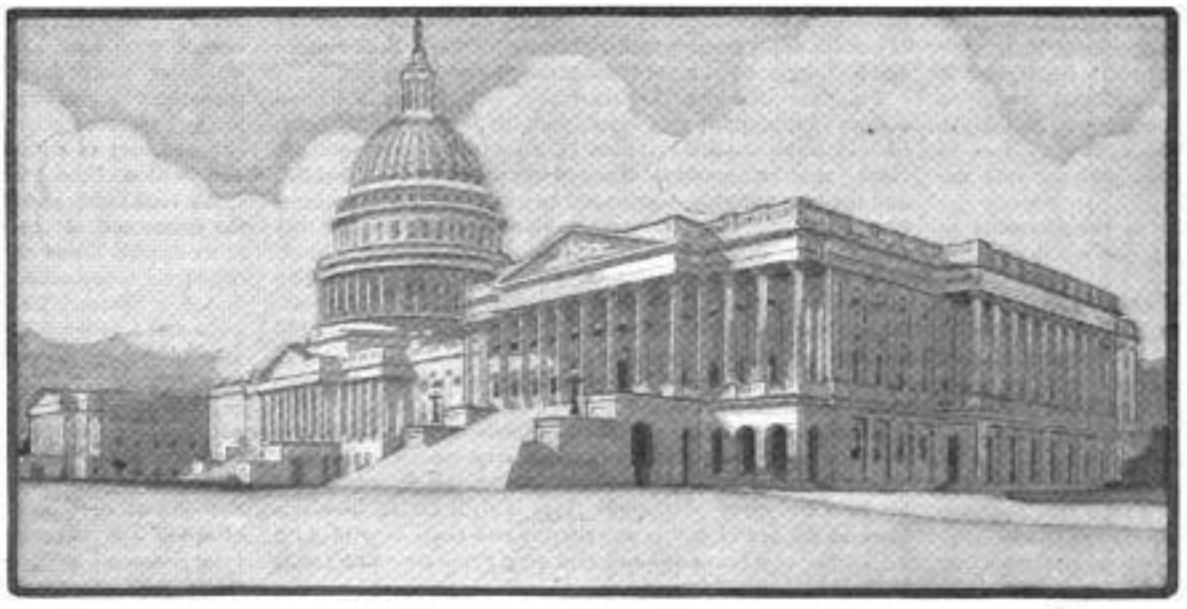
His deliverances evinced political penetration, sagacity and courage of the highest order; but, beyond and above that, they exhibited the best moral qualities and conscientious and bold devotion to the public welfare. It was not at all surprising that at first the President was a little uncertain of his ground. He was not sure but that a constitutional amendment was required. The question was new, obscure and perplexing. But the one thing he was sure about was that some measure of restraint and regulation must be found, and the problem was to do this without exciting the antagonism of powerful and conservative elements in Congress and especially in the Senate, without alarming legitimate business, without arousing an influential and dangerous hostility.

This problem has been worked out with the persistence of the President, with the skill of the Attorney-General, with the growing perception of the Congressional leaders, and with the ripening sense of the corporate capitalists. The enactment of a law regulating trusts is now accepted as reasonably certain. It will be neither extreme nor ineffective. It will be a rational compromise between doing nothing and doing too much. It will inaugurate the experiment of Government control of corporate combinations within safe limits. Supervision as a part of the work of a responsible executive department and not through a special commission with its overzeal; publicity through reports and thorough inquiries where needful without vexatious interference or unnecessary exposure; the prohibition of rebates or discrimination; the expedition of pending litigation with the enlightenment of the expected decisions—these are the cardinal features.

Under the development of the plan, with the resolute determination behind it, opposition has practically melted away. The skeptical leaders in Congress have yielded to its wisdom. They have come to see that the President's heroic leadership has created a public sentiment which compels legislation. It is fair to them to say that their counsel has moderated action, and has contributed to the evolution of a judicious measure to which they could assent. The result is another striking illustration of the fact that under our American system, with all its conflicts and cross-currents, we work out sound conclusions in the end.

Not the least notable result is the attitude of the corporate interests which are directly affected. It cannot be said that they welcome the proposed legislation, but the wisest and most conspicuous capitalists who direct them have come to acquiesce in it on the ground that it is more prudent to accept moderate and wholesome legislation than to provoke more violent and radical action. Indeed, it is not unlikely they will recognize what other observers perceive, that the measure now undertaken is really in the true interest of sound property and conservative corporations. It protects them against their own temptations and safeguards them against more extreme assaults. It may deter special favoritism and speculative selfishness, but it will conserve healthy business enterprise.

The consummation of this act will be a great triumph for the President. It will be the most signal personal achievement of his administration up to this time, and it will be difficult for him to overmatch it in all the elements of success, no matter what opportunities may come to him. It is distinctly his work. He began it alone. He alone recognized the urgency, saw the way and had the courage. He found a deep but indefinite and disorganized public sentiment, and he crystallized and consolidated it into an irresistible force. He has had able and invaluable help, but the initiative, the inspiration and the momentum were his.



When we consider the difficulties and obstacles—the inherent perplexities of the question, the fear of business disturbance, the skepticism and backwardness of political leaders, the opposition of powerful interests—this speedy and successful solution must be esteemed one of the most striking achievements in our public annals. If it be regarded as a relief from public evils and dangers, it shows bold, penetrating and elevated statesmanship. If it be regarded as a stroke of political policy to remove party perils and disarm ominous cries, it shows strong and masterful leadership. It has been a critical test for President Roosevelt in many ways, and it is now well assured that he successfully passes it.

A Mechanical Envelope-Licker

A MACHINE that will seal from 8000 to 15,000 envelopes an hour will commend itself to large commercial houses, government departments, political committees, and other institutions and organizations that send out mail in great quantities. Such a machine to handle envelopes of any ordinary bulk has recently been invented. Mixed sizes also may be fed to it.

The envelopes are supplied to a hopper, and are carried by an infeed belt and cooperating attachments to a moistening device. The latter holds the flap turned down during a portion of its travel through the intricate mechanism, moistens it and presses it into a sealed position. The envelope is then delivered from the contrivance and is ready to be stamped and mailed.

In large institutions at present the business of sealing letters for the mail is a formidable undertaking. In the Treasury Department, for example, from ten to fifteen thousand letters are deposited daily in the mails. To seal these, the envelopes are placed face downward with their flaps overlapping, and clerks moisten them with paint-brushes dipped in water or paste. Each envelope then must be withdrawn, folded and sealed.

From the Frying-Pan to the Fire

A GOOD many people laughed at a Chicago man when he began to collect statistics to discover the relation between divorce and bad cooking. But they laugh no longer; for the ingenious Chicagoan has shown from the local records that in no less than one-fourth the divorce cases in a given period the avowed cause was the wife's cookery. She either cooked badly herself or permitted her cook's failures to undermine the digestion, the strength, the patience and the temper of her husband.

These wonderful facts call attention to the low state in which the art of housekeeping still lingers — not in Chicago alone, but wherever the free flag floats.

Our ancestors were content with the fried steak and the burnt potato, with the greasy flapjack and the dish-water coffee — first, because they worked hard in the open air and so had digestive apparatuses that ground like the mills of the gods; second, because they didn't know any better. But we are not thus content. We go to restaurants where the cookery is done fairly well. We travel on Pullman trains where the things served are up to a fair average. And a man who has once tasted good cooking becomes like a tiger that has once tasted human blood — he is never again satisfied with anything else, but goes grumbling and scowling and prowling until he finds what he seeks. In like manner the man who has once seen a well-managed, attractively furnished home is never content until he has one himself.

One of the curses of our imperfect, unformed though forming civilization is a certain uppishness that makes men and women foolishly discontented, that makes them talk and think much on false and silly ideas of their own dignity and deserts. This curse is a passing matter, doubtless inevitable; but it is serious while it lasts. It makes men careless at their work; it makes women careless at theirs. The man is peevish because he has a twenty-five-dollar-a-week job instead of the presidency of the company. The woman is fretful because she has to help or do her own work instead of spattering mud on the masses from the wheels of her own chariot. The men are kept in order somewhat because they have an unfeeling employer over them; but the women are not thus monitored, are free to give way to their discontent — and they, being human, do give way.

Hence this general tilting of feminine noses and curling of feminine lips at such "vulgar" things as housekeeping. It must busy itself with higher things — such, for example, as aping and envying the silly idle rich, as spending upon alleged artistic trash all the surplus income, as sighing and striving after show and pretense — in fact, anything but the plain, homely work in hand.

The true theory of marriage is a partnership on equal terms for a safe and comfortable journey through a world in which the ideal is hard and fast inclosed in a bristling burr of the material. To this partnership the man gives his ability as an income-getter, the woman her ability as a home-maker. On the good ship Matrimony not husband or wife is captain and pilot, but Love; and husband and wife are his hard-working crew; and if they don't work, each at the equally important duties, smash goes the ship on the rocks.

If the men had the housekeeping end of the work they would in all probability fall even further short of perfection than do the women. There is not anywhere in organized society an occupation that can absorb more intelligence, skill, energy and patience than housekeeping. Perhaps that's why men discreetly leave it in the hands of the women. But is it not strange that they do not rise more rapidly to their opportunities, that they do not develop the great science and art which the world looks to them to elevate and improve? Is it not a reproach to any woman that a mere restaurant can set a better table than she can, that any mere hotel can be more comfortable, better ordered, better cleaned and dusted than her house?

If the average woman worked as many hours each day at her housekeeping — thinking, doing and superintending — as her husband thinks he works at income-getting, there would be cobwebs on the divorce calendars, and, thanks to the women, men and women would be marching forward to the millennium quickstep.

It is important that men educate themselves. It is more important that the women, the mothers and counselors and inspirers of men, educate themselves — in that only true education which teaches that as the secret of the mystery of the universe lies hid in the "flower in the crannied wall," so does the mystery of progress and happiness lie hid in the small, homely things which the ignorant call trivial and vulgar.

Cheating the Children

ONE of our multi-millionaires who began life as a poor lad and did not succeed until middle age is said to enjoy the fun and luxury which his money brings him like a hot-headed boy. He goes to balls and the play incessantly; he buys pictures, yachts, automobiles, and exults and rejoices loudly in each, until he becomes a bore to his blasé companions.

"How can you find so much pleasure in such things?" one of them asked him the other day.

"Because they are new to me. Remember that I had nothing when I was a boy," he answered.

Isn't there a significant hint here to well-to-do American parents of to-day? They are cheating their children's lives of certain enjoyments which rightfully belong to their mature age by forcing them upon them almost in their cradles.

Two generations ago the respectable, God-fearing father and mother in this country believed that the first virtue to teach their children was self-sacrifice. "Spare the rod and spoil the child" was their maxim. The rod was not spared to the child, and the boy, as a rule, was forced to work hard for his education or living. Money was scarce in those days, and the root idea of religion was asceticism. Emerson's mother laughed at him when he winced at their clothes in winter and an always empty stomach. What was cold or hunger, she cried, when Greek or philosophy could be conquered? Down to old age his body showed the scars of that cruel neglect in childhood; but he and his cult always glorified the Roman virtue of his mother.

Where will you find such Roman mothers now? We have gone to the other extreme in our treatment of children. Money is plenty. The "old man" has heaped up enough for his boys and girls. He stuffs them with luxuries, he roasts them in the fire of his prosperity, as live geese in Strasburg are stuffed and roasted — and with very much the same result to their brains and hearts.

Other nations are wiser. The heir to an English dukedom is kept in the nursery until he is old enough to go to Eton and be thumped and mauled by other boys. A royal princess of ten eats her boiled mutton and pudding with her governess at noon, and wears clothes as simple as those of any farmer's child. They never hear of "Society," although they are being trained to rule over it.

The child of the wealthy American at two years old is probably a competitor in a Baby Show at Asbury Park, arrayed in satin and lace and stared at by thousands. Or if her parents are a little too well-bred for that they take her to hotels in summer or scamper over Europe with her until she is grown. She is, as a rule, overdressed and self-conscious. She has at twelve the jewels, the manners and the effrontery of a middle-aged woman.

In all our large towns the children of wealthy parents have their theatre and card parties, their cotillons and balls, for which little boys engage their partners days in advance, and provide them with bouquets of costly roses. Their talk is of flirtations and engagements — a feeble parody of the feeble doings of their elders.

Now, is this state of things fair to the boys and girls?

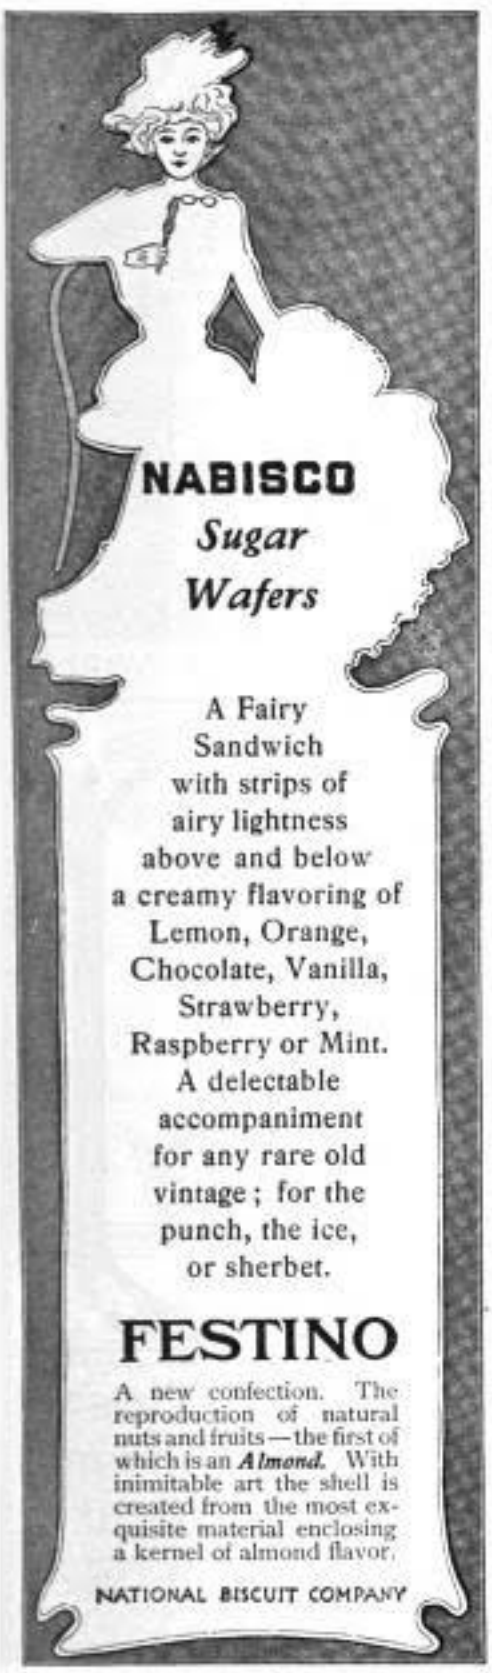
At ten they are cheated out of the fun of childish games, out of the relish for plain food, out of the joyous ignorance, the dreams, the innocence which belong to childhood; and at thirty they are cheated out of all enjoyment or the pleasures of middle age because they were satiated with them when they wore kilts.

What the Rough Hands Show

IT IS now pretty well settled that this country has attained the leadership of the world. Lord Charles Beresford admits it, Mr. Carnegie proclaims it, and the figures show it. Nor is there anything in the prospect to endanger our pre-eminence. We have the supplies to feed the world, we have the raw materials, and we have the manufactories to turn them into clothing, steel and other products that fit human needs. On other continents are vast resources, but the simple fact is that this country is a hundred years ahead of them in turning its advantages into machinery and wealth.

But we should not be too proud. It is a favorite figure of the poets to show that the man or nation that climbs to the greater heights must bear the penalties of prominence. Below are the cold jealousies of rivals who can see the defects of the one who has surpassed them with shining clearness. A peacock is a beautiful bird until he stands on a fence and shows his feet or tries to sing. So our very prominence has brought into light some of the misfortunes which we might hide were we content to sit idly on the shady side of progress.

We think we are a well-dressed people, but we are not. We think we know how to eat, but we bolt our meals and spend enough on dyspepsia medicine to convert the heathen. We think we have free government, but we bow to plundering politicians as though they were absolute monarchs of our lives and thoughts. Thus it goes until we find ourselves clinging to the main fact that the almighty dollar is running the world, and that we are sitting on the top of the rim.



In one thing especially we are lacking. Foreigners comment upon it every day. They have columns in their newspapers and reviews every week. They write letters about it constantly. It is so firmly fixed in their thoughts that they tell it to our faces. We have no leisure class. Leisure please, not laziness or worthlessness or do-nothingness, but the fine art of employing time without employment. Go to the clubs of most of our cities throughout the day and you will find them empty. Go to the assembling places of men where trade is tabooed and you will not find a real man on hand. They are always somewhere doing something, and in order to get in shape for functions or for the evening chat many of them are obliged to use hard brushes and common soap to remove the stain and grime of the day.

A very lovely woman gazed upon the somewhat reddened hands of the man who sat beside her at dinner. He very sheepishly said that he wished he could have left his hands at home for they looked and felt like two beets. They had, of course, been hard at work all day — they had been hard at work for many days. The lovely woman said, "I see in them the most beautiful thing in the world — power." (They are not married yet; so far as we know they are not even engaged, but of course they will be.) In a way this is an explanation of the American leadership of which we boast.

We read much and hear much of the elegant manners of the courts and of the powdered and low-bowing customs of other days. These thin speeches and idle forms were but masks for many evils, as at heart the old dandies were cads and often brutes. Real manhood and womanhood do not need frills and powder. Time is so valuable in this world that idling, whether it is spent in scholarly leisure or in pure laziness, is a sin.

Thus acknowledging our deficiencies we may swing back with greater satisfaction to the beauty and nobility of hard work and of the power which the rough hand shows. Frankly, we would rather have what we have than all the elegance and richness of dressing and nimbleness of wit that could be crowded into the drawing-rooms and clubs. Power is the most beautiful thing in the world — except love — and it is never quite so beautiful as when expressed in useful work.

LETTERS BY THE WAY

Telephone and Telegraph Trials

By CHARLES BATTELL LOOMIS
Author of The Man of Putty, etc.

EN ROUTE TO ST. LOUIS.

Dear Reader: The best thing about writing to you informally this way is that I can say anything that comes into my head. Now, if you had written to me asking my autograph I should have felt obliged to limit my answer to my signature, but as I write here with mile after mile of landscape reeling past me and telegraph poles pursuing each other with a regularity that is monotonous I feel that one subject is as good as another.

Speaking of telegraph poles reminds me that up in some parts of New England they called them telephone poles because there are more telephone than telegraph wires.

There! My subject has come to me. Which gives one the more annoyance: telegrams or the telephone?

If you live in a far-off country place the casual telegram is more expensive, but less irritating, because, as a general thing, you are not gasping for air and expiring of heat when you receive it; but, on the other hand, although you can telephone to thousands on your own circuit at fifteen cents a message, the refinements of cruelty to which "Central" will subject you are enough to give the telephone first place.

Suppose you have five minutes in which to get a man in New York who leaves his office at the stroke of five with the precision of a machine. Perhaps you want to tell him you have decided to take his country house for next summer during his absence abroad. It is five minutes to five when you call him up and hang up the receiver. One, two, three minutes pass and then in an agony of impatience you call Central and hastily explain your position. She cuts you off when half through with the cold cry of "Busy." It is a cold cry, but it does not cool you in the least. You have been shut up in a hermetically sealed hole that stands right next to the radiators and your thoughts are on the poor wretches in the Calcutta one.

Another minute and the bell tinkles and you get your man. No, it is his stenographer. You speak hastily and say, "Stop Mr. Blank; I want to speak to him." The answer comes back, "He has just left the office, but I'll get him in the hall. Hold the wire." Five hours pass. Time is only relative and your sufferings in that pit of Tophet make it really seem like five days. From time to time Central says "Through?" and each time you snap at her like a man with hydrophobia.

At last you hear the voice of the stenographer breathless and annoyed. "He's gone. I followed him down in the next elevator but he had stepped on a trolley a minute before. Anything important?"

"Yes, I wanted to tell him that I will take that house next summer."

"Oh, you're Mr. Myles. Why, that's too bad. He waited until a minute past five and then he said he guessed you didn't want it and he's gone out to tell Mr. Schuyler he can have it. Too bad."

Too bad! Central says in that irritating voice of hers, "Through?" and you yell "Yes" at her and shut off. Too bad!!! Maddened by prickly heat you sulphurize the air of the box and then fling open the door and stagger out into the sweet sunshine, and a voice says, "You had it ten minutes. Seventy cents."

But the worst of the telephone annoyances is the "cut off." Bell invented the telephone but the devil invented the cut-off, and I hope he's sorry for it by this time.

Let me tell you. Last year I was called up on the telephone by an artist friend in New York, Velasquez Hopkinson. I had a little difficulty in getting his name as it seemed as if every trolley car in the East was buzzing over the 'phone, but at last I made it out and he said, "Myles, there's going to be a little dinner to-morrow in honor of Rembrandt Smith and eight or ten artists will be there and we want you to join us. Every guest is to receive a little water-color by Smith as a souvenir and La Farge is going to make a speech, and we want you to come and look solemn. Can you do it?"

"I sure can," said I. "The La Farge part is the best of it next to the water-colors—and the dinner. Who else is going to be there?"

"Well, there's (no, no, Central)—there's Inniss Junior and Murphy and McCord and Crane and Curran and a lot of the boys. Get there at seven and never mind evening clothes. Come in your smoking-jacket if you haven't anything else. It'll be the greatest dinner of—shut up, Central——"

Again the hum of trolleys and then silence.

Now, he shouldn't have spoken that way to Central, and I suppose she cut him off as a rebuke, but just out of curiosity I wanted to know where that dinner was going to be held—you know a fellow will sometimes have an uncontrollable longing for some footy bit of knowledge—so I called up Central and asked her to get me my friend again.

"What was his number?" said a voice.

What was his number! What a question. I didn't know his number. Didn't know he had a number. He was an artist, not a policeman. I said as much, and then I was made to realize that I was an ass when I was asked for his 'phone number. But of course I didn't know that, either. I couldn't find his name in the directory and I didn't have any idea where he lived.

Not till a week later did I meet Velasquez Hopkinson in New York. He asked me why in thunder I disappointed them. He was most sorry when he learned that the telephone was the cause of it, and he sent me the water-color I should have received, and now it hangs in my parlor a souvenir of a dinner that I didn't attend.

So much for telephones. Now let me tell you of a telegraph annoyance before I stop writing. This car joggles so that I doubt if I can read what I have written.

Some years ago I lived in a little hill town up in Connecticut. I was not a millionaire then and a dollar meant a shoe for James or perhaps two rubbers for Betsinda. It didn't mean fun, let me tell you. It never meant fun in those days, and as for its meaning a luxury I could not have imagined such a thing—even during my inventive hours.

I lived three or four miles from the nearest telegraph office and the W. C. T. U. charged a dollar for delivering messages. Therefore I told editors and friends not to wire me unless it was of the primest importance.

One day I received a letter from a friend in the West. He said he was on his way to Boston and he wanted to spend a night with me and talk over old times.

Well, I was glad. I had plenty of chickens and the spare bed was left me by a luxury-loving aunt, so it was soft. I could feed him and sleep him without paying out a cent. Not that I didn't have a cent. Counting the money in the baby's bank I had one hundred and twenty-three cents.

The day dawned on which my friend was to come and to my great sorrow it was raining pitchforks. He knew the April roads for he had lived in Connecticut when he was a boy, and I knew perfectly well that his asthma would not allow him to attempt to come. I was sincerely sorry, but I said to Mrs. Myles, "Lucky it is raining so very hard because he won't think of telegraphing. He knows I sha'n't expect him in this rain."

Along about the middle of the afternoon, while I was wondering whether the clouds of all sorts were ever going to break away, I saw a bedraggled boy on a bedraggled horse painfully wading through the slough that they dignify by the name of road—because a road means civilization and a slough doesn't.

I recognized the telegraph messenger while he was yet a great way off and I said to Mrs. Myles, "The worst has happened. One dollar to the telegraph trust."

Just ten words, ten unnecessary words for which I was about to pay a dollar. No shoe for James, no two rubbers for Betsinda.

Fifty cents was in my Sunday trousers; twenty-five in Mrs. Myles' purse. That was all we had. But there was the baby's bank. Dear little baby. What is home without a baby—and her bank?

I got it out in the usual way. I used to buy hairpins by the dozen in those days, and there was as I had thought forty-eight cents—one hundred and twenty-three cents in all.

I don't know what mad whim led me to do it, but when I handed the boy the dollar for the telegraph company I also handed him twenty-three cents as a tip.

After all, what's twenty-three cents on a rainy day?

Editor's Note—This is the second of Mr. Loomis' Letters. The next will appear in an early number.

The Automobile that Solves the Problem

Until the Cadillac was made, all automobile construction was more or less experimental. This machine is made on a new system developed from the experiences of all previous makers: the faults and weaknesses of the old methods have been avoided and a new ideal of motor travel developed that gives a perfect vehicle for comfort, speed, absolute safety, greatest durability, simplicity of operation, wide radius of travel, and reliability under all conditions of roads. You should not buy before examining this wonderful new machine. Price f. o. b. at factory, $750.

The new tonneau attachment, at an extra cost of $100, gives practically two motor vehicles in one, with a seating capacity of two or four, as required—a very graceful effect in either use. Write for new illustrated booklet.

Between the Lines

ONE of the oddities of fiction and fiction readers is the frequent alleged identification of imaginary characters with real persons. When Sir Gilbert Parker published The Seats of the Mighty serially his hero was named Stebo. The name was not euphonious and in the book it was changed to Moray. Thereupon the voice of one crying in the wilderness was heard from a distant Kansas town. The owner of the voice wrote the author that Captain Stebo who figured in the Canadian campaigns described in the story was his grandfather with several "greats." He had read the account of his honored ancestor with much zest. But now in the book his ancestor was abolished, and a stranger reigned in his place and appropriated his exploits. Therefore, the writer inquired pathetically what had become of his grandfather.

Not long since Miss Sara Beaumont Kennedy received a letter from a lady in Memphis who had read a novel by Miss Kennedy portraying Revolutionary days in North Carolina. The writer recognized a revered grandmother in the heroine and wrote an appreciative acknowledgment. But Miss Kennedy was forced to reply that the ancestor was unknown to her and the heroine was wholly fictitious.

Concerning Corrections

When Stephen Crane published The Red Badge of Courage it was supposed at first by many readers that he was a veteran, tried by fire. This delusion took firm root in England when the book became known, and it is even said that he was spoken of as General Crane. Incidentally, there was much dispute as to the exact battle which he had in mind in writing his book. As a matter of fact, he had seen nothing of war when he wrote, but in his reading his attention had been arrested by the bloody conflict of Chancellorsville, and it was this which formed the basis of the imaginary conflict in the book. Later, in Cuba, this young civilian shared in actual warfare and showed himself devoid of fear.

A change which represents a tale was made by Rudyard Kipling in one of his verses. In his noble poem, The Song of the English, he pictures the various colonial cities greeting the motherland. In the verse on Quebec he suggested her as looking down from supreme heights on corruption below, meaning political immorality in the United States. It is said that an American friend gently but firmly reminded the author that though New York political history might be discreditable, that of Quebec was likewise vulnerable. New York had Tweed, but it was shown that patriotic Canadians had no reason to be proud of certain similar experiences in the civic life of Quebec. Mr. Kipling saw the force of the argument, and when the poem appeared in The Seven Seas the verse was changed. The Venezuela message which was made public at about that time gave an opportunity for the substitution of a defiant note. But it must be added that in the English edition the original version remained.

In one way or another the author of to-day is apt to be concerned with very practical affairs. There are two local booksellers in Sayville, Long Island, a little town which is the home of Miss Louise Forssland, author of a recent novel. The booksellers were fired with local pride and entered into a keen rivalry to secure the first copies of the new book by their townswoman. For some reason only one received the books and the other was left lamenting, but not for long. He promptly betook himself to the author, explained the accidental delay, and persuaded her to write an explanation in her own hand, stating that he had sent an early order for the books, that the fault lay elsewhere, and that the books would be received and supplied shortly. This autographic explanation was posted conspicuously in the dealer's window and doubtless his reputation was vindicated.

Hall Caine's Next Novel

After various studies of the elemental passions, a novel of the new Christianity as it were, and another of the new democracy, Mr. Hall Caine, it is said, is to deal with the drink problem in his next novel, which will be due possibly in a year. He is described as peculiarly eloquent over the tyranny of alcohol, particularly in London, and those who have seen the crowded gin-shops of the metropolis and the drinking habits of the poor will realize that there is ample material. It is reasonably certain that the novelist will not confine himself to the slums, since the habits of the West End furnish texts, and possibly New York may be included. He once went slumming in New York with a newspaper reporter, but he found the situation mild as compared with London.

It is probable, indeed reasonably certain, that Mr. Caine would be recognized by more passers-by on the streets of New York than Mr. Howells or Mr. Aldrich. His striking appearance attracts attention and the caricaturists as well as the photographers have helped in his identification. The story is told that Mr. Caine boarded a street car in New York and presently became conscious of the intent regard of the conductor. After a little the conductor approached him: "Is this Mr. Hall Caine, the novelist?" and being reassured on this point he explained that he was a reader and admirer, and expressed the conventional desire to shake hands. Whether his emotion led him to overlook the prosaic ceremony of fare-taking the deponent has nothing to say.

Mr. Caine has returned to England, and presently he will be installed again in Greeba Castle, which with its terraces and broad stairways has a rather more effective appearance in photographs than in reality. It stands at the base of a broad hill. The zest of landed proprietorship grows upon the author, who is likely to become one of the largest landowners of the Isle of Man.

De Wet and Sargent

One of the stories which has recently come from London indicates that the reconstructed Boer will hold his own in the new South African order if native shrewdness counts. When the English publisher of General De Wet's book was planning its various features he hit upon the idea of a portrait by the most successful portrait painter of the day—John S. Sargent. Obviously it is not an easy matter to secure the services of a man so sought after as Mr. Sargent, but after more or less diplomacy the matter was arranged. Mr. Sargent presumably receives from $10,000 upwards for his regular portraits, and the publisher felt that he had embarked upon a large enterprise. The unconquered De Wet was informed of the arrangement. He failed to be impressed, but at the appointed time accompanied the publisher to the renowned painter's studio. Everything was in readiness. De Wet was asked to pose, but he showed a reluctance which was finally explained when he blurted out, "What am I to be paid for this?" The publisher's horror may be imagined. That any one should ask to be paid for having his portrait painted by Sargent was an impossible idea. Nevertheless, the sturdy warrior took the matter seriously and it is hinted that he won in this skirmish, as he usually did in the field, but affidavits are lacking.

The dangers of relationship to a genius are illustrated anew in the case of Mrs. Fleming. Her name means probably nothing to the average reader, and yet Mrs. Fleming is the author of an interesting novel which was published in this country as well as in England. In the latter country there has just been issued a volume of poems called Hand to Hand Verses by a Mother and Daughter. They are said to be good verses. This in itself means little, nor will it help the verses greatly when it is known that they are by the mother and sister of Rudyard Kipling. Mrs. Fleming, of course, is the sister. Her novel was received with a hardly veiled protest, as if there were an attempt to profit by his fame. As a matter of fact, the novel was quite able to stand alone, and this is true doubtless of the verses.

A German on German Ambitions

Apropos of the Venezuela complications, it is of interest to find in Wolf von Schierbrand's recent book on Germany one of the warning notes familiar to those who have heard the intimate conversations of our naval officers. The author asks, "Has Germany absolutely relinquished those old but never more than half-formed designs upon West Indian and South American territory? Does she consider herself bound, under all circumstances, to abide by that interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine which rests not so much upon the vigorous yet withal conservative enunciation recently made by President Roosevelt as upon that somewhat hazy yet tangible and more far-reaching idea of it held by the larger half of the American people?" On the literary side it may be said that the situation must have attracted the interested attention of Mr. Richard Harding Davis, who has found in South America so congenial a field for his romantic and adventurous heroes.

Holds Civil-Service Position

When I first heard of the International Correspondence Schools I was receiving but $30 per month as assistant in an electric-light plant. I was determined to succeed, and accordingly took up the Electrical Engineering Course in September, 1897. Since that time I have passed four civil-service examinations, and have had my salary raised five times. I am now holding a civil-service position at $100 per month—over three times the wages I received when I began my Course. It is with great pleasure that I fully indorse your methods of teaching. I can truthfully say that I owe my present success to your excellent system of instruction.

$2 000. in prizes

A simple contest with big prizes open to you

$2000 in prizes will be distributed in our "20 Mule Team Borax" contest, divided as follows: 1 prize of $500.00, 2 prizes of $100.00, 4 prizes of $50.00, 10 prizes of $25.00, 20 prizes of $10.00, 100 prizes of $5.00, 250 prizes of $1.00.

We have given each letter in alphabetical order, a numerical value, commencing with one and ending with twenty-six, as follows: A-1, B-2, C-3, D-4, E-5, F-6, G-7, H-8, I-9, J-10, K-11, L-12, M-13, N-14, O-15, P-16, Q-17, R-18, S-19, T-20, U-21, V-22, W-23, X-24, Y-25, Z-26. Persons entering the contest are to write out three reasons why Borax should be used in the Toilet and three reasons why it should be used in the Laundry. In no one of the reasons are more than thirty letters to be used. After the six reasons are written out, add up the numerical values of all the letters used. (Some letters will be used a number of times. Add the numerical value every time.) The person who submits the six reasons in which the sum of the numerical values of all the letters used totals highest will receive first prize, and so on down. In case of ties the prizes will be awarded on the merits of the reasons submitted (to be judged by a committee of three disinterested chemists).

When sending in your entry use one side of one sheet of paper. Write your name and address at the bottom of the sheet with your three reasons why BORAX should be used in the Laundry immediately above. Over them write your three reasons why BORAX should be used in the Toilet and at the top of the sheet in plain figures mark the sum of the numerical values of all the letters you have used in your six reasons. Each entry must be accompanied by the top of a 1-lb. package of "20 MULE TEAM BORAX," to be had of your druggist or grocer. Please do not write us for any further explanation. There is no catch. The contest is very clear and simple and the prize winners will get good returns for comparatively little effort. Below is shown the check which we have deposited with the National Bank of the Republic, Chicago, for division among the prize winners. We believe that it is worth trying for.

Borax Prize

The following letter from Edward Gudeman, Ph.D., the food and sanitary expert, will partially explain the value of BORAX.

Chicago, November 26, 1902.

Pacific Coast Borax Company, Chicago.

Gentlemen: Replying to your inquiry, I have the following report to make: Water is said to be "hard" when it contains lime and magnesium salts, which retard the saponification or lathering of soap and interfere with the cleaning action and the solubility of the soap itself. All natural waters contain a certain amount of this "hardness" which is eliminated by strong alkalies (soda, ammonia and other caustic materials) or by borax. The strong alkalies, used directly or as found in strong soaps, will destroy organic tissue and are very harmful in their effects. Borax is harmless and even healing in its effects. A mild or neutral soap used with water softened by borax will cleanse better than strong soap or washing compound (which is generally a mixture of soap and soda) used without borax.

For toilet and bathing purposes, I would recommend that only sufficient borax be used to counteract the hardness of the water so that the soap used will become soluble and be readily rinsed from the skin and out of the pores. For laundry purposes I would recommend that a larger proportion of borax be used with a mild soap, as the borax itself is an excellent and a harmless cleanser besides a water softener. I have examined Lake Michigan water for you and find that it is not so "hard" as the average natural water. It contains only 7 to 9 grains of lime and magnesium salts to the gallon. A quarter teaspoonful of borax will soften two quarts of Lake Michigan water, counteracting all the lime and magnesium salts therein contained. Harder water will require a proportionately larger amount of borax.

(Signed) EDWARD GUDEMAN,
Chemist and Chemical Engineer.

We recommend that you send a two-cent stamp for our booklet, "Borax — Come In," which will greatly aid you in preparing your reasons. All answers must be in our office by MARCH 5, 1903. If neither your druggist nor your grocer can supply you with a one-pound package of "20 MULE TEAM BORAX" send us their names with twenty cents in stamps to cover cost and postage and we will supply you direct. A Life Struggle futility of her efforts to escape the visions that haunted her vigils and her sleep. She declared that during the night she received orders which she had tried to resist, but which she obeyed, for she no longer had any hope of escaping from them by entering a convent. She assured me that she was now engaged in the fulfillment of the latest order which she had received, that she had just returned from Scotland where she had quitted the last refuge where she thought to recover her peace of soul, that she was bound to go to Eletot, and that she was equally constrained to beg me to accompany her thither.

The Final Attainment of Peace

"Do you remember," said she, "that when we went to see Cardinal Jacobini a man of imposing appearance entered? It was Ledochowski, and it is he who has done me the greatest harm which I have ever experienced in all my life. He appeared to me first as an archangel bound to cure all my wounds. I have seen him since and told him all my tortures, entreating him to confess me. My admiration for him appeared to irritate him, he refused to become my director, and one day when I insisted that he should protect me against myself, he rose up suddenly, extending his hand, and showed me the door, exclaiming:

"'Away, away, cursed woman, for when you cross my threshold you shake my soul with the terror of everlasting punishment!'

"I quitted him and since then have felt that I was abandoned of Heaven and destined to irremediable destruction."

We reached Eletot. Eletot is a little village not far from the sea, which a great plain behind the church separates from the waters of the Channel. To reach the plain you have to pass behind the church, a characteristic little Roman church of the sort to be seen along this coast. We abandoned the carriage at the entrance of the village. I had been there but rarely, and never stopped there, but Eloa seemed to know the place perfectly. She took the path which, behind the church, leads into the plain bordering the sea. She crossed the corn and wheat fields at the edge of the plain. For a few moments she gazed at the steeple of St. Pierre en Port that emerged on the right from the verdure of the hills. She shook her head, and turning, while she gazed upon the sea, her arms outstretched, exclaimed:

"Yes, I know where I am; this is the spot. It is here I am to find him of whom I am in search and who is in search of me. Ah, yes, it is here; I run to him."

Then, turning to me:

"Thank you, thank you," she exclaimed. "You have guided me to him, and he — he means rest."

Then, her arms outstretched, her figure, as it were, magnified by a superhuman effort, she dashed forward across the plain. The plain stops suddenly at the edge of a precipitous cliff high over the sea, and thus it is that this marvelous expanse of water has never been utilized and that the point where meet this plain and sea seems to be haunted by a spirit of solitude and aridity.

Eloa had dashed thither, running with extraordinary speed toward the eastern edge of the plain, where stakes and a wire fencing have been fixed to prevent accidents by a fall into the sea when with the rising tide the waters bathe the base of the cliff. Before I had recovered from my surprise Eloa was some six hundred feet ahead of me. So rapidly had she dashed forward that the breeze had detached one after another from her hat-brim the great black ostrich feathers, and as she bounded on, her arms outstretched, her skirts floated about her like wings, while the feathers of her hat, borne up by the wind, marked strangely the madness of her flight. I tried to overtake her. It was all in vain. I had not gained upon her half the distance when I saw that she had reached the edge of the cliff; then for a moment she stopped, looked all about her, flung upon the air a horrid cry of anger and despair, and as quick as a flash traversed the wire paling which protects the passers-by against a fall into the sea.

Out of breath I gained the spot. I gazed all about me. I passed beyond the circle delimited by the wire hedge. I scrutinized the waves that rose and fell gently under my feet. I beheld nothing, nothing, nothing. The surface of the sea wore its habitual aspect. Merely the ostrich feathers borne upon the wind flitted across the great expanse as if drawn outward and downward to the sea. Two men strolling along by the wire fence came up to me.

"You are looking for something?"

"Yes," I replied. "It seems to me that I beheld here on the edge of the cliff outside the wire hedge a person with outstretched arms. Have you seen anything?"

The two men looked at one another.

"We have seen nothing," they said, "yet we have been all the time near by."

And once again we three scrutinized the sea. The two men went their way. I lingered on for a long time still, wandering by the brink. I cried, I called; no voice came back to mine, no sign rewarded my search. And never since, in spite of my investigations, in spite of my despairing researches, never since, either dead or alive, have I been able to discover the slightest trace of her capable of explaining to me either the enigma of her life or the key to her death.

Editor's Note—This is the fourth paper in M. de Blowitz' Recollections.

A Dog's Gratitude

THE appointment of Dr. David Jayne Hill, Assistant Secretary of State, as Minister to Switzerland, calls to mind an incident of his university days which has never been made public before, and sheds an interesting light upon a trait in his character which but few of his friends appreciate. This is his love for animals, especially dogs. While Doctor Hill was President of the University of Rochester he owned a beautiful Irish setter of which he was exceedingly proud, and the two were seldom seen apart. Occasionally the dog would bring a friend to the house, and was never disappointed in the manner of its entertainment. One dark and stormy night late in November Doctor Hill was reading in the hall of his home when he was arrested by a sound of scratching against the storm-house door. Thinking that perhaps his Irish setter had been shut out in the rain and cold, he arose and threw open the portal. A drenched and sorry figure stood in the glare of the light. It was an aged dog, of the breed of the doctor's favorite, but worn and weak with hunger and exposure. It stood half crouching, and wagging its drooping tail with hesitating and doubtful motion. Touched by the helplessness of the animal, Doctor Hill called it in, made it lie down in front of the fire and then with his own hands gave it something to eat. The food was devoured ravenously, and after every scrap had been consumed the thankful old setter rubbed its scarred muzzle against its host's hand. Doctor Hill decided to keep it for a while, at least, and gave orders that it should be treated with kindness and consideration. But its stay was not destined to be long continued, for one day it fell sick, and lay in the kitchen by the fire, growing weaker hour by hour.

On a night Doctor Hill sat at the desk in his study deeply immersed in work when he was aroused by a faint scratching at the door, like that which had taken him to the storm house three nights before. He arose and opened the door. Tottering and swaying, the wasted tramp dragged its feet inside with an heroic but difficult wag. Doctor Hill went back to his desk and was soon buried in the depths of work. Thus he sat in the rim of light from his reading-lamp for an hour. Of a sudden he felt a pressure on his foot. Looking down, he saw the old dog lying at "charge," with his weary head resting on his friend's foot.

Something in the attitude struck the student, and he leaned forward and touched the quiet muzzle. Then he lifted it. It dropped back limp and inert. The old dog was dead.

"The tears sprang to my eyes," said Doctor Hill when he told the story afterward. "My heart was never more deeply touched. I thought I understood dog nature before, but after that I saw that I had but reached the threshold. Driven through the world with kicks and cuffs, worn and weary, the dying dog knew his end was approaching, and with the warmth of gratitude to me, who had taken compassion upon him, the faithful creature dragged himself to my side and breathed his life out in one last expression of his thanks."

The World's Best Music

If there is a piano in your home, you are constantly buying sheet music—and paying high prices for it. It lies in ragged piles around the house and becomes scattered and torn. You lose money by buying music in that way, to say nothing of your loss of time and temper when searching for a particular selection. Why not buy your music in volumes filled with the best selections, and thoroughly indexed? The "Library of the World's Best Music" is designed for your needs. Its eight volumes—sheet music size, but light and easy to handle—are crowded with the best vocal and instrumental music, carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors. If you were to buy the music it contains one piece at a time, it would cost you over $200.00. Through our Musical Library Club—for a limited time—the entire set will cost you one-tenth of that amount, and you can pay it in little payments of

$1.00 A MONTH

The sets are in eight large volumes, 9 x 12 inches in size, attractively bound in half-leather or cloth. By means of an ingenious device in binding, the volumes open flat at the piano and remain open. A set contains over 400 illustrations, including numerous chromatic art plates, printed in ten to twelve colors. There are 2,200 pages of sheet music in the entire library.

IF YOU ARE A PIANIST you will find this collection of music invaluable. It contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. Such composers are represented as Paderewski, Gounod, Sullivan, Mascagni, Wagner, Mozart, Balfe, and Liszt.

IF YOU LIKE MUSIC but do not play yourself, you cannot make a better present to your wife or daughter than a set of this musical Library. It means evening after evening of pleasure, for it furnishes in the most compact and simple form all the world's greatest music. This collection is to music what the encyclopædia is to knowledge—the best of all properly proportioned.

IF YOU ARE A SINGER the "World's Best Music" will increase your repertoire. It will place in your hands 300 of the best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets, arranged for all voices and for piano accompaniment. The collection embraces all the old songs of your childhood days, besides the new and popular melodies of the last few years.

IF YOU ARE A STUDENT of music, you will find this Library more than half a musical education. The selections have been made by Reginald De Koven, Victor Herbert, Helen Kendrick Johnson, Gerrit Smith and others equally well-known in the musical world. As a musical cyclopædia it is unexcelled, as it contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits.

Our Special Half-Price Offer

Our Musical Library Club has secured an entirely new edition of the "World's Best Music" at a price slightly above the cost of paper and printing. On this account we are able to offer these sets at about one-half the regular prices—payable $1 a month. Through the Musical Library Club—direct from the publisher to the customer—you can secure a set for $21.00 in cloth binding, and $25.00 for the half-leather. These sets were previously sold for $35.00 and $40.00. The edition is small, so, to avoid disappointment in failing to secure a set, cut off the coupon to-day, sign it, and mail it to us. We will then send you a set (express paid by us) for examination and use. After five days' examination, if you are not satisfied, return the books to us at our expense. But, if you decide to keep the set, send us $1.00 at the expiration of five days, and $1.00 a month thereafter until the full amount is paid.

BOOK-CASE FREE We have a small number of elegant oakwood book-cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a book-case free with your set, it will be necessary to send us your order before February 25th. If your order is received after that date, we cannot supply a book-case with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This book-case is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

SYSTEM is a 96-page monthly magazine.

Brim so full of bright ideas and clever systems that an official of the National Cash Register Company writes us as follows:—

"The ideas gathered from your magazine have enabled me to formulate systems for Mr. Patterson's letters, books, pamphlets, telegrams, bills, orders, addresses, etc., which have simplified this work greatly."

And the United States Fidelity & Guarantee Company say:—

"Since the first of the year, when we subscribed to your magazine, we have completely changed our methods of bookkeeping, and have been guided solely by the suggestions contained in SYSTEM. We find the work is more simple, and, better still, there is less chance of error."

And what a monthly reading of SYSTEM has done for them it will just so surely do for you.

The man of experience gets in SYSTEM the experience of other men. To the young man beginning business, to the clerk, bookkeeper or student, SYSTEM is more than a business college.

To enumerate SYSTEM'S contributors is simply to name the foremost system experts and the strongest business men.

The general articles they write will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

Systems actually used in large, successful factories, offices, stores, banks, publications, professions, are described in detail. And experts show how these same systems can be adapted to smaller businesses.

THE NEW MEMBER

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.
Committee to Elevate the Condition of Labor.
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I HAVE been elected to membership in the Tantalus Club, and a few nights ago I attended my first meeting of that body of congenial spirits. The Tantalus Club is an organization composed of Republican kindergartners—that is, men who are serving their first terms. It originated in the fertile brain of Sam Powers, one of the Boston members, who, coming here two years ago, soon learned that there was nothing for a kid member to do except sit around and listen while the old fellows were talking, and to vote as he was told. Powers, who is a successful lawyer, and did not relish the idea of being treated like a schoolboy and simply talking when the teacher allowed him, thought he might as well get some fun out of Washington life, and proposed to the new members that they found a dining club, where they could meet once a month and have a jolly good time.

The first dinner this session was given in honor of Mr. Cannon, of Illinois, General Henderson, and the other men who a few months ago for a week or so amused themselves with the belief that they were really in the Speakership race. Payne, of New York; Dalzell, of Pennsylvania; Littlefield, of Maine; Burton, of Ohio; and Babcock, of Wisconsin, were the other Speakership candidates who were invited, and who were not only toasted but were beautifully roasted from beginning to end.

The man who was put over the hottest coals and kept there longest was Charlie Littlefield, of Maine, the successor of Dingley, the famous tariff specialist, the "new man from Maine," as he is called here. Everything that was said was in good part but with a "tang" that made it bite, and I observed an undercurrent of feeling against Littlefield that rather surprised me. This was especially noticeable when Henderson got up to reply to his health, and for about ten minutes most delicately and scientifically flayed the Maine man. I sat next to Beidler, of Ohio, and asked him what it all meant. "The cheapest way for a man to gain notoriety is to differ with his party," was Beidler's terse reply. Then I understood. Later that evening, I got up alongside Gaines, of West Virginia. Gaines was the chairman of the special committee appointed by the club to report on the qualifications of the candidates for the Speakership, and who brought in a witty report that hit off the weaknesses of the various candidates. There were six members of this committee and each member made a mock speech advocating the claims of the candidate whom he placed in nomination, but in reality holding him up to good-natured ridicule. "When our committee got together," said Gaines, "to divide up the work, every man made a bid for Littlefield. They all wanted to take a crack at him."

All of which shows that it is a dangerous thing in Washington for a man to try to kick over the party traces. Littlefield came here three years ago to fill out the vacancy caused by Dingley's death. He is a born fighter, and one of the first things he did after taking his seat was to differ with his party on the Roberts case.

Roberts, you remember, was the Mormon Congressman elected from Utah. The House did not regard it as a good example for the rising generation to permit a Mormon to be a member of Congress, and it was determined not to allow him to take the oath. A special committee, of which Littlefield was a member, was appointed to investigate the matter. Inasmuch as Roberts was a Democrat and the House was Republican, it was known in advance that he stood no show, because it is the custom here to decide contests on their politics and not on their merits. When Littlefield was made a member of this committee he startled every one by announcing that his vote would be governed solely by the evidence and politics would not influence him in the slightest. As a result of his investigations Mr. Littlefield recommended that Roberts be seated and then expelled, but as it requires two-thirds of the House to expel a member and only a majority to refuse to permit him to take the oath, the Republicans, fearing they could not command the necessary two-thirds, decided to take no chances and declined to allow him to be sworn in. Some of the best lawyers in the House tell me that Littlefield was right and the other members of the committee were wrong, but the old stagers thought it was establishing a mighty bad precedent to countenance a man who had just entered the House in raising a fuss and disregarding the commands of the political leaders.

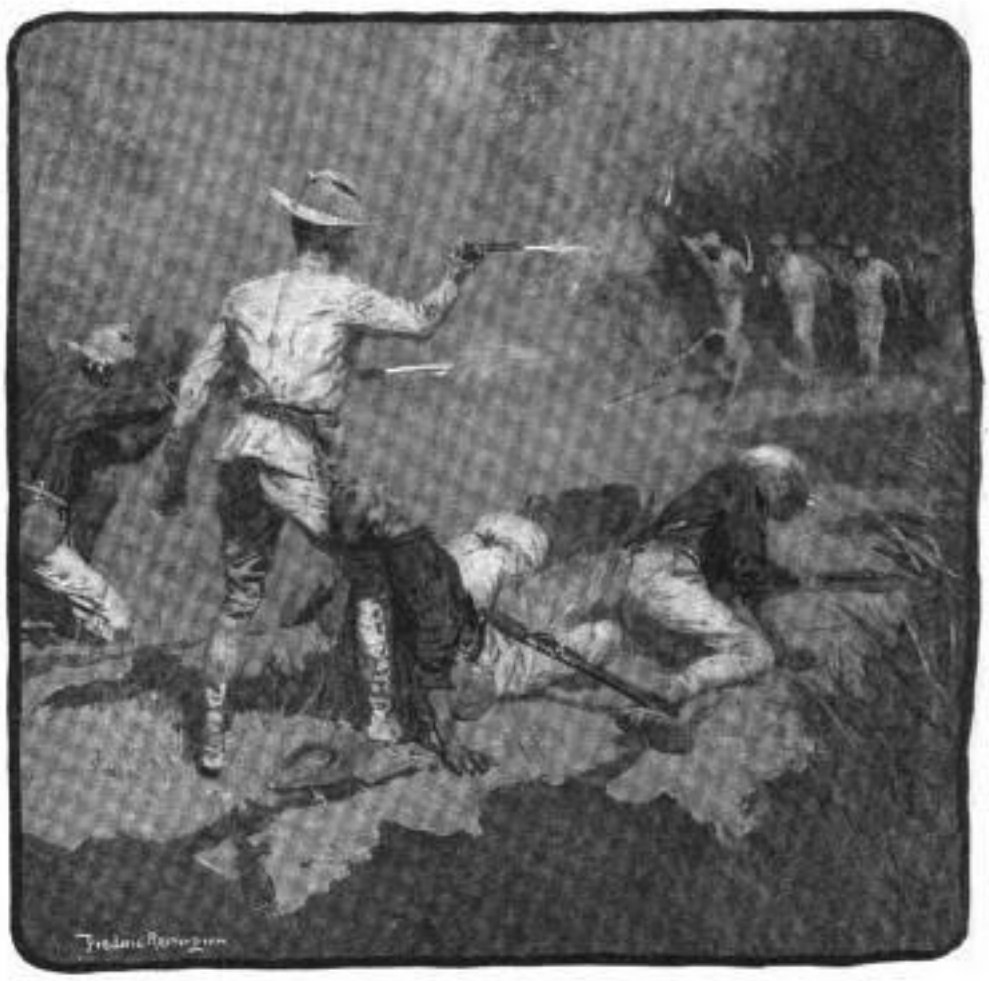
A little later he differed with his party on Porto Rico, claiming that Porto Rico was domestic territory and not subject to the tariff, and he carried his convictions to the extreme of voting with the Democrats against the bill. In the last session Mr. Littlefield was the leader of the opposition to Cuban reciprocity. He had nerve enough to fight the Administration from start to finish, and he made the fight with such ability that although the bill passed the House it was loaded down with an amendment that made it so odious to the Senate that it has never been acted upon. During the excitement of that debate, when the President was using all his influence to have the House pass the bill, a man made a remark one day at the White House about Littlefield, to which Mr. Roosevelt replied:

"Littlefield, Littlefield; why, he is an off ox, but apparently an off ox that must be considered."



That sums him up in a sentence. He is a good deal of an off ox and can prove very obstreperous at times, but he is honest and square, fights in manly fashion, has ability, makes a lucid, convincing speech, and pours out a stream of words at the rate of two hundred a minute. The members of the House may not like him, and some members both old and new may sneer at him because he has had the courage on more than one occasion to break from his party, but they realize that he is a man who will be heard from before he is many years older. He is only fifty-one, although he looks much younger, and is one of those rare men with an insatiable appetite for work and for acquiring knowledge.

Beveridge and Littlefield are much alike in at least one respect. They are both, it is easy enough to see, consumed with limitless ambition; but Beveridge succeeds where Littlefield fails; Beveridge is "mentioned" as a Presidential candidate and Littlefield is laughed at when he aspires to the Speakership.

We were talking about that in the committee-room yesterday and Bob Nevins, of Ohio, told a story. At one time the candidates for prosecuting attorney in his county were a young fellow just out of law school and a man with grown-up children. The young fellow was having everything his own way, telling stories and kissing the babies, and his rival's manager saw that his candidate was beaten unless he made himself more popular, and he suggested to him that he kiss a few babies the first time the opportunity presented itself. Shortly afterward he went to a Sunday-school celebration and with his manager's injunction in mind dutifully kissed all the small children, and then, having started in on his gay career, jocularly told the young women teachers that he was sorry he couldn't kiss them as well. That remark his opponent got hold of, told every one what a desperate flirt the old man was, and the good people of the county were so shocked that they snowed him under at the polls. "Which proves," said Nevins in conclusion, "that everything in this world is luck—just pure, sheer, unadulterated luck."

"Say rather opportunity," said the scholarly Hitt. "You remember what Goethe says: 'Opportunity makes relations as it makes thieves.'"

After listening to "Joe" Cannon I have some doubts as to whether Nevins and Hitt are not wrong. Cannon made the principal speech at our dinner. He is a typical middle-class American. Do not think I am sneering when I talk about a "middle-class" American, but we might just as well be sensible between ourselves and frankly confess that there are classes in this boasted land of the free and equal; classes and distinctions of society just the same as there are in other countries. There is a middle class exactly as there is an upper and a lower class, and some men, no matter what the accidents of position or place, always remain in the middle class and never get in the upper. Probably one is more impressed with that in Washington than anywhere else. Certainly I never realized it at home, but I am forced to say I cannot help realizing it since I have been in Washington. Cannon belongs to the middle class and is representative of that great, respectable, solid stratum of society which is the foundation of the Republic. He is an honest, useful, industrious man, who has made his place by sheer hard work, whose imagination will never be great enough to lead him into a path of peril, and who has, as the French say, all the defects of his qualities.

FRANKLIN H. HOUGH, Washington, D. C.

Cannon came to Washington twenty-eight years ago. He is now sixty-six, but he doesn't look his age by at least ten years. He is a small, spare man, with a reddish beard streaked with gray, which in the old days straggled about his face in a manner that showed he visited his barber only at occasional intervals when he happened to remember there was such a thing as a barber. Since the beginning of this session, and it has been settled that he is to be the next Speaker, he keeps his beard closely trimmed and has brought it to a point in the French fashion. That's the only change in his appearance that the prospective Speakership honors have made upon him, so older members tell me. He moves about with rather a mincing step and, as a man said the other day who met him at a White House dinner, all that Cannon required to suggest a French marquis was a rapier and a cocked hat.

Cannon began life as a struggling attorney in Southern Illinois. Richardson, of Tennessee, told me how he came to win his first office and his wife the same day. Joe was a modest Quaker lad who said "thee" and "thou" and dressed in sober Quaker garb during the day, but many a night after the old folks went to bed he put on a suit of store clothes that he kept carefully hidden from the eyes of his watchful parents, who were resolutely set against the vanities of this world, and hied himself to the little village of Danville to trip a very un-Quakerlike measure. Young Cannon danced so well that the village belles felt themselves honored when they received an invitation from him. At one of these dances he met Mary Reed, a handsome Ohio school-teacher who was visiting her brother.

Joe made a dead set for Mary, only to find that his fancy scrapings and his most artistic pigeonwings were unsuccessful in making the heart of that proud belle capitulate. Mary returned to Ohio at the end of her vacation, and Joe resolved that he would capture her some way or other. He studied law and the next time Mary came to Danville Joe was the rival candidate for justice of the peace against Mary's brother. Joe was now in a quandary. He wanted Mary worse than ever, but there was open war between him and her brother, and he was tactician enough to see, and thought he knew enough of a woman's heart to feel sure, that if he defeated her brother his chances for winning the girl were gone, as Mary was taking an active part in her brother's campaign; while, on the other hand, if he was defeated the girl would have no use for a man who was a failure.

So the campaign was waged furiously, but somehow or other Joe got it into his head that although Mary was backing her brother, secretly she wanted Joe to win, and for half the night he sat up and pondered over this momentous question: "If I win the brother won't let me have the girl, and if I lose she won't have me." After turning the problem over in his mind he finally said to himself: "Reed is mad at me anyway; I'll win the election and get the girl, so I'll be two ahead, and after I am married I'll get the brother, too, because he can't stay mad at his sister's husband." The thing worked out just as he anticipated. He was elected justice. He married Mary Reed and in a short time he and his brother-in-law were on the best of terms.

"Uncle Joe" told us that one day during his first term Senator Frye, of Maine, now the President pro tem. of the Senate, who at that time was a member of the House, came to him and said: "Cannon, I know what you are thinking about."

"If you are a mind reader," said Cannon, "go ahead and tell me what it is."

"You are thinking," Frye replied, "whether you will write out your resignation now or wait until to-morrow morning."

"You guessed right the very first time," was Cannon's answer, and then he went on to say that he had the same feeling about being in Congress that he imagines every other new member has. It all seemed like such an utter waste of time and as if it were impossible for a new man to make any headway. He looked around and he saw the older men, making the speeches and being on the committees and running the House, while the younger men had nothing to do and were never given an opportunity to say anything, and were having generally a rather hard time of it. But Cannon said he came to the conclusion that his time would come some time or other, and so he just stuck to it, and here he is to-day, after twenty-eight years, the next Speaker of the House. He advised us kids not to be disheartened, but simply to dig away and make up our minds some time or other to win the Speakership.

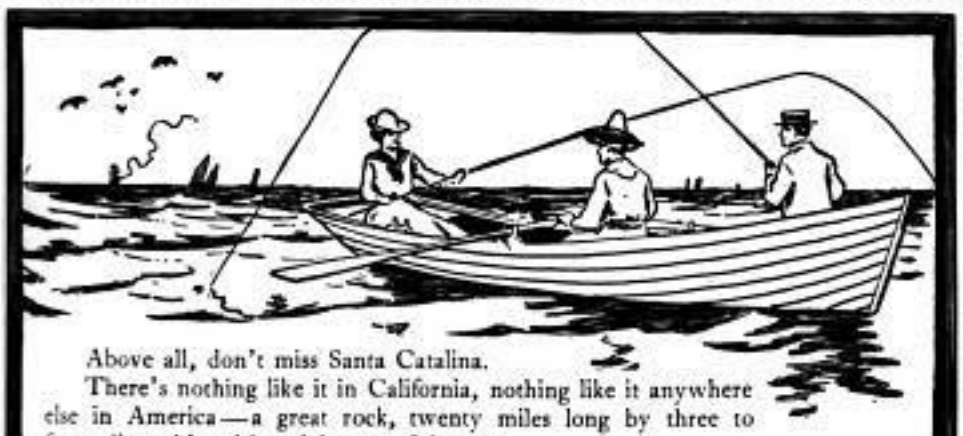
To be finished this year.

You would say that you had made 100 per cent.!

This is addressed to YOU. If you bought a lot from us a year ago for $500, on which, during the year, you had paid $80, and you saw that we were now selling all lots similar to yours at $625 each, you could fairly say that your cash investment was earning at least 100 per cent.

Now this was done with every one of the 4000 customers who bought $3,400,000 worth of our Brooklyn lots last year. It is not guesswork but is shown by our books and price list, and can be proven by every one of these customers. We are selling lots on these older properties at the advance above stated and no person, whether he be a large buyer or a small one, can get these lots at a cent less.

And take further notice, please. These lots are increasing even faster in value than they were when they were put on the market. You would have considered it fortunate to have secured this bargain, would you not? Well, we are giving you just one more equally good chance. Marlboro, which was put on the market the first of November, will be the last large property ever offered for sale in Brooklyn.



Hundreds of people have already bought and we are getting large numbers of letters every day. There are two reasons why you have not written to us before now. The first one is, "If your lots are what you represent them to be, why are they not snapped up by New Yorkers?" Second, "If they are what you say they are, why do you not keep them yourselves?"

If we could show you that the property was increasing in value as rapidly as we say it is, and that today we are selling as much property to New Yorkers and building as many houses for them as any 12 other New York firms combined, you would buy, would you not? Now, won't you give us the chance? It is all we ask. You have not written. You thought of doing so. Now do it today; tomorrow you may forget it. A postal-card, a penful of ink, a minute's time,—but the minute should be today, not tomorrow.

A great many know us and believe in us, and have intended to send us the first payment of $10. You may be one; if so enclose the $10 bill in a letter at our risk and we will make a better selection this week than we can next, upon the definite understanding that if you are not absolutely satisfied the $10 will be returned to you upon demand. But at any rate write us. That's all.

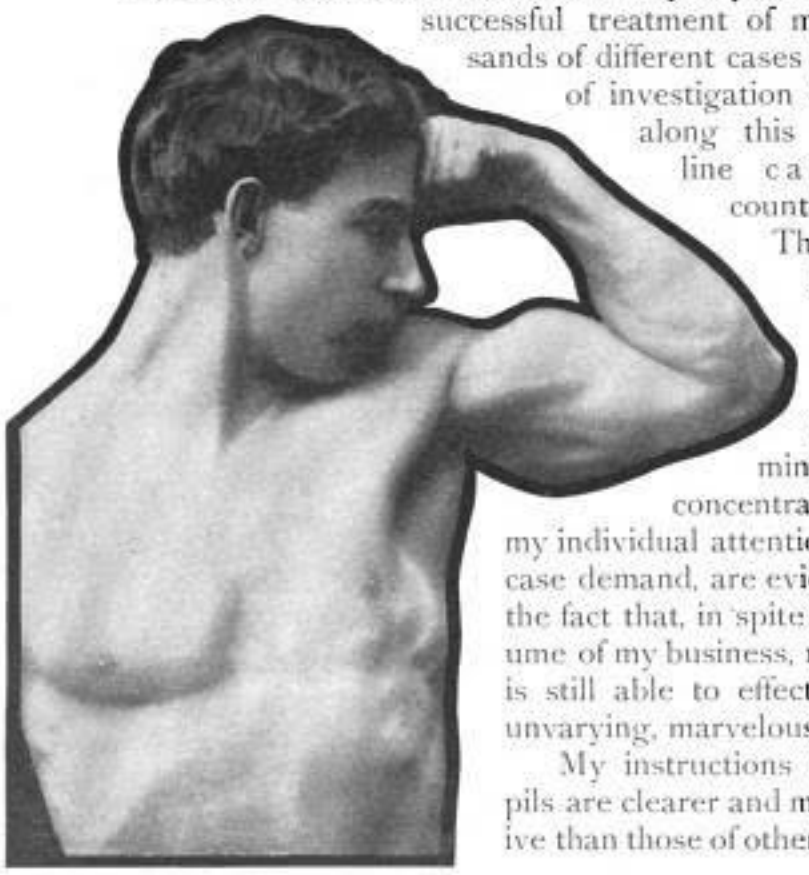
I Propose to More than Double My Fee

My system is built around Alois P. Swoboda. It depends upon me and my intimate knowledge of human ailments and their treatment.
There is a limit to my personal effort. I cannot give individual attention to more than a limited number of pupils.

I must either restrict the number of my pupils or neglect some of them.

I will not neglect a pupil—I certainly have no intention of reducing my income, hence the increase.



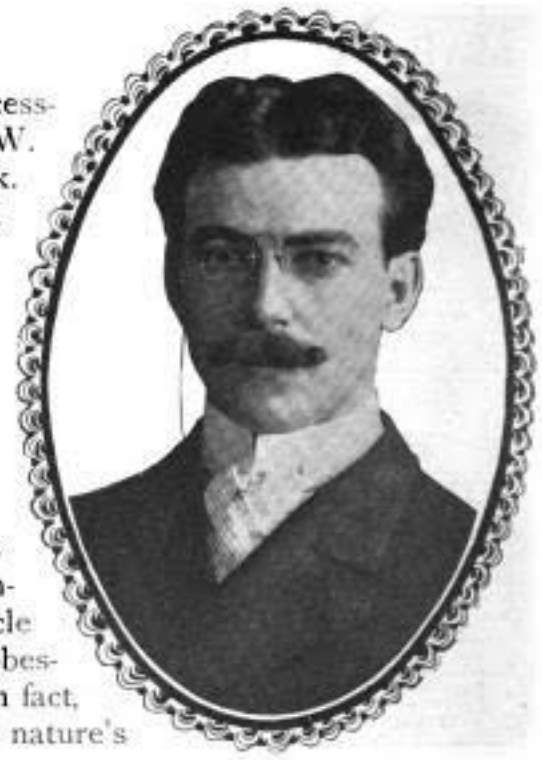
My system has always been worth more than twice the amount I have charged and many times as much as any other system.

Out of a spirit of fairness to those to whom I have already stated my fee, I make this public announcement so that they may either enroll themselves at once, or have no complaint at the future increase.

I cannot regard great swelling muscles, or the ability to snap chains and lift horses, or even a knowledge of the Marquis of Queensbury rules, as qualifying a man to keep in repair the most delicate of all organisms, the human system.

I am glad when a thinker begins to investigate the various systems for attaining physical excellence, for when a thinking man investigates, MY system is invariably selected. There is no other like it.

It is obviously impossible to imitate my instruction, not only because it differs according to the needs of each individual case, but also because my experience in the successful treatment of many thousands of different cases; my years of investigation and study along this particular line cannot be counterfeited.



The breadth and depth of this knowledge—the determination and concentration which my individual attention to each case demand, are evidenced by the fact that, in spite of the volume of my business, my system is still able to effect the same unvarying, marvelous results.

My instructions to my pupils are clearer and more effective than those of others because I speak from years of successful experience. I KNOW.

There is no guesswork.

Scientific physiological exercise is NOT a fad. Fads do not relieve hopeless cases of indigestion, dyspepsia, neurasthenia, insomnia and rheumatism, liver trouble and nervous diseases of every description, etc.

My system not only does this, but it rounds out the ungraceful form, puts muscle where it is needed, reduces obesity, purifies the blood and, in fact, fits man, woman or child to nature's perfect mold.

It is right living in condensed form. By it the evil effects of wrong living are neutralized and a splendid condition of robust mental and physical health assured.

This is done without distasteful dieting and without discomfort of any nature. It makes men strong, alert and graceful. It gives women beauty of figure and grace of carriage, with a clear skin, bright eyes and rosy cheeks.

My system is taught by mail only and with perfect success, requires no apparatus whatever and but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

There is no wasted effort, no wasted time, the instruction is entirely individual and will fit the exact requirements of YOUR CASE. I don't ask you to take my word for this; judge me by my works—they speak louder than words. Below is the unsolicited testimony of a man who knows through personal experience what the Swoboda system will do. This man is one of thousands. He has no earthly interest in me or my system beyond what it has done for him.

Here is a Letter Received from the Cashier of the German National Bank of Marietta, Ohio. It Tells an Interesting Story, Because It's True.

Alois P. Swoboda, Chicago, Ill. Marietta, Ohio, Feb. 21, 1902.

Dear Sir:—It gives me pleasure to be able to testify to the benefits I have derived from your system of physiological exercise.

Last winter I suffered all the time with neuralgia in back of head and neck. I began this winter with same trouble. After four weeks under your system, I was entirely free from neuralgia pains and have not had a return of them. I have not felt so well, or enjoyed such good spirits in years as I have in the past few months, and I give your system the entire credit. It is great. Yours very truly, (Signed) S. L. Angle.

If you want the names and addresses of others for personal investigation, I will gladly furnish them.

I shall be pleased to send you free valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, upon application. This information which I furnish free is very interesting and cannot be secured elsewhere at any price. Write at once.

The Boss of the United States

SENATOR NELSON W. ALDRICH

By David Graham Phillips

THE POWER BEHIND THE POWER BEHIND THE THRONE. THE MAN AND HIS METHODS

NELSON W. ALDRICH, senior Senator from Rhode Island, and father-in-law of the heir of the Rockefeller, is often called the most powerful man in our public life. But even those who assert it upon the clearest knowledge of the facts do not vividly believe it. How can mere force of reason, unaided by imagination, retain in the foreground a figure so shadowy, so unreal, so retiring, so visually innocuous? In spite of reason and knowledge, Mr. Aldrich is quickly permitted again to hide himself behind the speechmakers whose shouts fill the public ears and whose swellings fill the public eyes. He is forgotten—he makes few and unimpressive speeches, he proposes no important legislation, he gives few and meagre interviews, he seems to have no opinion but "the party's." As a public figure he is as diaphanous as a ghost. You no sooner recognize him for what he is than you think you were mistaken.

John J. Ingalls said of another Senator that compared to his stealthy tread the silence of a fox slipping to cover was as the clamor of hobnail boots on the loosest board in a rickety floor. But Mr. Ingalls would never have made so inadequate a comparison for Mr. Aldrich. To call him silent and stealthy would as ill describe him as to call him noisy and headlong. Silence and stealth look mysterious, excite suspicion. Mr. Aldrich does neither. He is no vanisher like the cat that made Alice so uncomfortable in Wonderland. He simply does not appear at all. He is not noted because he isn't there.

We often hear of a something called "the power behind the throne"—a thrilling, half-admired, half-dreaded figure. But we do not hear of the real power—the power behind "the power behind the throne." Mr. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, master of the United States Senate, which is master of the Federal statute book, is not the power behind the throne—the Senate is that. He is the power behind "the power behind the throne." That is, he is The Power. Others have influence; he has power.

You lean over the rail of the Senate gallery to look down at him. You search among the curly heads and white, the iron-gray heads and bald. Presently, with the aid of guide or diagram you find him; and the chances are that you say: "Why, there's nothing extraordinary about him. He's quiet and commonplace enough." But don't look away, convinced that rumor has exaggerated him. The superficial view of the extraordinary man, whether he be good or bad or the usual mixture of good and bad, is always disappointing, deceptive.

A Leader Without Horns or Halo

Senator Aldrich has a head, features, arms and legs, a trunk, clothes—all not unlike those of other men. He is unusually tall and slender and straight—but not amazingly handsome or startling in face or figure. He wears no halo, neither does he exhale a sulphurous odor. His presence does not act like a benediction, nor does it spread a blight. Possibly he may be sneezing or snuffling, or cackling over one of Doctor Depew's jokes. You say to yourself at once: "Plain human."

So continue to watch Mr. Aldrich. Your first impression grows stronger. Obviously he is a quiet, business person—the kind of man who might naturally start as did he, a retail grocer and a ward politician; the kind of man who would surely, as did he, rise slowly to prosperity and position. But never to eminence! True, there is a hawk look about the nose and eyes, a suggestion of great firmness under the shadow of that beautiful, graceful white mustache, a piercing quality in those bright brown eyes. But, a man of unrivaled power, the ruler of the Senate? Impossible. A handsome, cheerful, well-preserved man of sixty; a leader, under some of those with obviously superior brains. But not a ruler.

What Goes on Behind the Speaker's Desk

He rises to make a few remarks. The subject under discussion is one of those matters in which he is alleged to be intimately interested. One of his pet tariff schedules has been attacked and he has drawn his own sword to defend it. Your former impressions are almost unshakably confirmed as he talks. It is the talk of a plain business man, and not at all adroit. The arguments he advances in the effort to make the worse appear the better reason are almost schoolboyish. You cannot listen; your wandering eyes observe that his colleagues are not listening. They are talking, reading, writing, sleeping. Certainly the Senate would not dare treat its master thus. No, it is ridiculous to call this man the custodian of the statute books of the Republic.

Presently, as the opposition attack grows hotter, the leaders of the majority withdraw to one of the retiring-rooms behind the Speaker's desk. There go all the greatest great Senators of the party in power—Allison and Hale, Lodge and Beveridge and Spooner and the others whose names are known wherever newspapers are read. And Aldrich goes also. You cannot follow, but if you could and did you would still retain your first impression of Aldrich. Each of the leaders talks, Aldrich not more than the others, far less than some. What he says seems in the main to be assent to parts of what the other speakers are saying. After a while the "conference" breaks up. The policy has been settled.

Each man fancies there has been a real conference, fancies he has contributed something to the policy finally adopted. But it was not a conference; it was a gathering to receive orders. And Mr. Aldrich was the man who gave the orders. The policy as finally adopted is in every essential the policy he has worked out in his brain before the "conference" began. In every essential; in no unimportant detail.

How did he do it? In the way that nature taught him, in the way that he has been improving through forty years of experience in public life with men of the kinds most difficult to handle. He ordered by suggestion—the mode that spares human vanity, that enlists support where any other mode would have excited irritation and opposition, might have provoked revolt; the only possible mode for the easy and continuous and viselike control of such sensitive souls as Senators. Take a cue from Senator Aldrich, and whenever you have an order to give to a sensitive soul, give it in such a way that it seems to be an idea originating in the sensitive soul and not coming from you at all. True, he had the enormous advantages of being the only man present who knew what was essential and what non-essential. But this alone would not secure him such peaceful sway. For that, power must be coördinated with method.

The Aldrich method is not spectacular. It does not give the man of power the intoxicating vision of strong and weak cringing and crawling and trembling before him. But it "gets there"—and Mr. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, cares not a fig for the robes and titles and homage of authority; cares only to "get there." He could issue orders in true Napoleonic fashion if he wished. Usually they would be obeyed. But in just those cases where he most needs obedience he would not get it. Nor would he have risen to his present position of absolute power. Nor would he have his present prospect of indefinite tenure. What a vast advantage it is to him that while all Senators individually admit his despotism as to others, every Senator of high ability believes himself a sharer in, not a servant of, that despotism.

What is the source of Mr. Aldrich's power? What, whom does he represent?

The answer lies in the phrase—"The party."

Apparently, a clear-cut and easily understood phrase. In fact, vague and most misleading. In one sense "the party" means sundry millions of voters who habitually support certain candidates and platforms. But that is "the party" only in the sense that the feathers are the chicken. Again, in a sense "the party" means the "organization"—certain thousands of heelers and workers, of toilers in torch-light processions, of "rooters" at political meetings, of "hustlers" to get out the vote, of delegates to conventions, of candidates for any old thing within reach or just out of reach. In a third sense "the party" means the public leaders—the men who "fire opening guns" and "strike keynotes" and write platforms and introduce bills and make opening and closing speeches thereon. In a fourth sense "the party" means the permanent campaign committee or its leaders—consuming tons of stationery and great grosses of sheets of stamps, "frying the fat" out of corpulent partisans, getting some fat from patriots, more from those personally interested, most of all from those with that quaint, unanalyzable combination of patriotic with pocketbook or ambitious interest in "the party's" success.

The Heart of the Party

In a fifth sense "the party" means—a Mr. Aldrich. When we arrive there we are at the heart of the bird. Far, far within, well protected from view or reach, lies this really, truly "the party"—some one man who receives and pumps out the propelling force, the blood that quickens the whole corpus to the tip of the farthest feather. Search through any human institution, vast or small, and at the seat of its life you will find this personality-heart—not many personalities, not many men guarding an altared ideal, but just one personality, one man who is in his own person the essence of what that institution actually represents.

The essence of "the party" of which Mr. Aldrich is the actual ruler is the protective tariff system. And Mr. Aldrich, senior Senator from Rhode Island and chairman of the Senate's most powerful committee, Finance, is the protective tariff system personified.

In 1890 there went upon the statute books a law popularly known as the McKinley Tariff Act. But it should be called the Aldrich Tariff Act. In 1894 it was repealed and in its place was put the so-called Wilson Tariff Act. But it should be called the Aldrich Tariff Act. In 1897 it was repealed and what is known as the Dingley Act was substituted for it. But our present tariff law is not the Dingley Act, but an Aldrich Act again. When the Republican party was dominant, in 1890 and 1897, "the party" was triumphant. When the Democratic party was dominant, in 1894, still Mr. Aldrich's "the party" was triumphant, getting most of the essential things that he—that is, it—wanted and almost provoking President Cleveland to veto the so-called Wilson bill, Democratic measure though it purported to be.

A tariff bill, being a measure for taxation, must under the Constitution originate in the popular branch of Congress. But the power-loving, power-flaunting Senate rarely fails to "amend" the bills which come up from the House; and whenever the bill touches on "the party," to "amend" means that Mr. Aldrich practically cuts the animal off behind the ears and sticks on a new body—it starts out a horse, and at the finish it still looks a horse if you have eyes only for its face; but on side view it is seen to be more of an elephant. The Senate "amends" in committee—"the party's" measures of taxation in Finance Committee. And Mr. Aldrich is the Finance Committee. In the case of the Wilson or Democratic tariff bill the "amending" was done by the Senate in committee of the whole. The Democrats had a majority—nominally. But when it came to a tariff bill, for his own particular purposes Mr. Aldrich had a majority—"the party" is not constricted to or by political party lines. Yet Mr. Aldrich's name was hardly mentioned in the fierce wrangle between the Democratic factions.

Mazzini said of Italy that all its public questions of whatever kind analyzed into the religious question. And it may be said of this country that all its public questions analyze immediately or ultimately into some phase of the tariff question. The tariff itself is only the centre of a system. From it a system—"the party's" system—ramifies out and out in all directions, penetrates into every policy of the national administration, affects even State administrations, even the direction of the public affairs of county, city and town. Not only the tariff, but also the whole system and all its friends must be looked after—all men and all interests that in any way touch on the tariff. Thus there can hardly be a public act proposed which Mr. Aldrich must not scrutinize, must not edit or amend or kill in the open or emasculate in the interest of the system which he represents, in the interest of "the party" which he is.

The Secret of His Power

When he thinks that a bill, whether it be about the industrial or transportation combinations or about the civil service or about our Asiatic jewels, contains matters detrimental to "the party," that bill does not pass. Something that reads like it may pass; something that suggests it may pass; something that seems to accomplish the same purpose in another way may pass. But not that bill.

The secret of his power is that he alone possesses all the secrets of the system that is the essence of "the party." Some one must occupy that position. The some one must be a Senator—the system requires length of service and remoteness from the dangers of sudden currents of public anger. A Senator, therefore, and a Senator from some sure State, such as right little, tight little Rhody, full of tariff-benefited factories. And a Senator of the calm, cool, practical, unpretentious "get-there" type—an Aldrich and no other. If you wish to know why Mr. Aldrich was chosen, look over the list of Senators for the past fifteen years. You will find no other with all the essential qualifications. It was Mr. Aldrich by the process of natural selection.

Concentration is the watchword of the hour. For years Mr. Aldrich has been illustrating concentration in its most highly organized form. He took hold of the system when his party seemed about to abandon it by the circuitous route of the reciprocity treaty and the anti-trust law. He concentrated it into himself. He built it into the creed of his political party, made it the source of campaign contributions and of votes, carried it through the troublous times of Mr. Cleveland's second term, is now entrenching it against the renewed assaults of the reciprocity treaty and the anti-monopoly law. He has so spread abroad the reverence for it and the fear of it that a politician, goaded though he may be by an imperious outburst of public sentiment in his own locality, ventures the mildest protest against it with stammering tongue and quaking legs. And all this has Mr. Aldrich accomplished without attracting public attention sharply to himself. The openest and frankest of servants of the system, he is less noted than many of its secret agents. A writer of schedules the most profound and adroit—schedules that place an article on the free list in large type and load it with an enormous duty in small type—he is not credited with the authorship of a single tariff bill or tariff schedule. The very men whose hands he guided as they wrote are unconscious of him; would if they spoke their candid minds say at most, "I and Aldrich—but Aldrich had really nothing to do with it."

All who closely watch the Washington currents, see how invariably Aldrich gets his, "the party's," own or nearly all of it, how often he gains most when he has apparently lost all. And sometimes they wonder that his power is never conceded by any Senator where that Senator himself is concerned, though almost always conceded nowadays as to all the other Senators constituting the majority.

The explanation of this unimpaired vanity of uninfluenced personality is Mr. Aldrich's simplicity and directness and openness to counsel and eagerness for counsel. Each man in turn has his entire confidence—any Senator will tell you that Aldrich, so secretive with many, has often unbosomed his inmost soul to him: "He trusts other Senators now and then, but he leans on me." Each man in turn has his advice taken—"perhaps not in its original form, but after Aldrich had acted as my pacemaker to limber my mind out to its true gait." "Yes, Aldrich influences the other fellow. But me? Ha! Ha! Why, he takes my advice." And he does—in the interesting Aldrich fashion.

Mr. Aldrich is a very rich man. He was rich before he made the powerful alliance through the intermarriage of his family and that of the Rockefeller. He began life poor. He built himself from a retail grocer to a wholesale grocer, to a street-car magnate with all the street railways of Rhode Island under the control of his syndicate. It cannot be said of him that he loves money. Rather is he a lover of power—one of those secret, silent, passionate lovers of power who bar the doors, draw the blinds, retire to the cellar, to the coal bin, and there beneath the closed lid shut their eyes and venture to indulge in their ecstasies.

His Control of His Own State

He knows Rhode Island politics as a Tammany leader knows his district. It is a little State and he receives election returns from all parts of it by telephone at his house in Providence. It has less than 60,000 votes, about 425,000 inhabitants—there are six American cities with more. Eight Rhode Islands would just equal New York City in population; four would just equal Chicago; three would just equal Philadelphia. It has fewer inhabitants by 75,000 than Baltimore.

With the House practically extinguished, it is Mr. Roosevelt face to face with Mr. Aldrich. And, be it remembered, Presidents come and go, but the Senate goes on forever, and Mr. Aldrich could be dislodged from his seat only by a political cataclysm. Mr. Roosevelt can't succeed without the Senate, but the Senate can do very nicely, thank you, without the White House. As for Mr. Aldrich—"the party" lies secure, deep below party strife and all kinds of political commotion. He therefore comes nearer to being a permanent institution and a real ruler than any man this Republic has thus far had in its public life.

A Valentine Letter

By Thornton Sherburne Hardy

GOD, who gives all things at their worth,
Gave you the shape, the semblance—
Your face the glass wherein men see
The magic of their own devising,
Your soul a page whereon men write—
What they would have you,
What you'll never be.

Is it not strange
That you who have no memory
Should be the source
Of all men's memories who knew you;
That your easy loves—
Sincere, soon lost, soon sought again—
Should rest the type to all your lovers
Of what they never came to,
Yet secured eternally?
A thing to be approached and savored
In imaginings,
Caught at in sleep
And loosed in waking—
To be won never quite
And so to be lost never wholly.
And who will pay the cost
And where the profit goes
Is far too shrewd a reckoning for me;
I would not quarrel with the gift of God,
Or break the mirror
Questioning its riddle.
Who was your lover once
Will still be dreaming
In his last sleep
The vision of your seeming,
Which, prove it as he may,
He must believe in still.

So shall he yet, as I do now,
Write himself false—
Know himself true.

The Wrong Man

By William Mathews

A CURIOUS anecdote is told of an unlucky remark made by Bishop Burnet, of Queen Anne's time, who, though a learned and pious man, is said to have been a somewhat greedy gossip. Asking the Duke of Marlborough one day to introduce him to the Prince Eugene, he was told that the Duke would do so on one condition—viz., that of his speaking only when the Prince should address him. This was agreed to, and the Prince, on the Bishop being presented, asked him if he had ever been in Paris. "Yes," was the reply; "the first time I was there was when the Countess of Soissons was apprehended for having suborned a villain to administer poison." The Prince turned instantly away with horror. The Countess of Soissons was his own mother!

There are persons in every community who in the social circle have an astonishing talent for saying and doing the wrong thing. One of these unfortunate gentlemen, at a reception in London, once said to Lord North: "Who is that uncommonly ugly lady opposite to you?" "That uncommonly ugly lady, sir, is my wife." "No, my lord," said the querist, "I mean the one at her right." "That, sir, is my daughter."

It is well known that Alexander Pope was greedy of praise, and resorted to the most contemptible tricks and artifices to win it. On one occasion, angling for a compliment, he asked his friend Mallet what new things there were in literature. "Nothing worth notice," was the reply; "only a thing called an Essay on Man, made up of shocking poetry and insufferable philosophy." "I wrote it!" cried the poet, stung with rage; and his friend blushed, bowed and darted out of the room, never to return.

It is said that during the late Civil War Wendell Phillips was spending a day or two at a hotel in Springfield, Massachusetts, when a "copperhead" guest entered into a conversation with him, not knowing who he was. After violently anathematizing all abolitionists, and especially Mr. Phillips, the gentleman added: "And, by the way, I see that Wendell Phillips' name is on the hotel register." "Yes," said the latter with an air of utter unconcern; "I wrote it there."

One of the most eminent Baptist preachers of England a century ago was Dr. Andrew Fuller, author of "The Gospel its Own Witness" and other noted works which won for him the title of "The Franklin of Theology." Great as was his fame, there was a time in his life when he was deemed heretical—an Armenian—by his Calvinistic brethren of London. While he was visiting that city a friend and admirer, who knew that his views were misunderstood, arranged with the leaders of a Baptist association which was in session there that Mr. Fuller, who was a stranger to its members, should preach to them without his name being announced. After some objections to the arrangement the preacher was persuaded, on assurances of the good that would result, to consent to it, and on the day appointed delivered one of his most powerful and effective discourses, in which his supposed heretical views were frankly set forth. All his hearers were delighted with the sermon, and as he came down from the pulpit many hurried forward to express to him their admiration of it. Among these, one clergyman, as he grasped the preacher by the hand, exclaimed with great earnestness: "Oh, how I wish Andrew Fuller could have heard you to-day. Sir, you have demolished his doctrine, and cut him up, root and branch!"

Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the poet, critic and speculative philosopher, once told the following diverting story of himself and "many-toned Pinkerton," the Scottish historian and antiquary, who died in Paris in 1826: "When my Lyrical Ballads first came out it was anonymously, and they made a good deal of noise. A few days after their publication I dined at Mrs. Barbauld's, and sat beside Mr. Pinkerton. We talked a good deal together, and I found him very amusing and full of general information. When we retired to the drawing-room he led me to a recess, having taken up a copy of the Lyrical Ballads, which lay on the table. 'Pray, sir,' said he, 'have you read this thing?' 'I have looked into it.' 'Do you know the author?' asked he. 'Do you know the author?' echoed I, resolved not to be caught. 'No,' said Pinkerton; 'but I never have read such trash as his book, particularly an extravagant farrago of absurdity called The Ancient Mariner. Don't you think it insufferable?' Coleridge: 'Intolerable!' Pinkerton: 'Detestable!' Coleridge: 'Abominable!' Pinkerton: 'Odious!' Coleridge: 'Loathsome!' Pinkerton: 'Sir, you delight me. It is really delightful to meet a man of sound sense in these days of our declining literature. If I have a passion on earth, it is an abhorrence of these Lyrical Ballads of which every one is talking, but most especially of this Ancient Mariner.' Coleridge: 'Hush! Not a word more! Here comes our hostess! I know she is acquainted with the author, and might be hurt.' Pinkerton (pulling Coleridge by the button, taking a huge pinch of snuff, and speaking in a whisper): 'I'll tell you what, sir, we mustn't let this matter drop. Let's fix a day for dining together at the Turk's Head. We'll have a private room, a beefsteak, a bottle of old port, pens, ink and a quire of foolscap. We'll lay our heads together and review this thing; and if we don't give it such a slashing, such a tearing, such a ——' 'If we don't!' said Coleridge. 'Is it a bargain?' 'Most certainly.' 'Done!' 'Done!'"

THREE IN A GAME

By Morley Roberts

IN WHICH SHANGHAI SMITH OF THE BARBARY COAST TAKES A HAND AT MATCHMAKING

THINGS were quiet in San Francisco—that is to say, though there was the usual spouting on the Sand-lot on Sundays, there was no great political row on just then. The President had still three years to run before any chance of a second term, and local politics had quieted down. The Governor of the State, though an angel to one side and a devil to the other, had been "let up on" at last. So it was a blessing to them without any disguise when the rivalry between young Jack Hunt and Sibley Gawthrop for the hand and the money and the affections of Edith Atherton became public property. It was most of all a blessing to Gardiner, the smartest new man on the San Francisco Era, who knew both of the boys well.

For how could any "story" fail to pay dividends when two of the swagger "Anglo-Franco-Californians," the most beautiful girl on the Coast, and Shanghai Smith, the most scoundrelly boarding-house keeper on the Pacific, played leading parts in the drama? And when one reflects that San Francisco, the Pacific itself and the Atlantic, and the Sailors' Home in Wall Street, London, came into the newspaper play quite naturally, it seems obvious there was meat for any reporter's teeth.

Gardiner, of course, was not in the high-toned gang to which Hunt and Gawthrop belonged, but he knew them both very well. Although he had only been in California a short year he knew every one in San Francisco, from the biggest toughs in Telegraph Hill and the political bosses to the big pots and some of their womenkind. He knew Miss Atherton, too. He wanted to know her better. Though he was on the staff of the Era it was his own fault. If he could have only got on with his father in New York he might have been as rich as Hunt himself. But the boy who cannot differ on vital points with his father before he is sixteen is no true American, and Gardiner was U. S. to his finger-tips.

"I'll get there yet," said Gardiner. His chance was coming.

"How is it that you bow to a reporter on the Era, my dear?" asked a friend of Edith Atherton. "I understand that is what he is."

"I do it because he might have been my brother," said Edith Atherton.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that his father nearly married my mother," said Edith, "but he was too autocratic and he married an Englishwoman. I don't wonder George Gardiner could not hit it off with him. Poor boy, I wish he could!"

Certainly he was far finer looking than either Hunt or Gawthrop. That is the way her friend interpreted the girl's sigh.

"And he's cleverer, too," said the elder woman acutely; "nevertheless——"

And "nevertheless" was very easy to interpret. "Which will it be, I wonder?" said her friend.

The solution lay on the knees of the gods and in the hands of Shanghai Smith.

That night Hunt met Gardiner at the club.

"What are you looking so down about?" asked the newspaper man. "You are drinking too much. Ease up on it."

Indeed Hunt was drinking too much. He drank enough to loosen his tongue.

"Confound that Gawthrop," he said.

"Ah, I see," cried Gardiner; "is that it?"

And Hunt nodded sulkily.

"If he was only out of the way," he moaned, "I believe I could work the racket with her."

Gardiner shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, well, buck up. Come on, I'm going to the office."

They walked into Kearney Street and turned east toward the Era offices. As they passed Bush Street a very hard-looking citizen nodded to Gardiner.

"Who's that?" asked Hunt.

"Don't you know him? That's 'Shanghai' Smith, the biggest scoundrel unhung. He's a sailor's crimp and daylight robber, and a man with a 'pull.'"

Certainly Smith had some political power.

"And why do they call him 'Shanghai'?" asked Hunt.

"Because he 'shanghais' men," answered Gardiner, "and nowadays that means drugging a man and putting him aboard some ship. Oh, he's a daisy. He'd ship your dad to New York around the Horn if there was money in it. When a man disappears in this city we look first in the Morgue and then make inquiries at Smith's."

"I wish Gawthrop was in the Morgue, I do," said Hunt, "and here I'll say good-night. You're a good chap, Gardiner, if you are a newspaper man, and it's a relief to talk to you."

They shook hands and parted, but Gardiner had not walked ten yards before he turned and came back. His eyes glittered curiously. Hunt's were blurred and fishy. He had certainly taken a little too much. Gardiner wondered if he had taken too much to remember in the morning what happened now.

"You wish he was in the Morgue, eh?"

"I do," said Hunt firmly; "I do."

"Why not get him shanghaied?" asked Gardiner. And he walked away very swiftly and did not return when Hunt called to him.

"By the Great Horn Spoon and the tail of the Sacred Bull, I'll not give her up," said Gardiner; "certainly not to a man like Hunt or Gawthrop. Sooner than that I'll write to the old man and squeal. He'll rub it in, but after all he's the dad and she's——"

Ah, she was everything!

"Let the best man win. I'm in the game, after all," said Gardiner, "yet if she hadn't recognized me to-day I'd have thrown it up!"

He was not surprised to see Hunt the next afternoon, though every one else in the office was astonished to find him looking for a mere reporter.

"Do you remember what you said to me last night?" asked Hunt rather nervously.

"About what?"

"About somebody called Shanghai Smith?"

He stared out of the window as he spoke.

"I remember, Hunt."

"Can it be done?"

"Can what be done?"

"Could I get rid of that Gawthrop for a month or two?"

"I shouldn't be surprised if you put up the dollars."

"Will you help me?"

"And get myself—disliked?"

He was going to say "get myself in the penitentiary," but on reflection he did not desire to frighten Hunt. After all, the affair would call so much laughter that legal proceedings were not likely to rise out of it.

"I don't want you to show. Only give me a pointer. Could you bring this Smith to me?"

Gardiner stabbed his desk with a penknife and considered the matter for a moment.

"Look here," he said, "I want to deal as squarely as I can with you. I don't want either you or Gawthrop to marry this particular lady."

Hunt stared at him.

"You don't—oh, I say, Gardiner——"

And he burst into laughter, which Gardiner apparently did not resent.

"Yep, I know I'm a newspaper dog and so on. Let that be. If I choose to crawl down and go East I could stack dollar for dollar with half of you in time. What I'm telling you is this. I think Gawthrop has more show than you and I'd be glad to get him out of the way, just as he'd be glad, no doubt, to get you out. I'll help if you'll hold your tongue about me, whatever happens."

"Very well," said Hunt, "I give you my word."

"Whatever happens?"

"Whatever happens."

"Of course I shall do everything I can to win."

"That's only natural," said Hunt. "But I'll bet you a thousand dollars that if I get Gawthrop out of the way I'll marry Miss Atherton inside of three months."

"Whatever happens?"

"Whatever happens."

"Then I take that bet," said Gardiner. "And to-morrow you shall meet Shanghai."

But when Hunt had gone Gardiner winked steadily at nothing and stroked his chin.

"Great Scott, this is a game," he said. "I wonder where Gawthrop is?"

But before he found out he sat down and wrote a letter to the elder Gardiner in New York. It was late that evening before he went down to that undesirable quarter of San Francisco known as the Barbary Coast, where Shanghai Smith kept his sailor-robbing den.

As he went along the water-front and saw the ships lying at the wharves it was "plumb" dark. Though he knew every tough in the city he walked some way from the edge of the wharves and kept his hand on his six-shooter in the right-hand pocket of his coat. There is never any knowing what may happen in the low quarters where all the scum of the world gathers, and it is well to keep one's eyes skinned lest worse may befall. Gardiner had no desire to turn up on a trestle at the Morgue at his next public appearance. But though he was careful he went cheerfully, and could not help laughing.

"To think of Sibley Gawthrop as an Able Seaman on board the Harvester or the Wanderer! But won't it do him good! These young Californians are a rotten crowd!"

He came at last to Smith's house and stepped upon the veranda floor boldly.

"Why, it's Mr. Gardiner of the Era, so it is," said Billy, who was Smith's runner and, next to his boss and a few politicians, the hardest case in California. "Is it Mr. Smith you want to see, sir?"

"I'm only just doing a walk-around, and thought I'd look in, Billy," said Gardiner carelessly.

"Ay, just a cultus nannitch, as they say in Chinook," replied Billy. "But we're always glad to see you."

Gardiner doubted that. But Smith was always civil to newspaper men. He hadn't bought Gardiner as he had the police, and he knew that a true column and a bit on his doings might bring down an avalanche any day.

"And here is Mr. Smith," said Billy.

"How are you makin' it?" asked Smith, "and what'll you drink?"

But Gardiner was not drinking. It was so notoriously unhealthy to drink at Shanghai's place that few sober men were reckless enough to take a cocktail there.

"How are you off for men?" asked Gardiner. "Is business good?"

Smith shook his head.

"Men, there are too many of 'em! Now hell ain't fuller of devils, Mr. Gardiner, than what San Francisco is of sailors, and you know as well as me that with sailormen a drug in the market I don't come out on top."

"To be sure," said Gardiner, "but I was thinking, as I came along, that you might get a ship for a young friend of mine."

"I'll be glad to do anythin' for any friend of yours," said Smith, "but, as I'm tellin' you, 'tis as easy to be President of the United States as to do business with the streets full of men that lets on to be sailors. What kind of a job is your friend lookin' for?"

Gardiner laughed.

"I want him to go a voyage before the mast. It will do him good."

"Ah," said Smith quickly, "what's the game? But whatever it is, with you I'm on! Say it and mean it, that's me!"

Gardiner edged him up to the quiet end of the veranda.

"Smith, can you hold your tongue and earn a thousand dollars?"

"Can I do what?" asked Smith. "Look here, so help me, I'd cut my tongue out for a thousand. I tell you things are tough. What's the game?"

And Gardiner, after looking round, whispered in his ear.

"Whew!" whistled Smith, "you don't mean it. Young Sibley Gawthrop! Holy Sailor, I'd rather not touch him. His father is a power in the land."

Gardiner shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, very well, there are others. And in any case who need know you took a hand in it? Now will you or won't you? Yes or no, or I quit right here."

"You don't quit. I'll do it," said Smith. "I'll do it for you, C. O. D."

It can be judged how much he did it for Gardiner when C. O. D. is translated "Cash on Delivery."

"Right," said Gardiner, "and pick him a nice easy ship. A good old English limejuicer will be the thing. I want him to go to Europe."

He went up town and curiously enough found himself having supper in the swagger restaurant of the city at the next table to Hunt's victim.

"Gawthrop, I want to have a talk with you on very special business," he said; "can you spare me half an hour to-morrow morning if I call on you?"

And when they parted next morning, after their talk on "very special business," Sibley Gawthrop was in a high state of excitement.

"If I can only get that Hunt out of the way for three months I believe I can work the racket with her. But what I can't understand is Gardiner's notion that he has any chance. I suppose that's what he meant by keeping on saying, 'Don't think I do this for you. I'm not in it for friendship or for my health; I'll do you if I can.' Poor beggar, he hasn't the least show. Oh, but isn't this a game! To think of old Hunt turning up in the London Docks!"

He actually drove along the water-front that morning in order to gloat over the ships in the harbor, and when he saw men working up aloft he burst into laughter. The notion was splendid, whatever motive Gardiner had in putting him up to it. It was odd that he had never taken any interest in the seafaring trade of the city before. Gawthrop eyed the very loafers on the wharves with new feelings. Though he did not know it, he saw Shanghai Smith and his runner, Billy, at the bottom of Spear Street.

"Jehoshaphat," said Smith, "now this is a queer coincidence. Billy, that's the young feller I've been telling you about. See him!"

"Rather," growled Bill; "when do you want him shipped, and how am I to get him?"

"I'll tell you when it's fixed up," said Smith; "I've got to see the chap that's runnin' the show."

"There'll be a holy row on about it," growled Bill. "It ain't exackly legitimate business, Mr. Smith. It's all mighty well doin' what I know. I can get a crew out of a ship in the Bay with any man. But shanghaiin' sons of millionaires——"

"You're a forsaken fool," said Smith. "If you do it neatly who's to know till he comes back? And who knows then you or I done it? And ain't I reckonin' to allow you a bonus of ten dollars extra? With times as they is now and blood-money low, ten dollars is ten dollars, lemme tell you. And you've taken to growlin' lately in a way I'm not goin' to stand, Bill. I don't want any slack-jaw from you, so there."

"Who's givin' any slack-jaw?" expostulated the runner. "I suppose a man can hev an opinion?"

"And he can keep it till called for, too," said his boss. "I can lick you any time."

And Bill growled, "Who says you can't? Would I be workin' for you if you couldn't?" The inference was not exactly obvious.

That afternoon Gardiner came down again to the Barbary Coast and had another talk with Shanghai Smith.

"What, another of 'em?" asked Shanghai. "I say, Mr. Gardiner, this is a bit thick!"

"Yep, it's two thousand dollars thick," said Gardiner. "If you could only ship a whole crew on such terms you might retire and go in for politics."

"And who's the man this time?"

"It's Jack Hunt."

"Him as is payin' for Gawthrop?"

Gardiner nodded.

"And who's payin' for Hunt?"

Gardiner took him by the greasy lapel of his coat.

"I'll tell you—it's Gawthrop."

II

WHEN Gawthrop left the theatre some nights later he went straight down Market Street to the water-front and found his way to Shanghai Smith's without any difficulty. He had plenty of pluck and plenty of ignorance of the real conditions of life in San Francisco. What he heard and what he read about the matter did not touch him; he lived in security, in quite another world from the scoundrels at the bottom of Clay Street and the toughs of the "Coast." Life there was a theatrical representation. He sat in the stalls and said, "Poor devils, do they really live that way?" He was Sibley Gawthrop, the son of a big man: he was a power himself: he had no fear and went into the trap smiling. If he carried in his hip-pocket what Westerners call a "gun" it was on account of Western traditions. He showed no caution, though he walked whistling in the middle of the road. He had no chance to use any weapon and he never saw Smith. He never even saw Billy, Smith's runner, till Billy sandbagged him on the back of the head. For Smith was not to be found at his house. He was with Gardiner and they were both waiting till they heard from the runner that Gawthrop was safely disposed of.

"I ain't goin' to show in it," said Smith, "and why should I? The Hampshire is short of two hands as I shipped on her myself. They don't go aboard when they should, and they turns up drunk at my house—and Billy puts them on board. Can I help it if he puts the wrong ones on her? Of course I can't. And if Billy finds the cash agreed on in 'em and hands it to me, why I'll keep it till it's claimed by the owners of it!"

He winked his eye at Gardiner and the journalist burst into laughter.

"They'll not touch me," he said; "and if they do I shall either have the laugh on them or sha'n't care."

As he spoke there was a message sent up from the street. A boy wanted to see Mr. Gardiner.

"From the office, of course," said Gardiner. But he knew the word came from Billy.

"Billy, Mr. Smith's runner, gimme a quarter to run up to you, sir, and say it's all right," said the young boodlum, "and he said you was to gimme another quarter."

Billy had said nothing of the kind, but the boy got it all the same.

And half an hour later Jack Hunt interviewed Billy the runner in about the same place in the dark road that Gawthrop had met him. The runner went through his pockets eagerly.

"Two thousand in the one night!" said Billy. "Oh, ain't Smith doin' well? And two first-class guns as belongs to me. I'll shove these boys on the Hampshire bright and early. Oh, I done it clean and neat."

He had great professional pride, and when he came alongside the Hampshire at four o'clock in the morning and found all hands getting up the anchor he felt that the thing was going to finish itself without a hitch.

"Once at sea and the job's complete. Hallo there, send down a whip into the boat," he cried; "I've got them two as skipped. And good men, too, when they're sober."

He heard the first mate bellow:

"Mr. Jones, get these swine on board quick. Drunk, are they? We'll sober 'em. Up aloft and loosen the topsails!"

And the two lights of San Francisco society were carried into the foc'sle.

They dropped Hunt and Gawthrop into two empty bunks and went on deck.

"Can't you turn these men to?" asked the chief mate, Mr. Ladd, of Jones. And Jones went for'ard and punched both of these gentlemen in the ribs.

"Wake up, you drunken galoots," said Jones. In answer they both sighed and snored, and turned peaceably to rest. Jones, who knew a bit, unhooked the lamp from the sweating beam overhead and lifting Hunt's eyelid with his thumb saw the man's pupil was down to a pin-point. It was the same with Gawthrop.

"Hocussed, of course," he said, and he reported aft that not even putting them under the hose would wake them for some hours.

"Confound all California and its manners and customs," said Ladd. But the manners and customs of Shanghai Smith at any rate saved Hunt and Gawthrop from eight hours of the finest education in the world. It was noon and the Hampshire's crowd was at dinner when Gawthrop showed signs of animation.

"Ah, humph," said Gawthrop, and without opening his eyes he reached out and pressed the head of a small bolt with his thumb.

"What's the josser doin' of?" asked Tom the Cockney.

"Johnson, give me some tea," said Gawthrop. He believed that his man had answered the electric bell. But there was a Johnson, or more properly a Johanssen, among the crew.

"Here, Dutchy, give him some tea."

Gawthrop opened his eyes and yawned. He shut his eyes again but did not shut his mouth in time to prevent Bill Jarley, who was the joker of the crowd, dropping a piece of soaked biscuit into it. Gawthrop spluttered, coughed violently, and sat up. As he did so he of course hit his head a smart crack on the deck above him. He raised himself again on his elbow and stared about him stupidly.

"'Ere, come out, matey, and 'ave yer grub," cried the kindly crew with one voice.

"You've 'ad a rare good caulk," said Tom encouragingly.

"Eh, eh, what?" asked Gawthrop. He blinked at the men and with a fallen jaw wagged his head from side to side.

"Where am I?" he asked.

"On board the 'Ampshire, sonny," said Tom. "Come, show a leg!"

"Humph," said Gawthrop, and he rolled a dry tongue against his teeth. "Am I asleep?"

"I'll lay odds you won't be in ten minutes," said Tom. "What's the game you're playin'?"

Gawthrop stared at him and rolled his eyes round the foc'sle. He saw fifteen grinning faces in the light from the scuttle above. Outside the open foc'sle door he beheld the foremast with its rail and the gear coiled on the pins.

"It's a ship," said Gawthrop. "It's obviously a ship!"

The men looked at each other.

"D'ye think he's a greenhorn?"

"Hocussed!"

"Shanghaied!"

The word shanghai fetched Gawthrop clean out of his dreams. It hit him fair and square, and though it half-stunned him it woke him all the same.

"Where am I?"

"On the Hampshire, at sea," said all hands eagerly. They saw what had happened quicker than he did. For reasons which he did not yet understand they believed him a seaman, but they saw he had been shipped against his will.

"D'ye think it was Shanghai Smith as done it?"

"Ah," said Gawthrop; "why, where's Hunt?"

"D'ye mean your mate as come aboard wiv you?" asked Tom. "There 'e is, 'ard and fast asleep. Wake 'im up, chaps; I say, 'ere's a game!"

Gawthrop put a leg out and dropped on deck just as Tom got Hunt by the hair and gave it a yank that nearly raised his scalp, but did not wake him.

"Is this 'im?"

In the half-light Gawthrop saw a face which was the color of dark mahogany, and did not recognize his rival.

"No," he said. He did not know that Billy, with a professional ardor that did him credit, had colored Hunt and himself with walnut juice on their faces and hands till they appeared to have been tanned three skins deep.

And just as Gawthrop denied that he knew Hunt the bosun's whistle blew.

"You'd best come on deck. They're goin' to pick the watches," said Tom. And Gawthrop, still in a maze, followed the rest. When the fresh air blew on him his mind cleared as suddenly as if a fog had rolled up.

"By the Lord, I've been done," he said. And he knew it was Gardiner who had done him.

"All right," he said, "I'll get even. The Captain must put back; I'll pay him to do it."

His knowledge of the sea was limited. Though he was the citizen of a Republic he had been accustomed to deference. That was when he was Sibley Gawthrop. He was now a nameless man in dungaree trousers and a blue shirt, in a ship bound for London with a fine, fair wind. He walked aft with the defiant yet shamed air of a man who has been at a fancy ball and finds himself surprised by daylight.

"I want to see the Captain," he said to the first man whom he met aft. It happened to be Jones, the second "greaser."

"That's him on the poop," said Jones, staring at him; "take a good look at him, you drunken swab. Why the blue blazes didn't you come on board before?"

"My good fellow," said Gawthrop haughtily, "there has been a mistake; I must be put on shore immediately."

"Oh," said Jones—"Oh, indeed! There has been a fatal error, has there? And I'm your good fellow, am I? Take that, you swine."

And what Gawthrop took caused him to sit down very suddenly on a hard teak deck.

"What's the matter, Mr. Jones?" asked the Captain, coming to the break of the poop.

"Nothing, sir, nothing," said Jones, foaming at the mouth, "only this ratty hoodlum isn't sober yet. I'll have him in my watch if Mr. Ladd hasn't any fancy for him."

"Sir," said Gawthrop, still in a sitting position, "I'm not a sailor and have been put on board against my will. My name's Gawthrop, Sibley Gawthrop, of Menlo Park. I'm well known in San Francisco."

"Dry up," said Jones. "Known to the police, I should say, and your name's either Fisher or Bates. And where's that other josser? I'll soon see if he's one of the same sort."

He shot forward and was presently seen emerging from the foc'sle holding the astounded Hunt by the nape of his neck. He ran him aft and discharged him like a catapult right among the men. He fell down alongside Gawthrop.

"Mr. Jones, Mr. Jones," said the Skipper mildly. But if he was going to remonstrate with Jones on his American methods the two hands who had caused the fuss put him off. For Hunt and Gawthrop, on recognizing each other, as they did now in spite of their high coloring, lost no time in speech, but went for each other without a word. They locked together and rolled headlong into the starboard scuppers. For though the ship was on an even keel with a fine northerly breeze the deck had a big camber to it. And Captain Singleton lost all his mildness at this outrageous insult to his high authority.

"Pull them apart," he roared, as Jones dived for Gawthrop's ankle and two of the crew got Hunt by the legs.

"What the devil does this mean?"

"It means he's had me shanghaied," said Hunt. "I know it."

"And you—oh, I'll kill you," spluttered Gawthrop.

"Send them both up here," said the Captain. He stared at them like a fury when they stood before him. No two harder-looking cases ever had an interview with the Skipper. For Gawthrop was bleeding from the nose and Hunt had lost all his shirt but the neckband. They glared at each other and Jones stood between them.

"Now then," said Singleton, "before I put you in irons I'd like to know what you mean by daring——"

It was paralyzing to both Gawthrop and Hunt even yet to be looked at as the Captain looked at them.

"It's a mistake, a dreadful mistake," said Hunt. "If you will put me ashore I'll give you five thousand dollars."

And the eager crowd on the main deck sniggered.

"Lord, 'e's very big in drink, ain't 'e?" said Tom. The Skipper frowned and shook his fist right against Hunt's face.

"You hound, don't joke with me. What's the man's name, Mr. Jones?"

"It's either Bates or Fisher," said Jones.

"No, my name's Hunt," cried Hunt. And one of the men on deck, an insinuating beggar who liked to curry favor with the powers, cried:

"His name's Fisher, sir; I've seed him often about the Front."

"It's not, it's not," said Hunt furiously; "I'm a man well known in San Francisco."

"Shut up," said Jones; "the other joskin said that."

"I won't shut up," roared Hunt, quite losing his temper; "I warn you all to put me ashore or I'll ruin the lot of you."

"Oh," said the Captain, "indeed; well, we'll see. Mr. Jones, you can have the one there—Bates, I think; Mr. Ladd, look after this sailorman with the five thousand dollars. Now, if there's another word comes out of either of you, or if you start fighting again, and I hear of it, I'll make the pair of you wish you'd died before you saw me."

And Jones shoved both of them down on the main deck. The two unfortunates recognized that their only chance, and that the faintest, lay in speaking together.

"But we're neither of us sailors, sir," they said piteously.

"This is where we manufacture sailors," said Captain Singleton, who was not without humor. "Mr. Jones, Mr. Ladd, you hear that. I hope they won't be able to say as much for themselves this day three months."

And the crew laughed as in duty bound. But Hunt and Gawthrop did not laugh.

"D'ye think there's any truth in what these two men said?" asked Captain Singleton of his mates.

"Likely enough, sir," replied Ladd; "aren't we out of San Francisco?"

"I certainly don't seem to remember their faces," said the Skipper, "but they'll have to do. Make what you can of them. If it's anyways true, it's no good letting on we think so."

"Certainly not, sir," said Ladd. "But what's their remedy?"

He knew perfectly well that there was no practical remedy against the ship. And Hunt and Gawthrop were well aware they had none against their friend Shanghai Smith, or against Gardiner.

They had no chance of speaking to each other till the second dog-watch, and then only in the presence of the whole crowd, who were very anxious to fathom the mystery. "They ain't sailormen, not they," growled the oldest man on board, who came from Brook Street, Shadwell, and was known as "Shadwell," though his real name was Shaw; "and a nice thing for hus. Two less to take the wheel. I calls it a bally shime."

He looked at Hunt with an air of unutterable contempt, and sniffed every time the man spoke. Gawthrop, who was younger and more elastic, sat on the other side of the foc'sle and presently addressed Hunt:

"I suppose we must make the best of it, Hunt."

"Don't speak to me, sir," said Hunt.

And the crew roared.

"Tell us 'ow it 'appened, do," said Tom. "Oh, ain't your friend 'aughty! Tell us, 'as 'e got that five thousand dollars?"

"Not on him," said Gawthrop.

"Look 'ere," said Tom, "if you'll tell us the troof, I'll stand you a drop of rum. I've a nip left, and this is a teetotal ship, this is."

He could not conceive any man refusing such a bribe. And Gawthrop, in spite of everything, could hardly help laughing at Hunt's face. He took the rum partly to have an excuse for telling the story. It was the wisest thing to be friends with every one, and after all, if he was out of the running for a time, so was Hunt.

"Well," said Gawthrop, "I and my cheerful friend over there are very good friends, indeed. But I wanted him out of San Francisco for a time, for reasons. And I got Shanghai Smith to arrange for it."

"We know him," said the crowd eagerly. "Oh, yes, we know him!"

"I stayed in 'is 'ouse."

"So did I."

"Shut up, and let him tell us."

And Hunt by now was all alone on the starboard side. Even old Shadwell came across to hear the yarn.

"Another friend of mine suggested it," said Gawthrop, "and fixed it up for me."

"That was Gardiner," said Hunt.

"It was," said Gawthrop, "and I paid a thousand dollars to have Mr. Hunt put here."

"That's what I paid to have you put here," said Hunt. "A friend of mine put me up to it."

"That was Gardiner," said Gawthrop.

"It was," said Hunt.

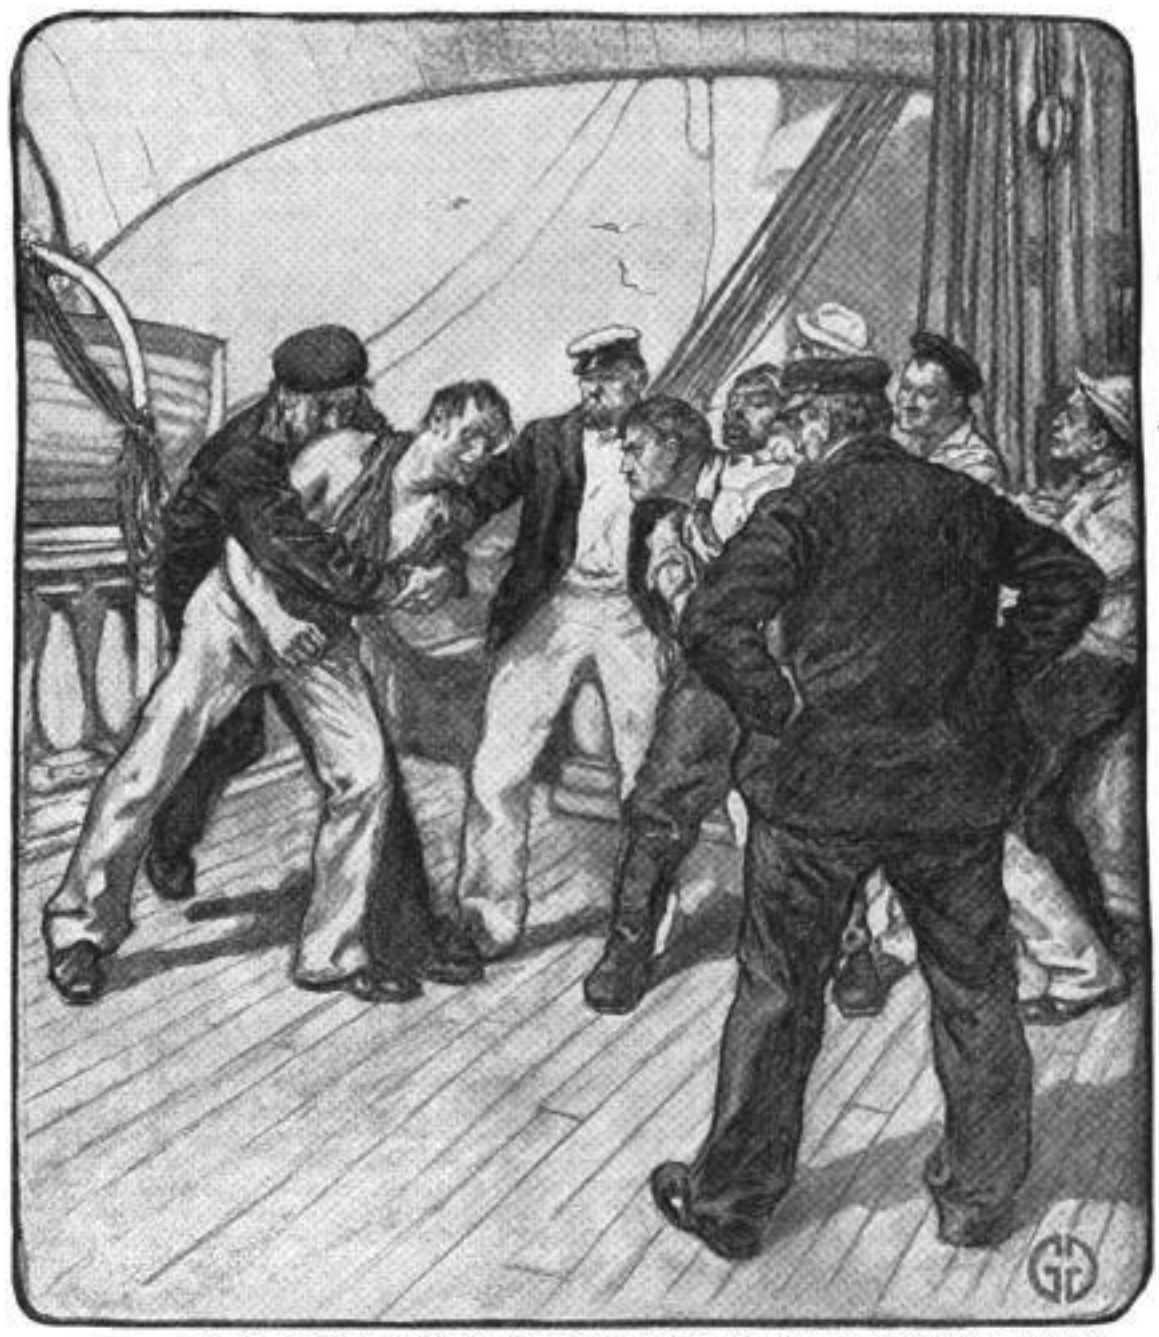
"And that's why we're both here," said Gawthrop, and his aspect was at once so melancholy and so comic that all hands shrieked with laughter. Old Shadwell creaked like the cheep of a block.

"But what's this hyer Gardiner to do with the show?" asked the only American in the crew. "It looks like as if he played the pair of you for suckers."

"You ain't told us hall," said Shadwell, with a gloomy air of suspicion. "I knows somethin' of life, and somethin' about woman. And there was a woman in this."

"Mr. Shadwell is right," said Gawthrop.

"I was to have taken her for a drive this morning," said Hunt, "and a pretty sort of man I shall look not turning up."



"Never mind," said Gawthrop, "I was to have taken her out this afternoon."

Old Shadwell nodded gloomily.

"What 'ave I often told you about 'em, mates?" he said. "This proves it. A woman's like a cat with nine lives and nine sorts of dispositions, and if she don't satisfy 'em with nine sort of men fools she ain't happy. I've known 'em as nine couldn't satisfy. And they're all the same; there's different nations of men, but women is all one nation. You can bet your boots, you two fellers, that your girl is out with some one else. This here v'yge will do yer good if it rams that into you."

He turned to the others.

HUNT AND GAWTHROP, ON RECOGNIZING EACH OTHER, LOST NO TIME IN SPEECH

The Autobiography of a Beggar

By I. K. FRIEDMAN

Author of "By Bread Alone," Etc.

Meh Start in Life

WELL, old gent an' anterpolergist, ter go back in meh story a foot er two, I never runned away from meh home, sweet home; I jist natcherally quit, bein' a independent boy an' wantin' ter earn meh own livin' an' not support meh parents any more. I was fourteen den, very tall an' strong fer meh age, an' hungry; more hungry en tall, I guess.

De man what give meh a start in life was a blind "yeager" by de name ef Wily Will. I've seen all de beggars der is (includin' meh friend Foxy Basket), but dat blind man was de king ef 'em all in some ways. I ain't got no reason ter love him, but I give him credit; he knowed his bizness. He's dead ez a door-nail now, so de truth won't hurt him none, which is de big joy ef bein' dead. Peace ter his cinders! He was a short, thin, small, rather gray on de top kind ef a feller when I knowed him first, all bone an' muscle, wid a grip like a bulldorg's teeth. Bulldorg's teeth an' handcuffs has de two best grips ef anything on earth, an' I've had 'em all tried on meh.

Wily Will was de oddest beggar in de world, which yer will learn ez I go along. He jist kep' ter hisself, not 'cause he was proud er stuck-up (few beggars is), but jist 'cause he thought it was good fer bizness. Yer knows how most ef 'em is, livin' in a house tergither, an' tradin' secrets an' marks, er workin' wid a boss er a king; but Wily Will he jist went his own lonely way an' wouldn't speak ter eny ef 'em.

—AN' HE NEVER LET ME GIT LOOSE TILL I RUNNED AWAY FROM HIM

I seen him beggin' around when I started out on meh own hook, an' I axed him ef it wouldn't be a good idee fer meh ter lead him up an' down, an' he reached out an' nabbed me by de wrist an' he never let me git loose till I runned away from him.

We lived in a shanty in de rear ef a shop on Quincy Street, an' de only furniture was newspapers on de wall, a bed on de floor, an' a stove where he done his cookin'. Fried eggs an' a bit ef bacon an' coffee was his faverite dish. Also he liked ter play de fiddle an' ter sing. Also he was a miser, which is a strange combination, an' comes later on. His perticler game was ter sell lead pencils.

De first day we went out he says ter meh, "Keep yer eyes open an' yer mouth shut. Don't talk none. I'll do all de talkin'. Yer mother is dead an' I'm yer father, an' dat's all yer needs ter rimimber ef it comes ter a pinch."

"But meh mother ain't dead," I says.

"I ain't takin' yer ter Sunday-school," says he, handin' meh a nice lick on de ear. "Hold yer tongue."

"Yer might change wrists," I said ater a bit.

"Git used ter it," he says.

He didn't beg on de streets none 'cause he said he had reg'ler customers in de stores an' it looked bad. We wint around from place ter place an' he got a nickel here an' a dime dere, an' oncet er twice a quarter.

He didn't talk none ter meh, only mumblin' to hisself agin bad bizness an' hard luck all de time. I kin tell yer afore dat mornin' was over I was dead tired ef meh job. I could hardly pull meh legs along, but when I lagged behint he gives meh a pinch an' says, "Yer leadin' meh; I ain't a-leadin' you." I was hungry, too, an' he wouldn't give meh nothin' ter eat, sayin' two meals a day was enuff fer a boy. He didn't drink none an' he kep' out ef saloons altergither, sayin', "Saloons is no good fer our line. Dey wants a dollar worth ef fun an' time fer ivery cent dey gives up."

"Yer made a dollar an' ninety-five cints already dis mornin'," says I, countin' up; "ain't yer goin' home?"

"Keep still," he says; "de pencils cost meh a dollar."

"But dey didn't keep de pencils; yer got 'em yet."

"Ye little fool," he says, "don't I have ter sell de pencils afore I makes anything? An' how does yer know I took in a dollar an' ninety-five?"

"I counted up," I says.

"Yer ter mind yer own bizness," he says.

"Yer told meh ter keep meh eyes open," I said.

"An' yer mouth shut," he says, pinchin' meh arm.

De first place we went inter dat afternoon, de cove says ter him, "I don't berlieve in encouragin' beggars; but ef a man comes in ter sell somethin' I allus berlieves in buyin' what he's got."

"Dat's a good principul," says Wily.

"But yer pencils ain't no good at all," says de man; "de last ones what I bought had no lead in 'em."

"Well," says Wily, "yer knows how iverybody cheats a blind man. It's a shame. Dose pencils cost meh two cents an' a half apiece an' I sells 'em fer five. I'm sure dese new ones is all right."

"How much will yer give meh a dozen fer?" axes de man.

"Fifty cents," says Wily.

An' de man gives him de half, an' Wily says, "I see I only got eight. I'll leave de rest de next time I comes aroun'."

"I don't do bizness dat way," says de cove.

"Come ter think," says Wily, "de boy has got a package in his pocket."

"I ain't," I pipes out.

"Yer fergot," he says; "I put 'em in yer coat dis mornin';" an' he slips his hand in meh pocket an' sure enuff he pulls out de pencils.

An' when we gits outside he says ter meh, "I got a notion ter take yer in de alley an' wallop de life out ef yer. Didn't I say ter keep yer mouth shut? Yer nearly cost meh a half-dollar."

"But de pencils come ter most a quarter," I says, "an' ——"

"Shut up," he roars; "yer too smart; I've a mind ter let yer go."

"I wish yer would," I says; "I'd start in de pencil bizness fer mehself."

"I'll pencil bizness yer when we gits home," says he. An' he starts in an' cusses dat cove fer keepin' de pencils, callin' him de puttiest names what ever I heard fer cheatin' a blind man. He was crazy 'bout dose pencils; it seemed ter hurt him more en ter lose money. I never seed de like, fer dey didn't cost no more en two fer a cent. An' I says ter him ater a bit:

"Is yer goin' ter bring de cove de new pencils in de mornin'?"

"I ain't crazy," he says.

"But you'll lose a good customer," I says.

"I ain't lookin' fer customers," he says; "any fool kin sell things."

"I know," I says, "but——"

"Yer knows nothin' at all," he says; "not even enuff ter hold yer tongue." An' all de way home dat night he kept cussin' an' mumblin' agin people what wanted somethin' fer dere money. "Dey kill de beggar bizness," he says; an' like de little fool I was I pipes up an' axes:

"Why don't yer quit sellin' things an' jist beg, den?" An' dat rimark cost meh a crack on de ear.

In de night fer supper he gives meh a hunk ef bread, an' he says ez he would give meh a fried egg an' a piece ef bacon, which he cooked fer hisself, only it was meh fault dat he lost dose dozen pencils. Den he gits out a book an' writes down de names an' de numbers ef de people an' what dey gives him, an' I watches him close an' says:

"Don't fergit de man what kep' de pencils."

"You undress an' go ter bed," he says, sharp.

An' I undresses, not thinkin' ef what was ter come, an' what does he do but take meh clothes an' search meh pockets. De dime an' de nickel what I managed ter steal on him rolls on de floor, an' he seen em jist es ef he had eyes. "Yer rascul!" he yells, "stealin' from meh! I'll learn yer!"

"I had de dime an' de nickel afore I come ter yer," I says.

"Den yer should have given 'em ter meh," he growls; "boys ain't got no bizness wid money, anyways." I'd ruther not write down how he tried ter separate meh skin from meh bones. "Now yer turn over on yer side an' go ter sleep," he says when he was thru whalin' meh.

Den he takes his fiddle an' plays an' sings, an' I pretends ter sleep, but I didn't, fer I wanted ter see where he put de coin what he took in dat day. Along ten o'clock he puts de fiddle away an' ties meh clothes up in a bundle an' puts 'em under his bed, so I seen dere was no chanct ter run away. Den he moves de bed a bit an' lifts a plank out ef de floor, an' he takes out a bag ef money (a whole bag ef it; I hope ter die ef it ain't so, Mr. Anterpolergist) an' he counts it, an' plays wid it, an' sings ter it, an' talks ter it, like ez ef dat coin was kids. Den he ties it up agin an' puts it back under de bed agin. I 'spose he had de notion dat ef he slept over de coin it would hatch de same ez ef it was eggs. Den he mumbled some more ter hisself 'bout de cove what kept de dozen pencils an' he went ter sleep.

—AN' SINGS TER IT, AN' TALKS TER IT, LIKE EZ EF DAT COIN WAS KIDS

De next mornin' I made up meh mind ter keep meh eyes wide open, an' run away de first chanct I got, 'cause he fed me worst den I could feed mehself by playin' basket, which means de same ez playin' door-mat, er beggin' fer food at kitchen doors. 'Sides, I seen der was no chanct ef gittin' de bag ef coin, seein' he slept over it an' meh clothes too. I was a-dyin' ter ax him how much coin der was in de bag.

On de way downtown he says ter meh, "Yer go an' get dem pencils back. Tell de cove dat yer father made a mistake an' give him de wrong ones, an' dat he'll come round dis afternoon an' give him a dozen new ones in deir place. I'll wait for yer right by de outside door, an' ef yer brings 'em back I'll give yer two fried eggs an' a slice ef bacon fer yer supper; an' ef yer don't I'll wallop yer."

So I goes inter de cove an' tells him what Wily says, an' he laffs an' gives meh de pencils, takin' 'em out ef his drawer. An' I seen de chanct I was a-lookin' fer, an' 'stead ef goin' out de front door I steals out thru de back an' leaves Mr. Wily a-waitin'. I bet he swore some.

I begged on de street a bit dat day, bein' hungry, an' oncet I got a dime, but a cop seed meh an' he says ter meh ef he catches meh agin he'd pull meh in, an' I got skeered. Why is it I was so young an' green den?

In de afternoon I reaches in meh pocket an' feels de dozen pencils, which I clean fergot; an' idee strikes meh, an' I walks back to de cove's place, thinkin' ez maybe I could giv' him de pencils back an' work him fer a dime. An' I no sooner pokes meh little blond head in de door den de cove yells, "Dere's yer boy now!" An' Mr. Wily, who was standin' dere, makes a spring fer meh, an' I runned lickety split down de street, never turnin' ter look. I have been skeered often in meh life, most enuff ter git used ter it, but dat was de wust skeer a man could have. But dat was de last time Mr. Wily ever got in de same block wid meh. Awful smart feller, Wily; yer see, he figured out dat I would come back ter sell de cove dat dozen pencils, an' he must have been waitin' dere all day ter grab meh. I guess dose pencils worried him until de daisies turned away from his toes.

GITTIN' ALONG IN DE WORLD

WHOOP! Mr. Anterpolergist, ef it's all de same ter you I'd like ter skip de time when I jined a gang ef kids what made it deir trade ter break inter empty houses fer de sake ef cuttin' out de lead pipes. It wasn't no lead-pipe cinch, as I found out aterwards when de fly cops grabbed meh an' dey sent meh to de riform school fer three years. I made up meh mind den an' dere dat I'd quit stealin', riform, leave dese git-rich-quick schemes alone, an' earn a honest livin' by beggin'. Beggin' is a heap slower, but it's surer.

SAM DE SCRIBE COME TO MEH AN' SAYS: "MOLLBUZZER, I GOT A SCHEME"

When I came ter Chicago agin, riformed but still happy, I made direct fer "De Star Ef Hope," a dime lodgin'-house on Union Street, which is de winter haven ef rest an' plenty fer hobos an' "yengers." I made de acquaintance ef Sam de Scribe dere, an' I kin say dat meh fortin' was fixed from dat day on. Sam was makin' in his bizness den ter write letters an' ter surply infermation. He kept reg'lar books in which was writ all de names ef de easy marks in Chicago. His book was big ez de Chicago directery almost. He charged yer ten cents fer givin' yer de name ef a house where yer could git clothes, an' from ten cents up ter fifty fer de name an' number where yer could git money. Pay was allus in adwance. Sam got us goin' an' comin', fer ef de clothes we brung back was good, he bought 'em back from us agin an' sold 'em oncet agin. I used ter wonder what he done wid all his money.

One day I started out from "De Star Ef Hope" wid anudder feller what we called Shirtless Sam, an' we didn't git very far afore we seen a plumber comin' out ef a saloon, wid a bag ef tools, drunk ez a bottle ef rum.

"Seein' plumbin' tools an' lead pipes," I says ter Sam, "make me feel kinder ter home. I used ter be in de plumbin' line fer a short time mehself."

An' thinkin' maybe I could git de tools away from de plumber, him not bein' in de condition ter use 'em anyways, I starts ter speak ter him an' he axes us ter come in an' have a drink, which we done. An' he takes out a paper wid a name an' a address on an' he says, "I got ter go ter dis house an' fix a leakin' water pipe, but I ain't a-goin' ter fix no water ter day, not meh!"

So I takes de paper way from him when he puts it in his pocket, an' Sam he grabs de tools an' runs an' I ater him.

When we got inter de alley, Shirtless Sam says ter meh, "We kin take dese tools ter Sam de Scribe an' sell 'em."

"Ater fixin' de pipes fer de lady," I says, fer de thought ef lead pipes kind ef made meh homesick, an' I was timpted agin.

"But yer ain't no plumber," says Shirtless Sam.

"Yer jist come along an' watch meh an' see," I says.

So we went to de name an' de number, an' de gurl, which was a Swede, comes to de door an' axes us why we wus so late, growlin' 'bout de water leakin' thru de house an' spoilin' de carpits.

"Don't yer worry none," I says; "meh an' dis gent here'll fix it quicker en yer kin wink yer eye." An' den I tells her de boss said ez we was ter collict de bill in adwance.

"De missus is out," she says; "she jist had ter go down-town fer a bit, an' I don't know what ter do!"

"Well," says I, "de missus bein' out" (which is what I wanted ter know), "yer kin fix de bill wid de boss aterwards!" An' she shows us inter de parler where de leak was, an' says it must come from de bathroom.

Sam an' meh shins up to de bathroom an' I says ter him, closin' de door tight, "Sam, dis is a cinch, de missus bein' out an' dis lead pipe bein' wuth a couple a inch easy!"

"What yer goin' ter do?" he says. "Cut de pipes out an' flood de house out? We'll be sint over sure!"

"I knows meh bizness, I guess," I answers. "Now you keep busy downstairs an' leave meh an' dese pipes alone fer a while." An' I goes downstairs in de basement fer ter find de place ter turn de water orff, but I couldn't find de place an' de Swede gurl didn't know where de water pipe was, an' bein' in a big hurry I says, "Well, we kin let it go jist ez well ez not."

When I come up to de bathroom agin I finds Sam a-cuttin' a hole thru de floor big enuff ter put de bathtub in.

"What are yer doin'?" I yells.

"It's de only way fer ter find de leak!" he says.

"Yer kin leave de plumbin' part ter meh," I says, "an' go down in de parler an' look out fer de missus."

"All right," says he, grabbin' a hammer an' a saw an' a chisel, "I'll take dese ter make a bluff at bein' busy."

An' while I was cuttin' two wood plugs ter stuff in de ends ef de pipes what I intended ter cut out, I hears a terruble noise from de parler, an' Sam he yells up, "Oh, Mollbuzzer, come down quick; de ceilin' is cavin' in, an' I can't find de leak!"

I kites down de stairs a skeert out ef meh wits, an' sure enuff dere was a hole in de parler wall big enuff ter put de bathtub in, an' de water was a-comin' out like from a summer fountain; fer Sam must 'a' cut a hole thru de pipe! An' de Swede gurl was a-sittin' on a chair, rockin' herself up an' down, an' a-hidin' her head in her apron like she was goin' crazy.

"Who toled yer ter do dat!" I hollers. "Didn't I say ter leave de plumbin' ter meh? Does yer want de whole house ter come down?"

"Well, Mollbuzzer," he whispers, "de Swede gurl was a standin' around an' lookin' an' I had ter do somethin' fer a bluff!"

"Fer Heaven's sake don' touch it agin," I says, an' I climbs up de ladder he had dere, an' I puts meh head in de hole ter look aroun', an' all de time dere was a little river flowin' northwest by southeast thru de parler. It made meh turn pale, I kin tell yer.

"Dere ain't much time ter monkey, Sam," I says, thinkin' about de nice lead waitin' upstairs. "Jist yer hand meh a couple ef dem rugs on de floor an' I'll stuff 'em in here ez best I kin."

An' when he grabbed de rugs de Swede gurl come ter herself, an' she lets out a most fierce yell, grabbin' Sam by de arm ter git de rugs from him. "Meh Heavens!" she screams, "what is youse goin' ter do! De house is ruined now! O Lord, what'll I do? I wish missus was back, I do. It'll take a week fer ter git dis parler back inter shape!"

"No it won't, neither," says Sam, pullin' de rugs away from her an' handin' 'em ter meh, "yer kin turn de hose on, light de stove an' use de broom, an' dry it out in less en no time!"

"Wimens makes meh nervous when I'm workin'," I says to de gurl. "Now yer jist run out ef here. I knows meh bizness when it comes ter plumbin', I guess."

"I ain't goin' out, neither; I'm goin' ter stay right here an' see what yer doin'," she says.

An' jist den de water breaks out like from a fire-engine hose an' dose rugs falls out on de floor an' I gets wet to de skin, an' de Swede gurl hollers like a ijiot.

"Dere, yer see what yer done!" I yells, flyin' orff de ladder, "'count ef yer wimen's ways ef standin' around here. Go an' git a candle, fer dat pipe broke in anudder place an' I must find it. Run fer yer life er de whole ceilin' 'ill be down in a minute!"

"Sam," I says when she was gone, "we're in a lively fix. Dis job is wuth two years apiece now, an' it'll be worth more every minute. Dere ain't nothin' ter do but ter saw orff de legs from dat gold chair an' stuff 'em in de pipe."

"Yer had better put de rugs back, Mollbuzzer," he says, lightin' his pipe an' puttin' his feet on top de marbul table like ez ef dere wasn't nothin' de matter.

"I'm wet enough," I says; "you kin do it. It's yer fault, anyways!"

"No use ef both ef us gettin' wet," he says, sittin' calm an' smokin' an' leavin meh ter saw de legs ef de chair orff.

Den de Swede gurl, not findin' de candle in de kitchen, goes up ter de bathroom fer it, an' when she seed what we done up dere she screams like a whole insane 'sylum.

"Shin upstairs, Foxy," I says, "an' lock de gurl in de bathroom, fer I'm afreerd she'll make trouble fer us!"

An' I climbed up on de ladder agin, feelin' wet an' mad, ter plug de pipe wid de chair legs an' ter put de rugs an' two soffee pillers in de hole. De leak stops den, but dat Swede begins ter scream agin an' ter pound de door ef de bathroom.

"Sam," I yells, goin' inter de hall an' callin' up, "de leak is stopped an' de gurl is locked up, so I guess it's a good time ter fly de coop!"

"But de pipes an' de plumbin' tools is locked up wid de gurl an' where is we goin' ter be ahead?" he axes.

"We'll have ter go, anyways," I says; "it's gettin' dangerous. Maybe we kin take a couple ef coats ter make up fer our loss ef time an' trouble!"

"I tell yer what yer kin do, Mollbuzzer," he says, "cut a hole thru de parler wall an' we kin pull de tools thru de hole."

"I ain't a-goin' ter do no sich thing," I says.

"If you don't I will," he says, a-startin' down; "a few more feet ef hole ain't a-goin' ter make no differunce, an' dose tools is ourn, anyways. Why fer should we leave 'em here?"

An' afore I could stop Sam he climbs up de ladder agin, jerks de rugs out an' begins ter hammer an' chisel thru de plaster an' de slats.

"Yer crazy," I yells, a-tryin' ter stop him.

"I ain't, neither," he answers; "I kin put meh head thru already!"

"De Swede gurl'll ketch yer by de neck an' choke yer ter death!" I says.

"An' sure enuff, jist ez I said, de Swede gurl sticks her foot thru de hole which Sam made an' gives him a kick what sent him tumblin' orff de ladder. "Oh, Mollbuzzer, I'm dead!" he yells, "I'm dead!" An' so he would 'a' been ef I didn't ketch him.

"Dose Swede gurls is terruble," he says, sittin' down an' feelin' ef his head. "I'm never goin' in a house agin where a Swede gurl is!"

"Got enuff?" I axes.

"We kin cut down de whole wall," he says, "an' let de Swede gurl an' de tools an' all come thru!"

"Dere's de missus!" I says, hearin' de bell ring; "I guess dere won't be time!"

"I guess not," he says; an' we went out by de back door, meh freezin' ter death wid de cold an' de wet an' him cussin' all de time 'cause I didn't do as he wanted an' sell dose tools ter Sam de Scribe. I guess he was right.

—AN' DE WATER WAS A-COMIN' OUT LIKE FROM A SUMMER FOUNTAIN

GITTIN' EVEN WID DE WORLD

I STAYED in "De Star Ef Hope" up till January de first, which waz de day when Sam de Scribe come ter meh an' says, "Mollbuzzer, I got a scheme. I want ter be de J. Pierpont Morgan ef de beggar world. We kin make a trust ez easy ez not, an' I'll be prisident an' yer kin be secretary. Morgan's got everything else an' I guess he won't bother 'bout us none. Ef he does I kin squeeze him inter a corner. It might be a good idee," he says wid a wise wink, "ter take Morgan in, ef he behaves hisself."

"Quit yer jokin', Sam," I says; "what's up?"

"Well," says Sam, "de cops has got dis joint spotted pretty clost an' I think we better move out an' rint a place ef our own. I knows a whole house near Fulton Street what we kin rint fer twenty dollars a month. We kin take de best "yeagers" in de town wid us, an' ef we work things proper we kin run all de rest ef 'em out, er make 'em work fer us!" I said ez I was willin', an' de next day Sam picked his men, which was about a dozen, an' we went over near ter Fulton Street ter live. De house wasn't much ter brag about inside ner outside, an' all we put in it was ourselves an' heaps ef rags an' newspapers fer beds.

Our earnings was mighty good, fer Sam said he wouldn't have no beggar in de place what couldn't bring in two dollars a day, an' he made 'em all work an' contribute der share to de treasury. Ef yer wants ter know what Sam done to de treasury yer'll have ter ask him, 'cause he never tole meh.

De twelve ef us jist took what part ef de town we wanted, an' ef we caught any other beggar on our quarters we jist made him join us er git out. Dey bowled first, but dey soon found out it was cheaper ter come in, 'cause we follered 'em aroun' an' made sich trouble fer 'em dat dey got sick. Afore de winter was over we had twenty-five in de house, an' we was collectin' from ten to twenty-five cents a week from ez many more.

Den Sam de Scribe he got de swell head an' changed his name ter Samuel de Cadger King; which made trouble. I warned him, but he wouldn't listen, sayin' he was goin' ter be king er nothin'.

Sam invented a system ef signs which we used ter mark on de houses. De sign ef a cross dog was ×; fer a cross dog an' a cross woman it was ✳; fer a kind lady it was ⊖; fer food an' clothes it was ⊕; fer money it was ▣. An' so we had signs fer most everything, which saved a heap ef time an' trouble. But Hungry Henry an' one or two more ef 'em got mad at Sam fer puttin' on airs an' playin' king, an' dey left de house an' went aroun' de town changin' our signs, an' I nearly lost meh leg by goin' inter a house marked wid de money sign an' findin' a lively bulldorg in de back yard.

The Stock Exchange from the Inside

A DESCRIPTION OF THE NEW EXCHANGE—WHERE THE ASSOCIATION GETS THE MONEY FOR THE HUGE EXPENDITURES—THE RIGID CENSORSHIP OF ITS PRIVATE AFFAIRS

By S. Mac Reynolds

Author of The Blowing of an Oil Bubble, The Home of Trusts, etc.

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

LIKE the famed temple of Athene, dispenser of fortune to the Greeks, the New York Stock Exchange is an oblong structure, consisting chiefly of a great masonic canopy, supported by a peristyle of majestic marble columns (pilasters on the two sides, where walled in by abutting structures) and in front adorned by a massive pediment, in which, carved in bas-relief, is an allegorical group symbolic of the ideals of its builders. Viewed from the façade, this classical resemblance is emphasized by what may be deemed the most remarkable feature of the edifice. It will be recalled that the temples of Attica were without walls, being built simply of foundation, upright columns and roof, affording no protection from the elements, save from above. The rigorous climate and the necessity for greater seclusion would, of course, render such a scheme impracticable in New York, but another exigency, equally urgent amid skyscrapers, viz., abundance of light, has led to an almost exact reproduction of the classic model. Wall there will be none, but an unbroken expanse of plate glass, rising fifty-two feet to the full height of the great Corinthian columns and extending across the entire width of the building one hundred and twelve feet, will afford both light and shelter to the interior. And the architectural effect of the transparent front is as if the Pantheon had been transplanted from Attica to Manhattan, save that instead of Zeus, in his golden raiment, with his court, will stand posts and standards to the modern deities: St. Paul, MoP, The Coalers, Steel, Coppers and a numerous band of others.

Never did the great builders of more leisurely civilizations display more prodigality in gratifying the supposed whims of their deities than has the committee in charge of the appointments of the new Exchange. On the floor of the board-room, where trading is conducted, are five hundred telephones, and terminals for thirty different systems of pneumatic tube service. Three and one-half miles of ventilator pipes permeate the building. On the east wall of the board-room is a glass annunciator or bulletin-board checkered into twelve hundred colored squares, one for each member of the Exchange. The lighting of a green incandescent in any member's square indicates that he is wanted at the Broad Street entrance, and the burning of a red bulb apprises him of a telephone call. By these and numberless other devices, which only showers of gold could command, the magic palace produced by the fabled Aladdin is, in strict verity, put to shame.

The World Building, which when built was deemed by many to be one of the wonders of the world, cost $1,125,000. But the cost of construction has cheapened since then and the Tract Society Building, twenty stories in height and more elegant in its appointments, was completed for $900,000.

Yet the new Stock Exchange, the equivalent of only five stories in height, cost in excess of $3,000,000, and is perhaps the most beautiful edifice of the sort in the world.

But whence came this wealth so profusely and lavishly spent? Did the members of the Exchange each contribute their quota of the amount for the sake of having more commodious quarters in which to transact their business? Or as popularly supposed, did the dues of members accumulate in the treasury from year to year until the $3,000,000 was available?

If neither, then what individual undertook the financial responsibility for a contract involving such a sum? The Stock Exchange as a whole could not be held responsible, for the Stock Exchange is merely a voluntary association or society without a charter and legally unaccountable for contractual obligations.

These questions may be answered negatively by saying that none of the members furnished the capital for building the structure; neither do the members of the Exchange pay any dues from which such a fund might be derived; nor did the Exchange either as a body or in the person of any of its members stand responsible for the contracted sum. To reply affirmatively to these self-propounded queries and others which might occur to the thoughtful, it will be necessary to go into the organization and maintenance of the institution more fully, though the secrets there involved have been most sedulously guarded.

The organization named in its by-laws, The New York Stock Exchange, is limited to a membership of twelve hundred for the convenient dispatch of business on the floor by all who desire to attend. This business is chiefly buying and selling stocks and bonds for outside clients, and members are permitted to charge a commission of one-eighth of one per cent. on the par value of every transaction. The demand for their services is so great that an average of probably $200,000 a day or $70,000,000 a year is distributed among the members in commissions. As one must be a member, or in the parlance of the street, "have a seat" on the Exchange, to share in this golden flood, "seats" are worth from $65,000 to $75,000.

Yet the organization derives no income from the sale of seats, all original seats having long been sold, though any member is at liberty to sell or bequeath his seat to any one acceptable to the Membership Committee.

The Autocratic Powers of the Committee

From the beginning of history, when the masses struggled with the few for power, the rich consistently favored the concentration of authority and strict, rigid discipline among the governed—not so much out of any desire to monopolize authority themselves, but because they, accustomed to heavy responsibilities, realized more clearly than their fellows the advantages of concentration and the waste and delay of bickering. The Exchange is an organization of the classes par excellence, and in it we find their principles of government ideally exemplified. Twelve men, elected annually and known as the Governing Committee, are, during their term of office, absolute in their power, and from their decisions there is no appeal; no, not even to the courts. A resort to the courts, where the secrets of the organization might be divulged and the authority of its officers curtailed, is punished with the greatest penalty within their power to inflict. Article XVII, section 3, of the by-laws reads thus:

> Legal Interference with Officers or Committees.
> Sec. 3. Any member of the New York Stock Exchange who, or whose partner or partners, shall apply for an injunction, or legal instrument, restraining any officer or committee of the Exchange from performing his or its duties under the Constitution, shall, by that act, cease to be a member of the Association.

It is somewhat doubtful now, since the Gates pool executed their famous corner in corn in the Chicago Board of Trade and the court decided that it was unlawful for an organization to prohibit to its members the use of the courts of justice, whether this article of the by-laws could be enforced; but since the forfeiture of a seat spells the loss of something like $75,000, no member has yet developed sufficient curiosity to test its legality.

One of the anomalous functions which the members of this strange society have assumed is that of insuring one another's lives. The plan is mutual, and, we might say, simple to the point of absurdity. Mortality tables are ignored as being the visionary theories of long-haired philosophers; the youth and the aged, the weak and the strong, are all, unless they be chronic invalids, insured for a like amount ($10,000) and pay the same premium—ten dollars on initiation and ten dollars on a member's death.

The surplus after these policies are paid goes into an investment fund, which, according to agreement, is to remain inviolate until it amounts to $1,000,000, when the proceeds will be devoted to the reduction of the death assessments. This fund, which was established in 1892 with $10,000, is said to be worth now approximately $25,000. The conduct of the insurance department is ridiculously unscientific, but it conduces to easy bookkeeping, and the members, viewing it as a benevolent enterprise anyway, are not critical.

There seems to be a quite general impression that the Exchange is supported by membership dues. This is erroneous. An initiation fee of $1000 and the insurance assessments mentioned above are the only obligations which a member owes the association. Not only has it been seen to that outsiders shall pay the expenses of the organization, but that they shall salary the officers and committeemen and rear them a palace of unexampled splendor withal. The money comes in three separate streams, whose sources are:

First. The railroad, industrial and banking corporations whose securities are traded in on the Exchange.

Second. The telegraph and cable companies holding exclusive franchises for the dissemination of the market reports.

Third. The holders of the local "ticker" privilege.

Before any stock or bond may be bought or sold on the floor of the Exchange the corporation issuing it must make application to the Committee on Listed Securities, which is appointed by, and subordinate to, the omnipotent Governing Committee. If the corporation is willing to submit to an investigation regarding its assets and liabilities and shall be found to have been in solvent existence for at least one year, and if its securities are estimated to be of sufficient importance in the financial world to add appreciably to the business of the Exchange, they are "listed" and may be openly sold in the board-room. If a corporation declines to make a statement of its financial condition, then its stocks are placed on the trading list as "unlisted securities," as the vernacular of the street paradoxically expresses it. An unlisted stock possesses all the nominal advantages of a listed stock, but is always viewed with suspicion by traders.

The sum paid by a corporation for the privilege of being permitted to have its securities dealt in by these brokers varies according to its capitalization. For every million dollars, par value, of securities admitted to the trading privilege, the Exchange exacts an annual fee of fifty dollars.

What the Privileges of the Exchange Cost

The Erie Railroad Company, for example, is capitalized at $290,000,000, of which $65,000,000 is preferred stock, $112,000,000 common stock, and $113,000,000 bonds of various issues and kinds. On the preferred stock at fifty dollars for each million the company pays an annual fee of $3250; on the common, $5600, and on the bonds, $5650, or a total of $14,500 annually. The United States Steel Corporation pays $50,900 for the listing of its stock. All told, the securities called on the floor of the Exchange aggregate in round numbers as follows:

Railroad stocks, $4,500,000,000; miscellaneous stocks, $3,500,000,000; railroad bonds, $5,000,000,000; miscellaneous bonds, $500,000,000; or a grand total of $13,500,000,000. At fifty dollars a million, this yields $675,000 each year for the support of the Exchange.

What amount the telegraph companies contribute for the privilege of reporting the market to outside towns is unknown save to the immediate parties to the contract. There is scarcely a city of importance between the two oceans, however, where some bucket-shop or brokerage house does not pay liberally for these reports, and it may be fairly assumed that the Exchange receives no inconsiderable percentage.

The "ticker," which has become well-nigh ubiquitous in the larger centres of population, is an ingenious contrivance which receives and prints telegraphic messages in plain English, instead of the dots and dashes of the Morse alphabet. From 10 A. M. to 3 P. M. thousands of these little animated machines throughout the East click off a record of the sales as fast as they are made. The company owning the ticker franchise rents them to brokers, restaurateurs and keepers of public resorts generally for from ten to twenty-five dollars a month each and divides the proceeds with the Exchange. These three sources of income—listed securities, telegraph and ticker franchises—are estimated to yield not less than $800,000 annually—a sum greater than the total revenue of any one of the States of New Hampshire, Delaware, Florida, Montana or Washington. And this is but a ninth part of the amount received by the members in commissions.

In mitigation of the apparent extravagance displayed by the Exchange in providing itself new quarters, it should be said that the money in the treasury was accumulating at such a tremendous rate and the current expenses were so insignificant—$5000 annually to the president, a similar amount to the secretary, a few hundred to certain members to attend occasional committee meetings, maintenance of building, stationery, and so on, comprised about all the demands on the institution—that it was a knotty problem how to spend the surplus. The majestic pile of Georgian marble which was finally decided on was a happy solution of a rare problem, and will ever stand a pride of the metropolis. Yet the deed to this magnificent structure, built with the revenues of the Exchange, is in the name of an outside corporation, the very existence of which is practically unknown even to the frequenters of Wall Street. This corporation received its charter at Albany in 1863, under the name of The New York Stock Exchange Building Company, and was created for the sole purpose of supplying a medium in which might vest the title to all real property owned by the Exchange. It is the Exchange's legal self, having a recognized standing before the law: an artificial person possessing all the rights of property and the courts; things which to the Stock Exchange, being unchartered, are denied.

Though not organized for profit, the Building Company is a stock company and in form resembles other corporations. It has an authorized capital of $350,000, divided into shares of the par value of $500. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of this stock has been issued and the remainder is held in the treasury. Its assets in January, 1902, were stated by the president to be $2,000,000, but with the accumulation of additional property and the construction of the new building, the real estate held in its name should be worth $5,000,000 and its stock $10,000 a share.

Possibly there is another reason for this dual, me and myself, existence. There are occasions when it is quite desirable to have a legal status, and then there are times when even a stock exchange might wish to melt into airy nothingness, and it may have occurred to some wise head sometime that the institution would be more secure from harassing legislation if it possessed at once a tangible and an intangible form. A body for powers, a spirit for responsibilities; a husband to conduct the business and a wife to hold the property, as it were. Whether any such motive was responsible for this twin arrangement can only be conjectured, but it can hardly be doubted that an immense amount of annoyance has been escaped by it. The country legislator harbors a profound antipathy for stock operations of all kinds, and a State-given charter would have offered a most vulnerable point of attack.

Why it Pays to "List" a Stock

A prominent Treasury official at Washington—Milton E. Alles, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury—in discussing the income of the Exchange, recently asked two very pertinent questions: "Why do the railroad companies consent to pay such enormous fees for the listing of their stocks? Does it add anything to their earnings that their stocks should be traded in on the Exchange?"

The first is a psychological question. It depends on who runs the road. Under the recent reorganization of one of the Western railroads a clause was inserted in the charter empowering the corporation to deal in its own and other securities. In other words, aside from the powers incidental to the railroad business, the directors are permitted to use the funds of the corporation for speculation on the Exchange.

Nothing is deplored more by the better element in the financial world than the all too common practice of directors of corporations using their inside knowledge of company affairs for speculative purposes. For such men, a ready market such as the Stock Exchange affords is necessary to the execution of their schemes, and they are quite willing that the company shall pay the listing charges.

This aspect, though important, should not be exaggerated, however, for at times the listing of a stock does add indirectly to the earnings of a company. As every bond merchant and promoter will testify, one of the most frequent questions asked by prospective purchasers of securities is, "Will it be listed on any exchange?" They will invest much more readily if assured of a quick market, where they can realize on their investments without a sacrifice if necessity demands. And so, as a corollary of this, it may be said that a corporation desiring additional capital can float its securities at a better price if it be known in advance that they will be listed on the Exchange.

And not infrequently underwriters, burdened with stocks that they have guaranteed to float, place them in the hands of investors through their brokers on the floor; and were it not for such facilities for reaching the investing public, worthy enterprises might suffer for want of capital.

But these are minor, yes, almost negligible, features of this institution. The real, bona-fide investor exerts but little influence on the stock market in New York. When interest rates for call loans fluctuate from two and one-half per cent. to one hundred and eighty-six per cent., as they have in the past three years, borrowers are not looking for two per cent. dividends for their profits. And when men pay vast premiums for a controlling interest in a corporation, it is not because they love responsibility or that they delight in the exercise of their executive faculties. The New York Stock Exchange is not primarily a market where people come to buy, but a table around which a nation gathers to play. It is the gaming instinct of the race found expression; the spirit of Raleigh and John Law and Human Nature, unsuppressed despite our Puritanic legislation. And if a coterie of bankers, by means of their long purses, drive the little man from the board, be it known that such are the terms of the wager. It is a game without a limit. The public plays and loses; ultimately, always loses, or the game would stop.

GOLDEN FLEECE

The American Adventures of a Fortune-Hunting Earl

By David Graham Phillips

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Arthur Gordon-Beauvais, Earl of Frothingham, after a most dispiriting reverse in New York, has decided to try his fortunes in Boston. His friend and adviser, Honoria Longview, had urged him to accept Mrs. Staunton's invitation to spend ten days at her house in Beacon Street. Acting on this advice he has there met the wealthy, if not the beautiful, Miss Cecilia Allerton, and the dashing Mrs. "Ridgie," Mrs. Staunton's daughter-in-law, together with a numerous company of the younger and, as Mrs. Staunton mère is inclined to think it, the fast set.

IX—Continued

THE Allertons were traditionally Chinese in their beliefs in the sacredness of the duty of obedience from children to parents, and the duty of despotic control by parents over children.

They lived in one of the old houses in Mount Vernon Street—a traditional New England home for a substantial citizen. There was no ostentation about them—the carriage in which they drove forth was deliberately ancient in style and in appointments, looked modest even among the very modest or, if you choose, "badly turned out," equipages of the Boston "aristocracy." Mr. Allerton's public expenditures—on an art gallery, in partial support of an orchestra and a hospital, in subscriptions to colleges, lectures, charities—were greater by ten thousand a year than his private expenditures. Cecilia had few clothes and, though they were of the very best, and were in good taste and style, they modestly asserted that in the Allerton conception of dress for a lady conspicuousness for inconspicuousness was the prime requirement. Mrs. Ridgie, who often complained that she "hated to live in a town where the best people didn't wear their best clothes every day," called Cecilia a "dowd"; but that was unjust, because Cecilia was most careful in her dress and adapted it admirably to her peculiar charms.

If Honoria had not forewarned Frothingham he would have been deceived by the modesty and frugality of the Allerton establishment. After New York, it seemed to him most un-American for people of great wealth to live thus obscurely. But, properly pointed by Honoria, he soon discovered that Allerton was indeed enormously rich. And he saw that he was favorably inclined to a titled son-in-law. But Cecilia——

MRS. RIDGIE

"There's some mystery about her," he reflected. "She acts as if she were walking in her sleep. But if I could get her I'd do even better than if I'd taken a wife from among those nervous New Yorkers. She's meek and a stay-at-home. She'd not bother me a bit, and she and Evelyn would hit it off like twins. She's not exactly stupid, but she's something just as good. It doesn't matter whether one's wife is stupid or absent-minded—the effect's the same."

But he walked round and round the fence between her personality and the world in vain. He found no low place, no place where he could slip under, no knot-hole or crack even. They went down to Brookline together—he was more puzzled than ever by her attitude toward him that morning. She was less friendly, but also less forbidding. She seemed to him to be awaiting something—he suspected what. He tried to muster courage to put his destiny to the touch on the journey, but when the chances to lead up to it naturally offered, he refused—her expression was too strongly suggestive of a statue.

Instead, he said: "What do you think about—away off there—wherever it is?"

"Think?" She smiled peculiarly. "I don't think—I feel."

"Feel what?"

She looked mocking. "Ah—that's my secret. You would stay where I do if it made you as happy as it makes me."

"You're mysterious," he drawled. "I'm a blockhead at riddles and all that."

But she did not assist him. Mrs. Ridgie herself was waiting for them in a two-seated trap with a pair of exceedingly restless thoroughbreds. Half-way to the house they shied at an automobile and started to run. She got them under control after a struggle and glanced round at Frothingham for approval—he looked calm and seemed unconscious that anything disturbing had happened. "Ridgie told me not to take this pair out," she said. "But I make it a rule never to obey an order from him. In that way we get on beautifully. He loves to give orders—and I never object. I love to disobey orders—and he never objects."

The Ridgie Stauntons lived in what seemed to Frothingham little more than an exalted farmhouse, though it was regarded in that neighborhood as a sinful flaunting of luxury, the worst of Mrs. Ridgie's many sins of ostentation and extravagance. These were endured because she was married to a Staunton and because she was from New York, and therefore could not be expected to know what was vulgar and what well bred. But Frothingham was more comfortable than he had been since the day before he left Lake-in-the-Wood. Mrs. Ridgie would live in free-and-easy fashion—one could smoke all through the house; there were drinks and plenty of good cigars and cigarettes available at all times; and the talk was the unpretentious gossip and slang of fast sets everywhere—intelligent people intelligently frivolous.

Frothingham thought Ridgie Staunton "a harmless sort, a bit loud and noisy," but well meaning and good enough except when he had his occasional brief spasmodic fits of remembering his early training and feeling that his mode of life was all wrong. He was, in his wife's opinion, a perfect husband, except that he hung about so much.

"What do your English women do with their husbands, Lord Frothingham?" she said. "It's a horrible nuisance, having a man—a husband—round all day long with nothing to do. I try to drive Ridgie out to work. But he's a lazy dog. He goes a few steps and then comes slinking back. I'm opposed to a leisure class—of men."

"And you said only yesterday," complained Ridgie, "that Englishmen make better lovers than Americans because they have leisure and the sense of leisure, while Americans are forever looking at watches and clocks."

"Did I? But that was yesterday," retorted his wife. "Besides, I said lovers—not husbands. Give me an English lover, but a hard-working, stay-away-from-home American husband."

"Do you wonder that I watch a wife who talks like that?" said Ridgie cheerfully.

Frothingham and Cecilia rode the next morning. Getting away from the staid old house in Mount Vernon Street seemed to have revived and cheered her. There was color in her cheeks, life in her eyes, and she showed by laughing and talking a great deal that she was interested in the earth for a moment at least. Ridgie had given Frothingham a difficult horse, but as he rode well he succeeded in carrying on a reasonably consecutive conversation with Cecilia. She asked him many questions about country life in England and drew him on to tell her much of his own mode of living. And he ended with, "Altogether, I'd be quite cheerful and happy if I were properly established."

"THE WOMAN'S A FRAUD—A——" HE BEGAN

Cecilia became instantly silent and cold—and again he had the feeling that she was expecting something to happen.

"What the place needs," he went on boldly, "what I need, is—a woman—such a woman as you."

His horse reared, leaped in the air, tried to bolt. It was fully a minute before he got it under control. "Nasty brute," he said, re-settling his eyeglass and turning his face toward her again. He thrilled with hope. "Is there a chance for me?" he asked. "I have not spoken to your father—that isn't the American way, is it? And I sha'n't trouble you with a lot of—of the usual sort of talk—until I know whether it's welcome. You're not the sort of girl a man ventures far with unless he's jolly sure he knows where he's going."

"Thank you," she said simply. "I shall be frank with you. My father wishes me to marry you. If his will were not stronger than mine I shouldn't think of it. It is only fair to tell you why." She was looking at him tranquilly. "I loved a man—loved him well enough to have, where he was concerned, a stronger will than my father. But he died. I love him still. I shall always love him. When my father told me that he wished me to marry you, I asked my lover—and he—said that I ought to obey. He has been urging me to marry—except occasionally—ever since he died."

Frothingham stared at her in utter amazement. "Do you mind——" he began, but again his horse tried to throw him. When he got it under control he saw that she was much amused—apparently at him. She laid her hand on his horse's neck and said, "Please, Stanley, don't!" in a curiously tender tone. The horse instantly became quiet.

"You were saying?" she asked.

"Do you mind if I admit that—— Really, I'm not sure that I heard you aright a few minutes ago."

"You mean when I spoke of talking to Stanley after he was dead?"

"Stanley——" Frothingham regarded her quizzically. "Is this horse named after—him?"

"No—I don't know what the horse's name is. The reason it was so restless was that Stanley was teasing him to make him a little troublesome for you."

Frothingham paled and looked all round nervously.

"The second night after he died," she went on, a far-away look in her eyes, "he came to me in a dream. He assured me that he was happy and that I must be so, too, and that he would always be with me, nearer, in more perfect communion, than if he had remained alive. It was just when Doctor Yarrow was beginning his experiments to establish communication with the other world. Stanley and I had been most interested. And when he appeared to me after his death he explained that he had been able, through the intensity of his love for me, to pierce the barrier and bring his soul and my soul face to face."

Frothingham showed that he was profoundly moved. "When I was a little chap," he said in a low voice, "I ran straight into the ghost of an ancestor of mine—old Guy de Beauvais, who has paced a hall in the east wing of Beauvais House the night before the head of the house dies, for hundreds of years. They laughed me out of it, but, by gad, I knew I saw him—and my grandfather was thrown from his horse and killed the next day. I pretend not to believe in that sort of thing, but I do—all we English do."

"Nothing could be more certain," said Cecilia, radiant at this prompt acceptance of what she expected him to try to laugh her out of. "I have told no one—I shouldn't have told you if it hadn't seemed the only course I could honestly take."

"Can you see him now?" asked Frothingham in an awe-stricken voice.

"No—I see him only in dreams—and sometimes when I go to Mrs. Ramsay. But we talk together at any time. You noticed how he stopped teasing the horse?"

The horse was, indeed, perfectly quiet. Frothingham nodded. His habitual look of vacancy and satire had given place to earnestness and intense interest. "And does he wish you to marry?" he asked.

"Yes—he has said it, and he has written it—in one of the first letters he sent me through Mrs. Ramsay. I've only asked him verbally about you, and he consents and approves. I'll take you to Mrs. Ramsay and we'll get his written permission."

"But why does he consent?" asked Frothingham. "Is there no—no jealousy—there?"

"Jealousy? Impossible! Don't you see, he can look into my soul—he knows that I am his. And all the interest he has in this gross mortal life of mine is that it shall be honorable and that I shall do my duty as a daughter and as a woman."

Frothingham said no more. He was overwhelmed with a sense of the imminence of the unseen world—that world with which his nurses, bred in the legends and superstitions of England, and his similarly trained companions at school, at the university and ever since, had made him familiar. It was a shock, but nothing incredible to him, this revelation of a daily and hourly commerce with that other world of which, he was certain from his own childhood experience, every one had glimpses now and then. From time to time he looked at Cecilia, now returned to her wonted expression of abstraction. She seemed the very person to have such an experience. He was filled with awe of her; he was fascinated by her; he began to feel the first, faint, vague stirrings of a jealousy which he dared not express even to himself lest the spirit eyes of Cecilia's lover should peer into his soul, and see, and punish.

X

AT DINNER that night Willie Kennefick, who was staying in the house, began to tell his experiences in New York—he had just come from a little visit there. "The woman I took in to dinner," said he, "gave me a solar plexus while I was busy with the oysters. She said to me, 'I went to see such a wonderful man to-day. He told me the most astonishing things about my past and future, and he sold me a little wax image that I'm going to burn for my gout.' 'What!' said I. 'For my gout,' said she. 'I have to burn it slowly, and when it's consumed my gout will be gone. I got it so cheap! Only twenty-five dollars.'"

"And what did you say, Willie?" asked Mrs. Thayer.

"I said, 'Cheap? It was a shame to cheat the poor devil in that fashion.' And she said, 'Wasn't it a bargain? He wanted a hundred, but I brought him down.'"

"You must have been keeping queer company in New York," said Henrietta Gillett.

"Not at all. It was at Mrs. Baudeleigh's house, and the woman—well, her husband's one of the biggest lawyers in New York. But, then, that's no worse than the astrology some of us here have gone daft over."

"Oh—astrology—that's a different matter," objected Mrs. Thayer. "You evidently haven't looked into it. That is a science—not at all the same as palmistry and spiritualism and those frauds."

Cecilia smiled—the amused, pitying smile of wisdom in the presence of ludicrous ignorance—and looked at Frothingham. He returned her look—pleased to have a secret, and such an intimate secret, in common with her. "But don't you think you're a little rash, Mrs. Thayer?" he drawled. "You certainly believe in ghosts, now, don't you?"

Miss Gillett's handsome, high-bred face expressed astonishment. "Do you?" she asked, before Mrs. Thayer could answer him.

"We can't doubt it over on our side. We've too much evidence of it. And—I was listening to an old chap from Cambridge—your Cambridge—very clever old fellow, I thought—Yarrow, wasn't it? Yes, Yarrow."

"Yarrow!" Miss Gillett's eyes flashed scorn. "He's a disgrace to New England. We pride ourselves on having the culture of Emerson and the other great men of the past. What would they think of us if they could look in on us with our Yarrows and our Gonga Sahds and our Mrs. Ramsays? All the sensible people in the country must be laughing at us. Pardon me, Lord Frothingham—I'm very indignant at what I regard as superstitions and impostors. It's only my view."

"Not at all, not at all," said Frothingham with an uneasy glance at Cecilia's angry face. "I'm not one of those who wish all to believe alike. What the deuce should we do if we hadn't each other's opinions to laugh at?"

"You're such an ardent disciple," continued Miss Gillett, "you ought to go to Yarrow's Mrs. Ramsay. She'll put you in communication with spirits, as many as you like, or rather as many as you care to pay for. I think she gets ten a ghost—twenty for letters."

The discussion was raging hotly round the table, all but two of the men and all but four of the women deriding astrology, palmistry, Buddhism, spiritualism; and the respective devotees of these cults deriding each the others. "Cut it out," said Mrs. Ridgie finally. "We'll have 'rough house' here the first thing you know."

Every one laughed. They liked slang, and Mrs. Ridgie's was the boldest and quaintest. When the men and women were separated, "metaphysics" was again attempted by both. But the men who did not believe summarily laughed it down in the smoking-room. "Those fads are all well enough for the women," said Kennefick. "They've got to do something to pass the time, and they won't do anything serious, or, if they do, they make a joke of it. But our men, Lord Frothingham"—he was addressing himself to the Earl, whose spiritualistic views he had not heard and did not suspect — "are too busy for such nonsense."

"That's a libel on the women," said Thayer — his fad was a militant socialism that had a kindly eye for a red flag. "It's only women of the so-called fashionable class that go in for such silliness. The great mass of American women have something better to do."

"That's a libel on the women of the better class," retorted Kennefick. "Precious few of them are so silly."

"If it isn't that it's something else equally idle," said Thayer. Except Frothingham he was the best-dressed man in the room. "I've no time for idlers."

"Why don't you give your money away and shoulder a pick?" asked Kennefick teasingly.

"I'm not fit even to wield a pick" — Thayer was one of the ablest lawyers in Massachusetts — "and I'd give my money away if I could without doing more harm than good. There are two kinds of parasites — the plutocrats and the paupers. I'm 'agin' 'em both. And, as for spiritualism, I don't think we know enough about the relations of mind and matter to dogmatize as you fellows have been doing."

Kennefick winked at Frothingham as if saying: "Another proof that Thayer's a crank."

When Frothingham was beside Cecilia in the drawing-room she said: "Would you like to go to Mrs. Ramsay?"

"Yes — will you take me?" he replied.

"I'll write to-night making an appointment for Wednesday."

He was liking her immensely now, and, while he believed — not nearly so vividly as at first — in her connections with the other world, he felt growing confidence that they would rapidly fade before reawakening interest in this world. Meanwhile, he reasoned, his cue was to ingratiate himself by sympathizing with her and encouraging her to closer and closer confidence. "It's only a step from best friend to lover," he said to himself. And he made admirable use of the two days between her tentative acceptance of him and their visit to Mrs. Ramsay. He was justly proud of his manner toward her — a little of the brother, a great deal of the best friend, the tenderness and sympathy of the lover, yet nothing that could alarm her.

Mrs. Ramsay lived in a little old brick cottage in a quiet street near Franklin Park. In the two days Frothingham had become somewhat better acquainted with Henrietta Gillett and had a strong admiration for her intelligence. As he and Cecilia entered the dark little parlor he remembered what Henrietta had said about Mrs. Ramsay and was on guard. The first impression he received was of a perfume, unmistakably of the heaviest, most suspicious Oriental kind. "Gad!" he said to himself, "that scent doesn't suggest spirits. It smells tremendously of the world, the flesh and the devil, especially the devil."

As his eyes became accustomed to the faint light he discovered the radiating centre of this odor — a small blackish woman of forty or thereabouts, with keen, shifty black eyes and a long face as hard and fleshless from the cheekbones down as from the cheekbones up. The mouth was wide and cold and cruel. She was dressed in a loose black woolen wrapper, tight at the wrists, and her scanty black hair was in a careless, oily coil low on the back of her head. Her eyelids lifted languidly and she gave Cecilia her hand — a pretty hand, slender and sensitive.

"Good-morning, my dear," she said. "This is the Earl of Frothingham, is it not?"

At this both Cecilia and Frothingham started — Cecilia because it was another and impressive evidence of Mrs. Ramsay's power; Frothingham because he knew that voice so well. His knees weakened and he looked at Mrs. Ramsay.

But she was not looking at him. She was saying to Cecilia: "Doctor Yarrow was here two hours — I am so exhausted!"

"Perhaps we would better come to-morrow?" said Cecilia, appeal, apology and disappointment in her voice.

"No — no," replied Mrs. Ramsay wearily. "Doctor Yarrow tells me he has never known me to be so thoroughly under control as to-day. And" — she smiled faintly at Cecilia — "you know I would do anything for you."

"You have done — everything for me," said Cecilia, and her tone of humble, even deferential, gratitude filled Frothingham with pity and disgust. He was staring stolidly at Mrs. Ramsay, but if the room had been lighter his changed color and white lips might have been noted. Cecilia seated herself, and Frothingham gladly sat also where he could see Mrs. Ramsay's face without her seeing him unless she turned her head uncomfortably.

She rang a small, silver bell on the table at her elbow. A girl answered. "The light, please," said Mrs. Ramsay.

The girl went away and returned in a moment with a lamp whose strong flame was completely and curiously shielded by a metal sphere except at one point underneath. When it was set upon the table it threw a powerful light in a flood upon a part of the surface of the table about six inches square. The girl went to the windows and drew the heavy curtains across them. It was now impossible to see anything in the room except that small disk of intense light. In it presently appeared the slender, sensitive right hand of Mrs. Ramsay — it seemed to end at the wrist in nothingness. It laid upon the brightness a pad of white scribbling paper and a thick pencil with the heavy lead slightly rounded at the end; then it vanished. There was a long silence — Frothingham was sure he could hear Cecilia's faint breathing. His own breath hardly came at all and his heart was beating crazily. He stared at those inanimate objects in the circle of dazzling light until his brain whirled.

"IS THIS HORSE NAMED AFTER—HIM?"

A long sigh, apparently from Mrs. Ramsay, as if she were sinking into a deathlike sleep; a quick catching of the breath from the direction of Cecilia. He heard her move her chair to the light and then in it appeared her hand — long and narrow, looking waxen white, its nails, beautifully rounded, the most delicate blush of pink. It took the pencil and moved across the paper. Frothingham bent forward — she had written large, and he could easily read:

> Dearest!

Her hand disappeared and again there was only the pad, the pencil and the heart-call into the infinite — "Dearest!"

A long pause, then the weird, severed hand — Frothingham could not associate it with Mrs. Ramsay — crawled haltingly into the light, hovered over the pencil, took it, began to make its blunt point scrawl along the paper — a loose, shaky handwriting. With the hair on the back of his neck trembling to rise, Frothingham read:

> My wife — I am glad you have come, though you bring another with you to profane our holy secret.

In the darkness a sharp exclamation from Cecilia, then a sound like a sob. The hand ceased to write, dropped the pencil, vanished instantly. In the light appeared Cecilia's hand, trembling, its veins standing up, blue and pulsing — Frothingham was amazed that a hand by itself could express so much; it was as perfect a mirror of her feelings as her face would have been. She wrote eagerly:

> But, dearest, you told me only this morning that he might, should, see all.

Her hand lifted the sheet, now filled with writing, laid it beside the pad, then disappeared. Again there was a long silence, and again the mysterious hand crawled out of the darkness, loosely held the pencil and wrote slowly, staggeringly, faintly:

> No, I have not spoken to you, seen you, since he came into your life — It has been hard for me to push my way through to-day — There is a barrier between us — You have been deceived — Can it be that you — but no, I trust my wife ——

The hand paused. "Oh! Oh!" sobbed Cecilia. The hand was moving again:

> My friends here tell me that you are going away across the sea with an English fortune-hunter — with him. You have been cruel enough to bring him here to our bridal chamber — Oh, Cecilia ——

The end of the sheet had been reached, but the hand wrote on for a few seconds, making vague markings in space, then vanished, dropping the pencil with a noise that in the strained silence sounded like a crash, and made both Cecilia and Frothingham leap in their chairs. After a moment Cecilia's trembling, eager, pathetic hands lifted off the filled sheet and withdrew. But the hand did not return. After a long wait her right hand — it seemed bloodless now — appeared once more upon the paper and wrote:

> I have been deceived. I love only you. I thought I was obeying you. Speak to me, dearest. You see into my heart. Speak to me. Do not leave me alone.

Her hand laid the sheet upon the other filled sheets and withdrew from that neutral ground of dazzling light between the two great mystery lands. Immediately the other hand darted into the light, caught the pencil and scrawled in great tottering letters:

> Yes, yes — but I cannot until he has gone far from you — Then come again — Good b ——

The hand vanished and there was a moan from the darkness that enveloped the medium — a moan that ended in a

The Man Who Resigned

A MERCHANT pointed out to a new stenographer the other day several serious and wholly inexcusable mistakes which he had made. The stenographer colored at the first word of the lecture and waited impatiently—and without listening—until it was ended. Then he resigned.

"Why do you resign?" asked the merchant.

"Because I won't let any man take advantage of his power as an employer and speak harshly to me."

"What did I say?" asked the merchant.

"I don't know just what it was. I only know you were jumping on me about my work."

"Why did you leave the position you had before you came to us?" asked the merchant.

"For the same reason that I'm leaving here. The man thought he could jump on me just because I was an employee."

"But didn't you make any mistakes? Was your work perfect?"

"Of course I made mistakes. Nobody is perfect."

"Then you don't permit any one to speak to you of your mistakes?"

"I don't think harshness is the way to help a man to get along."

"And you regard any form of reproof as harshness?"

The stenographer was silent.

"The only talk about your work that you will listen to is praise?"

The stenographer was silent.

"You can't see that praise is not of the slightest value to you, that criticism is invaluable?"

The stenographer was silent.

"You can't see that by speaking to you of your mistakes I was showing myself to be your friend; that if I had passed over your mistakes I should have been doing you an injury?"

The stenographer was silent.

"Don't you think you'd better give me another trial?" asked the merchant.

"Yes," said the stenographer. But he resigned again within a week and was let go.

At first blush every employee who reads this story will scoff at this stenographer as a fool, as a horrible and unusual example of inordinate vanity. But—isn't the story worth thinking about? Is this stenographer so unusual, after all? Is such vanity rare, or is it only his courage of it that is rare?

It may have been by ambition that the angels fell. It is by self-excuse that men fall.

A very great man once said that no man had ever yet lifted his head so much as an inch above the mass of his fellows who had not the power of self-criticism—the ability to see his own faults either on his own initiative or when some friend or foe pointed them out. The smaller kinds of superior men close their ears against their enemies, but learn when their friends are venturesome enough to criticise them. The larger kinds of superior men learn much from the frankness of friends, more from the fierce and scorching criticism of their unintentionally friendly foes. And on the day that a man ceases to be capable of self-criticism, ceases to be tolerant and eager for criticism from without, on that day his undoing begins.

Again and again you hear it said of a man, "He has reached his limit." What does that mean? In every case close study of the man and his career will show that he has reached that stage at which self-exaltation has succeeded in silencing self-criticism.

Study the man who works beside you. Study the man who was promoted the first of the year. Study the man who wasn't—especially if he happens to be yourself. This is not a world of chance, but of causation. There was a "why" for the one man's promotion, another "why" for the other man's dismissal or failure to advance.

Scratch an anarchist, or a social malcontent of almost any kind, and you will find a personification of self-esteem, a furious hater of criticism. Men used to blame the gods for their shortcomings; then it was the devil and his imps; now it is the social system. And we find competition, which is life's criticism upon one's self and one's acts, erected into a satanic spirit; and all the failures and all who love to indulge the supercilious and contemptuous emotion of patronizing pity are crying out for "mutual aid." As if there could be any higher, any more effective "mutual aid" than the searching, convincing, correcting criticism of competition.

What the world most needs is not alms or crutches, but more friendly criticism, more self-criticism.

The place to begin to correct the evils in the social system is with the one member of it who is wholly under your control. Other corrections can wait. That one can't.

A Billion-Dollar Labor Trust

THE new year opened with indications of a general desire on the part of capitalists in control of the industries of the country to take their employees into partnership. The offers of several great corporations, headed by the Steel Trust, to allot stock to their workmen, to be paid for on the installment plan, were most liberal, as far as concerned the terms on which the investments actually provided for were to be made. The only possible criticism was that these investments were limited to such a small amount of stock that the interest of the workmen in the companies could never become really substantial.

But that is a matter entirely under the control of the men themselves. They are not compelled to restrict themselves to the limits fixed in the profit-sharing plans. There is an institution through which they can invest as heavily in the shares of the corporations that employ them as their savings permit. It is called the stock market. There are many philanthropists, known as brokers, any one of whom, on receipt of a hundred dollars, will buy ten shares of any stock the purchaser may designate and give him time to pay the balance.

If the employees of the Steel Trust really want to acquire a substantial interest in the business that employs them, the way is open. They can get not only such an interest, but absolute control. The preferred stock of that corporation has sold below 80 and the common stock below 30. It would be a liberal estimate, then, to put the prices the workmen might have to pay at 90 and 40 respectively. At these rates, the $510,314,100 of preferred stock would be worth $459,132,690, and a majority of it $229,566,435. The $508,495,200 of common stock would be worth $203,398,080, and a majority of it $101,699,080. Thus a controlling interest in the United States Steel Corporation could be bought for $331,265,515.

The workmen in the steel trade are well paid. Probably they would not find it a great hardship to lay aside, on an average, four dollars a week apiece, or $200 a year. That amount, invested by each of 168,000 men, would aggregate $33,600,000 a year, and would give the workers complete control of the Steel Corporation in ten years. Then they could elect their own directors, and, if they chose, substitute the president of their union for Mr. Schwab.

The Eclipse of Silver

THE disappearance of the silver question from politics no longer appears mysterious in the light of the statistics of production of the precious metals furnished by the Director of the Mints. It appears that in the calendar year 1902 the mines of Nevada turned out $2,120,000 in silver and $3,514,212 in gold. The original Silver State is now a Golden State. A few years ago it appeared a safe prediction that, if the fortunes of the white metal ever became desperate, Senators Jones and Stewart would be seen looming above the wreck like Ney on the retreat from Moscow.

"Marshal, where is the rear-guard?"

"I am the rear-guard."

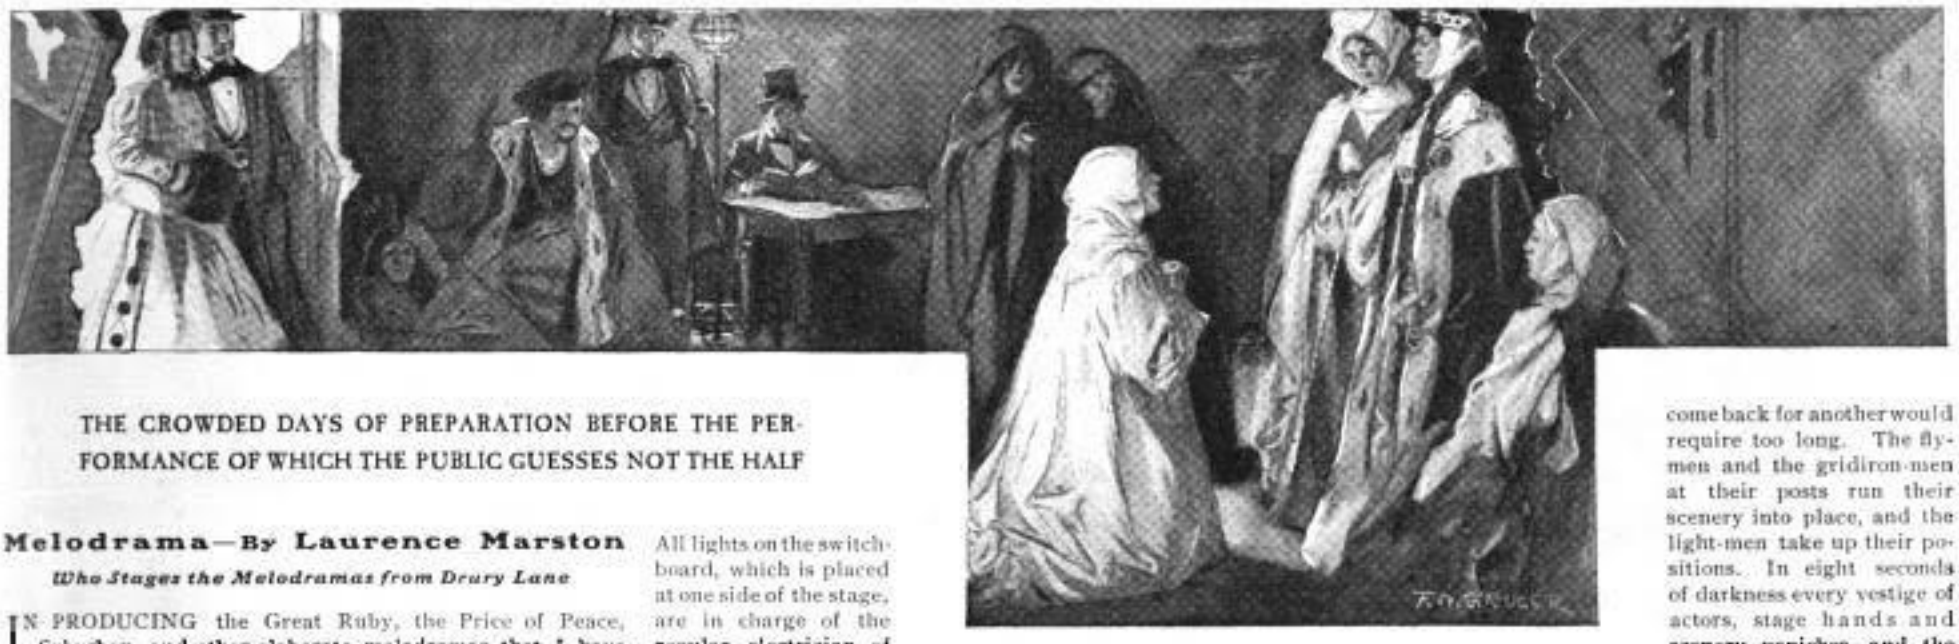
Jones and Stewart show no inclination to be the rear-guard on this occasion. With their State producing more gold than silver they are very sensibly occupying comfortable quarters near the head of the procession. Colorado used to be Nevada's twin star in the silver firmament. Six years ago "goldbugs" were as scarce there as bears in Mississippi. You might have tramped with your gun from the Kansas line to the Utah Desert without getting a shot at one. Now Colorado digs out $27,502,429 in gold to $9,085,714 in silver. She is by far the greatest gold-producing State in the Union. And by a coincidence the gold party won at the late election.

California's output of the precious metals is almost entirely gold—$17,124,941 to $480,793 in silver. Arizona and New Mexico produce more than twice as much gold as silver. The production of South Dakota is almost exclusively gold. Wyoming, which some ill-informed people have classed with the silver-mining States, turned out only $2756 worth of silver last year. The only States that produced any substantial excess of silver over gold were Idaho, Montana and Utah, and even in these the gold furnished a very respectable proportion of the total output.

For the United States as a whole the product was $80,853,070 in gold and $31,040,025 in silver. The value of our silver harvest was less than one-thirtieth that of the corn crop and a little over a twentieth of that of our hay. Both the precious metals together are insignificant compared with any of the principal farm crops. It may be taken for granted, therefore, that any financial policy we may adopt will be chosen on its merits and not under pressure from any class of miners.

A Representative American

IN THE death of Abram S. Hewitt the country has lost a statesman who in more than one national crisis has rendered her services of inestimable value; New York a citizen who to the very last was not afraid to raise his voice in behalf of truth and justice—ofttimes in defiance of popular clamor and at the risk of personal abuse; and the great cause of public benevolence one of its most conscientious, intelligent and powerful administrators.



So wide, indeed, was the field of his effort that it is not easy to say in what particular capacity he rendered the greatest service to his fellow-men, but it is not unlikely that his prompt and substantial aid in the important work of purchasing arms abroad and making them in this country at the outbreak of the Civil War will always be regarded as his chief claim to the gratitude of his fellow-countrymen. And in this connection it is worthy of note that at the time of his selection by President Lincoln for those difficult and delicate negotiations with the English gunmakers, Mr. Hewitt, because of his affiliation with the Democratic party, was openly accused in the North of "copperheadism"; just as in recent months he was held up to popular execration as the enemy of the working-classes, despite the fact that he had devoted a great part of his life and an immense amount of his private fortune to the amelioration of their condition.

Apart from the lofty example which he set to a generation which has suffered much from the specious reasoning of false prophets, Mr. Hewitt rendered his most conspicuous services to the city in which he lived in his capacity of administrator of the great work of philanthropy and education founded nearly half a century ago by Peter Cooper. New York may well be grateful to Mr. Cooper, whose broadminded benevolence is immortalized in the poor man's university which bears his name, but to Mr. Hewitt is due the extraordinary growth of that institution in endowment, in scope of usefulness, and in the influence that have marked its progress during the past quarter of a century. At the time of Mr. Cooper's death the income of Cooper Union was so small that it was found necessary to rent out the greater part of the building as stores and business offices. Since that time the number of the tenants has been diminished one by one and the number of classes increased, until a short time before Mr. Hewitt's death he notified the very last of these tenants—who had also been the first to establish himself in the building—that his lease could not be renewed.

In summing up the life work, character and influence of this most distinguished New Yorker, it may be said of him—and of very few other citizens of his wealth and social standing—that he never held himself aloof from his fellows, but was of the bone and sinew of the city, thoroughly in sympathy with all schemes of education and beneficence, in personal touch with citizens of every class, and keenly appreciative of whatever good things the town had to offer.

PUTTING ON THE PLAY

THE CROWDED DAYS OF PREPARATION BEFORE THE PERFORMANCE OF WHICH THE PUBLIC GUESSES NOT THE HALF

Melodrama—By Laurence Marston

Who Stages the Melodramas from Drury Lane

IN PRODUCING the Great Ruby, the Price of Peace, Suburban, and other elaborate melodramas that I have staged, three hundred people, a vast deal of stage settings, properties, and every conceivable variety of stage lighting have to be prepared and rehearsed until all chance of hitch or mishap is impossible. In handling this mass of actors, auxiliaries, electricians, stage hands, scenery and properties from five to eight seconds is allowed for a change of scene which must be made in the dark. Every actor and auxiliary must consequently know his place, every scene-shifter his special piece of scenery, every electrician his particular light, and each individual must move in a way to avoid the slightest confusion to any one else engaged. All this requires a drill, military in precision, and every detail must be prepared with absolute accuracy.

MR. LAURENCE MARSTON

When a manager thinks favorably of a play he sends for his stage manager, of whom he requires a written opinion. Personally, I have found that the first reading is the best upon which to base a decision, for I then see the play as the audience will view it. In later study and planning of effects enthusiasm enters in too strongly to allow the same clear, dispassionate view. After this first reading comes the analyzing, the seeking for defects, and the proper hinging of the story. The final judgment rests, of course, with the manager.

Once a play is accepted the first thing is to make out a ground plan of the scenery from the manuscript as the scenario of the story suggests. The scene painters are sent for, and after a talk they set about their models. No one painter is given the contract for all; in Suburban, for instance, five different studios were engaged on the settings. They carry out the ideas in accordance with the time and place of action, when the stage manager is again required to make a study of the models to see whether they will act—that is, that every door, window and bank is in its proper place required by the action of the piece, and no obstruction presented.

While the scenery is being painted the property-men make designs for the interior furnishings—a library, drawing-room, what the requirement may be. Some of these articles are bought outright; others are let out to be manufactured. But in this branch distinctions are closely drawn. For instance, a set bank is a property, and a tree that is let down from the fly gallery, and the foliage of which is carried out in the general setting, is scenery. No scene-shifter is allowed to touch a property, no property-man is allowed to touch the scenery; each is in his own department by a law established by the Unions. In the same manner the stage electricians keep solely to their own branch.

Lighting the stage has become in a measure an art. When a scene is nearing completion I say to the artist: "You know how you are painting this and your color scheme; tell me your idea of lighting it?"

He gives his opinion on the subject, I advance mine, and after a long conference the matter is finally settled. In Suburban, for instance, twenty-three electricians are required. All lights on the switchboard, which is placed at one side of the stage, are in charge of the regular electrician of the theatre. Another man has the direction of the extra electricians. The latter use electric calciums divided into two kinds of lights, known technically as open box and lense or spot-lights. The first of these can be focused and directed to a special point; the second, as its name implies, is to counteract the effect of other lights, to obviate shadows, and so forth, as may be required. These lights are placed against the wall, on the fly-bridges above the stage, in the gallery—in fact, at any point where they may prove of artistic use. To accomplish this every scene is gone through and a light plot is made and rehearsed, each assistant receiving his part from the head electrician, and each being held responsible for his particular light. Meanwhile, the actors have been engaged, and the stage manager has gone through the manuscript of the piece with its author. Of course, every author has an idea that all his words are gems, and are so pertinent to the development of the story that to eliminate one will cause the whole structure to fall. I don't think so. In this reading I point out such things as seem to retard the action, for I have discovered that almost any climax can be killed by too many words. The wise plan is to get to a climax with as few words as possible.

This done, the company is called for rehearsal. I never read the play through on such first occasions, for experience has taught me that it is a day lost, as the actors listen only to their own parts.

At the very first meeting I make it a practice to define a character as to dress, make up, and the author's ideas on the subject. Aside from this I make it a rule to give to the interpreting artists leeway in characterization in order to get the advantage of the individuality of both—for individuality is one of the chief essentials in an actor.

Day by day as we rehearse we keep on developing the characters to the best possible advantage in action, called in stage parlance "business."

When I get the principals into pretty good shape, the auxiliaries, who have been drilled separately, are brought together with them in rehearsal.

In Suburban seventy-six women, two hundred men and thirty boys are required, and in addition a great many other people are needed to handle the number of scenes which demand a quick change made in the dark. These additional people comprise forty stage hands, twenty property-men and twenty-three electricians. Each of these three hundred and eighty-nine people, and sixteen jockeys with their horses besides, must be got to a certain place in a certain way in the dark, and there is only one right way to do it.

In one scene in Suburban there are thirty set pieces, twelve hanging pieces, twenty-four tables, forty-eight chairs, seventy-six women and two hundred men. In the gridiron above the stage all the hanging stuff hangs, and there are two fly-galleries. The stage hands move the set stuff, the property people the properties, and the electricians the lights. In making the change from this scene to the succeeding one eight seconds are required. The seventy-six women and two hundred men separate, the women to one side, the men to the other, as they dress on opposite sides of the theatre, and move down stage. This leaves the rear of the stage free to the property-men, carpenters and stage hands; and of these each one grabs his piece and runs—to take one piece and come back for another would require too long. The fly-men and the gridiron-men at their posts run their scenery into place, and the light-men take up their positions. In eight seconds of darkness every vestige of actors, stage hands and scenery vanishes, and the next set is dropped into position, with those engaged in the scene properly grouped.

One scene in Suburban represents the race-track at Sheepshead Bay, an exact reproduction of the original. On the back-drop thirty-five thousand people are painted. The front of the stage is left free for the sixteen running horses. Between this and the back-drop which represents the grand-stand are grouped three hundred and six actors and auxiliaries, and back of them eight rows of set pieces, figures of people cut out of wood and painted. The first row of these is six feet tall, the second five, and so on, graduated down. Each of the people in the real scene flutters a handkerchief or holds a parasol. To carry out the idea of animation and life, handkerchiefs from the regulation size to bits of muslin half an inch square are pinned to the hands of the wooden figures and those in the great painted scene back of them. Electric fans are set in motion, and the squares of muslin flutter and wave under the lights. Past this cheering, animated mass the horses are rushed on a run. Not a principal has a line in the scene, which is enacted entirely by the auxiliaries. Cheering, waving, calling out the progress of the horses in the race, which they are supposed to see on the off side of the track, out of sight of the audience, the thrilling effect is splendidly kept up. Meanwhile, the animals are led behind the scenes to the opposite side of the stage. Then with a dash the horses rush in front of the footlights before cheering, handkerchief-waving masses, completing a tremendous effect.

The Author's Part—By Clyde Fitch

Who Stages All His Own Plays

IN WRITING a play the entire action presents itself to me as I work, and I seldom find it necessary to make changes in it later. The action of each character grows in my mind with the development of the dialogue. Sometimes a player will say to me, "I would like to cross the stage at this certain point." But that very contingency has been provided for a moment later, and I will reason out the situation with him. Of course, a change is made if it appears wiser, but this seldom happens, and for the reason, I think, that each character has so graphically played out his or her part to me as their words sprang into my mind.

MR. CLYDE FITCH

I always give a reading of the entire play to the company. In this reading I endeavor to give a strong suggestion of what I expect each character to be. The working out of that suggestion rests, of course, in large degree, with the individual imagination of the player. No man in staging a play can do more than strongly suggest, explain and illustrate; then the individuality, the intuition and imagination of the player must take up and complete the task. Above all, in the acting of a modern play, naturalness is absolutely essential; it is the first quality necessary to the actor, and must govern the very best of his gifts—imagination.

In the matter of stage-setting, I oversee everything. In this way only can I approximate the effects which I desire.

The rehearsals usually last four weeks or thereabouts, and, as a rule, the first public performance does not suggest change.

From the day a piece is put into rehearsal every moment is fully occupied with thoughts of it—planning of scenic effects, and study with each individual player engaged in it. Some days a single act is taken over, and again, on others, the play is gone through from end to end. Aside from these general rehearsals are the private ones, sometimes lasting for hours, given to the actors individually, that every point and detail may be developed to the fullest.

To see a play lived out as I see it in its writing and preparation for performance leaves no moment for anything else but the piece in hand, and once produced there is no time left for any pleasure but the writing of another.

Staging Grand Opera

By William Parry

For Twenty-five Years Stage Manager at Covent Garden, London, and at the Academy of Music and Metropolitan Opera House, New York

THE staging of grand opera productions twenty-five years ago and the elaborate scale on which works are presented to-day make a strange comparison. There is decided humor in the contrast, too. When Bizet's Pêcheur de Perles was brought out at Covent Garden under Colonel Mapleson's management I was allowed just one hundred and twenty pounds ($600) for scenery, properties and costumes. The scene painter touched up a collection of old stuff, and I bought a lot of Turkish toweling for costumes. The next morning after the first presentation the London Telegraph pronounced it "a most gorgeous production," and wondered at Mapleson's lavish generosity.

When Mr. Grau produced Salammbo at the Metropolitan Opera House two seasons back thirty thousand dollars was expended on scenery and accessories, and the opera had only a few performances.

In the prime of Madame Adelina Patti's triumphs Colonel Mapleson presented La Gazza Ladra at the Academy of Music in New York. He was in a saving mood in those days, and we used the old stock scenery for the production. A piece of wire was needed on which the magpie was to float down and steal a spoon off a table, an episode on which the whole plot hinged.

"Use string," said the Colonel.

We did. On the night of the first performance the string broke, and the improvised bird fell with a thump on the boards. But the mishap made small odds, for Madame Patti had so many encores in this particular scene that the man who had been concealed under the table cover to fasten the spoon to the thieving bird fell asleep.

On the other hand, in this matter of contrast, when Mr. Grau produced Saint-Saen's Samson and Delilah at the Metropolitan the breaking columns in the temple alone cost three thousand dollars. They were made of cane and papier-maché, with wires inside, so that when they broke apart they would not fall into the orchestra.

In staging a grand opera, the first thing done is to have made cardboard models of each scene complete on the scale of half an inch to the foot. From these models the scene painters and carpenters go to work. The list of properties, of which careful sketches have previously been prepared, goes to the property-man. Water-color drawings of the costumes are turned over to the head costumer, the materials having previously been selected.

The principal women singers have their costumes prepared long in advance, generally by celebrated Parisian dressmakers. The planning of these gowns and the fitting of them require weeks, while the average cost is a thousand dollars apiece.

Every spare moment of the stage manager is given to overseeing the progress of the multiplicity of details under his direction. Meanwhile, the regular routine of almost nightly performance is in progress.

In America the question of rehearsals of a new opera is a grievous one, so little time being allowed in this all-important branch of preparation. At Baireuth, where the Wagnerian music drama is mounted in its greatest perfection, a whole year is given to preparation, for as soon as one Festival series is done they begin to arrange for the next. At any of the Broadway playhouses in giving a musical comedy, with the conventional village girl and swain as central figures, six weeks are allowed for rehearsal, while abroad in the mere item of scene shifting and stage lighting at least six rehearsals are held. In staging a grand opera in America we think ourselves exceedingly fortunate if we get one rehearsal in this latter branch, while the actual time allowed for preparing the singers on the stage for their arduous undertaking is but two weeks.

A NEW ERA IN ENGINEERING EDUCATION

By Forrest Crissey

A NEW era has just been begun in the great modern movement of giving instruction by mail: the co-operation of the resident technical school with the correspondence school "to make the work of correspondence co-ordinate with the work of the shops and laboratories." This departure is so significant that it will always stand out conspicuously in the history of teaching by correspondence.

The correspondence school is so distinctively new as a factor in popular education that this latest and most important phase of its development comes as a surprise to the public. The place of the correspondence school in popular education is now generally recognized. After years of experience, the true founder of correspondence teaching in America, President Harper, of the University of Chicago, goes so far as to say: "The work done by correspondence is even better than that done in the class room. Students who come to us after a year of such work are better prepared than those who have taken it with us in the class room. The correspondence student does all the work himself; he does it in writing, and does 20 times as much reciting as he would in a class of 20 people. He works out the difficulties by himself, and the results stay by him."

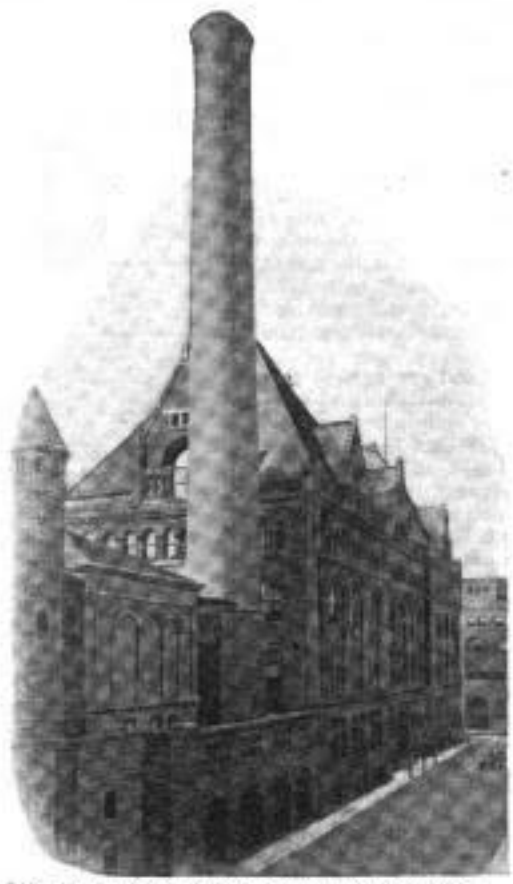
This co-operation, therefore, of the resident technical school with the correspondence school is a matter of general moment to the entire educational interests of the country, and especially is it of vital interest to every person ambitious to win a resident technical school degree but who is without the means of spending the entire four years in class room work. Then, too, it offers parents who have not the means to send their children to college an opportunity to give them the benefit of higher education at a moderate cost under men of acknowledged educational standing. It brings, through the instructor, the benefits of a magnificently equipped resident engineering school, with all its costly laboratories, shops and libraries and its modern methods of teaching, to the humble home on the farm, in the mountain or in the village. How many parents, worn out with the life struggle, are obliged to send their children out into the world handicapped by inadequate early training. To such homes, and to the thousands of earnest, ambitious people in every walk of life who are eager to make their leisure contribute to their intellectual growth, correspondence instruction, under resident school supervision, will prove an inestimable blessing.

Admittedly, there have always been three weak spots in the correspondence system of instruction: a lack of genuine "educational spirit" on the part of the teaching corps: a sense of solitary struggle on the part of the student; the impossibility of directly applying the work done by correspondence toward a course in a resident technical school.

CORNER INSTRUCTION DEPARTMENT, AMERICAN SCHOOL OF CORRESPONDENCE

In its recent arrangement with the management of Armour Institute of Technology, Chicago, the American School of Correspondence, formerly of Boston, has overcome the three traditional defects of the correspondence methods. It has given the correspondence school a FACULTY instead of an office force, and has supplanted the commercial spirit with the academic spirit; it has given the solitary student in the veldt of the Transvaal and the busy clerk in Wall Street the feeling of brotherhood and association that in the resident school voices itself in a class yell; it has placed within the grasp of aroused ambition the possibility of a personal resident course in a great technical school, and that without the sacrifice of a single hour of study under the "solitary candle."



This work of fusing into the far-reaching mechanism of the correspondence system the true educational spirit has not been done in a tentative or half-hearted manner in this initial instance. Members of the Faculty of Armour Institute of Technology constitute the directing Faculty of the American School of Correspondence. The correspondence student thus works under the supervision of the very men who preside over the laboratories and teach the regular classes at Armour Institute. This means correspondence instruction in its best sense.

President Gunsaulus, of the Institute, defines the purpose of the arrangement in these significant words:

"The aim is to make the work of correspondence co-ordinate with the work of the shops and laboratories. The work done by the students by correspondence in accordance with this standard will therefore be duly accepted and credited at Armour Institute of Technology when students desire to complete their course by actual residence here. We co-operate to conduct this educational enterprise by correspondence in the hope that wage-earners and aspiring students of all ages may have the results of the latest and completest laboratory work and experimentation in the Armour Institute of Technology. For the reason that all examination papers will be reviewed and corrected by members of the Faculty of the Armour Institute of Technology, full credit, as above stated, will be given here for work done, according to this arrangement with the American School of Correspondence."

Now a word on the value of the correspondence system in general: Already the three weak points have been touched; it has threescore of strong ones. Some of them are:

The correspondence school is the People's University, from which neither occupation, age nor poverty can shut out the ambitious. Only indifference and indolence can bar the aspiring from its benefits. Entrance into the correspondence school means personal initiative—spontaneous, voluntary expenditure of individual energy, often at the cost of sharp personal sacrifice, in order to keep pace with the march of industrial progress. This explains why the average correspondence student has the right sort of timber. He is not "sent to school"; he brings the school to himself because he wants it, and he appreciates it because he feels the need of it.

MAIN BUILDING, ARMOUR INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

The biggest capital a young man has to invest is his spare time and the use he makes of it largely determines both his moral and commercial success. No agency for the utilization of spare moments approaches the great modern movement of correspondence instruction. A clearing house of individual adaptability, a corrector of misfit vocations, a reclaimer of lost educational opportunities—this is exactly what a correspondence school, affiliated with a resident school, is. It gives the man of mature years a chance to catch his "second wind" in life, to grip another educational "life-line" and to show practical repentance for "wasted opportunity."

The man who is looking for a corrected examination paper by tomorrow's mail is more alive and has a greater stake in life than the man who is simply waiting for pay day and whose chief interest is to hold his job. And the man with the examination paper in mind climbs higher on the pay roll and is a better patriot because he has a vested interest in the United States mails and what they bring him from the correspondence school.

Only the sons of the wealthy can afford the luxury of a "private tutor" in their school work; every correspondence student has a "private tutor," and those of the American School have the help and direction of the professors of a great technical school.

Correspondence education does not entail costly sacrifices upon "the folks at home."

Sometimes a college education is too dearly paid for in this way. It never happens in correspondence work, for the student earns while he learns, and the main sacrifice involved is that of his own leisure. The correspondence student generally swings hammers instead of Indian clubs, does his gymnastics under the eye of a foreman or shop boss, instead of under a professional athlete; and in "hustling" to reach the factory or the office on time he does not particularly miss the exercise of the football rush. To-day every thoughtful observer recognizes how great a force in our national life is the technical correspondence school and how powerful a factor in America's commercial supremacy. An article on the American School of Correspondence in the World's Work says: "It is the men behind the machines who have won industrial leadership for the United States. There never was a time in the history of the world when employers were so eager to get men of brains as now, or when the opportunities of such men were so great."

MACHINERY HALL, ARMOUR INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

But to resume about the American School of Correspondence in particular. The correspondence curriculum includes these full courses in Engineering: Electrical, Mechanical, Mechanical-Electrical, Stationary, Marine, Locomotive, Civil, Architecture, Textile, Heating, Ventilating, Plumbing, Mechanical Drawing, Perspective Drawing, Telephony, Telegraphy, Sheet Metal Pattern Drafting, Tool Making, and some forty Short Courses for General Students.

Nothing about any correspondence school is more vital than the manner in which its instruction papers are prepared. Recently The American Machinist, the highest authority in its field, made this comment on an instruction paper of the American School on Mechanical Drawing:

"There are not many books on Mechanical Drawing which the practical draughtsman feels are satisfactory. With all their effort they somehow fail to 'get there.' We have just seen a copy of the instruction paper on this subject which is put out by the American School of Correspondence and feel bound to say that we have found an exception to the rule. Indeed it is not too much to say that in the methods followed it stands in a class by itself. * * * If this is not effective instruction, we do not know the article."

The conclusion of the whole matter is clear and emphatic: Correspondence school work pays the ambitious and energetic who are determined to improve their position, to increase their efficiency, to expand their earnings; it is within the reach of the humblest and poorest wage-worker who cannot quit his place on the pay-roll; it gives the high school graduate who has not the means to enter a "resident" school a chance to begin a technical education while he is earning the money that will enable him later to take his degree in the "resident" school.

But the recent step taken by the American School of Correspondence, in perfecting an alliance with the management of the Armour Institute of Technology of the intimate and practical nature I have described, is altogether the most significant event in the entire evolution of giving instruction by mail.

It does away with the elaborate expenditure and commercial methods of soliciting students through a horde of agents so commonly practiced by correspondence schools in the past. Too many of these schools have built up a vast machinery which seems to have but one aim,—that of "coining money." By the method now adopted by the American School of Correspondence a new era in correspondence instruction has dawned. What agents have been costing correspondence schools is, by this School, put into apparatus and teachers, and employed toward the reduction of the tuition. Further, it has made possible for the correspondence student, through the reduced cost of his tuition, to complete his course in residence at the Armour Institute without excessive cost and with the added benefit of credits for work done by correspondence. The management of the American School of Correspondence as now constituted and the management of the Armour Institute of Technology will exhaust every resource to enlarge the influence of this institution toward the laboring man who aspires to larger power and opportunity.

Thus has the American School of Correspondence acquired a recognized status in the regular educational system of the country. It has by its work secured at last a truly educational and not commercial place in the scheme of popular education.

Only general features of this interesting educational departure have been here presented; full details may be had by addressing a postal card of inquiry to Mr. A. E. Zapf, the Secretary of the American School of Correspondence, at Armour Institute of Technology, Chicago.

WHAT ART NEEDS IS A SALESMAN

By James L. Ford

ONE hears a great deal about the unfortunate conditions under which the arts of painting and sculpture carry on the struggle for an existence in this country, and it is generally considered that it is because of ignorance and lack of artistic perception on the part of the public that the sculptor and his brother of the brush do not enjoy so much prosperity as do the successful playwright, actor, and man of letters.

"What Art needs in America to-day is an elevated public taste," wail the philosophers of the commonplace with their usual capacity for not understanding a question. What Art really does need in this country is a good salesman, and until it can be put on as sound a commercial basis as the theatre or the book trade its followers will continue to wring their hands and deplore the lack of artistic atmosphere, public appreciation, and all the other things that they think they ought to have.

It is the fashion to decry "commercialism," and those who live by the pen or the brush fall into the habit of doing it without knowing what the term means. A writer of my acquaintance once told me with solemnly uplifted finger that commercialism in literature was fast sapping the vitals of the country. And when I asked him what he meant by "commercialism in literature," he replied quite ingenuously that the term stood for paying on publication instead of on acceptance of contributions.

Yet despite this hue and cry against this "commercialism" the playwrights and novelists are making money simply because the art which each one represents has been put on a good commercial basis. This is because the publisher and manager really do something to promote the interests of the author or actor. They encourage them to divert their efforts into the most profitable channels, they place their literary and artistic wares before the public in a favorable light, they awaken interest in them by crafty and judicious "booming" in the columns of the press—in short, they do a great deal of work that their clients could not possibly do for themselves. It is for this reason that there is much less enmity between the publisher and the author, and the manager and the actor or playwright than there is between the picture dealer and the artist.

The last named invariably grudges the percentage he must pay on a sale of his work, which is not to be wondered at when we consider how little is done, as a general thing, to earn that percentage. The dealer simply hires what he calls a "gallery" on Fifth Avenue, covers its walls with pictures which have been intrusted to him to sell on the percentage basis, and then lies in wait for his prey. He has not yet learned the art of newspaper booming which enters into every form of industry, and consequently the public knows nothing of the domestic life and personal characteristics of even our most distinguished artists.

The Talented Young Kersloop

His front room is devoted to American landscapes, but he uses these only as a sort of "blind" for his real business, which is conducted in a back parlor hung with thick curtains and provided with the most elaborate contrivances for lighting and exhibiting pictures to the very best advantage. Visitors who are attracted by the exhibition in the show windows—for your true art dealer is also an expert "window dresser," as it is termed in the vernacular of the department store—enter the front room where they are permitted to examine the works of art at their leisure, while the dealer "sizes them up" and wonders what their chief weakness may be. If, prompted by an unusual interest in some landscape, they ask questions about it, the dealer shakes his head with a despondent smile. He knows nothing of the picture save that it was brought there by an American artist. Perhaps the ladies are interested in pictures? Yes! Then if they will step this way he will show them something that has just arrived from Europe. It is the work of the brilliant young Dutch artist, Kersloop, of whom they have certainly heard, for he is the talk of the Continent. Such color! Such atmosphere!

And thus softly gabbling, he leads the way into the back room, the curtains close noiselessly behind them and a velvet-footed attendant places on an easel the Kersloop masterpiece, a windmill on a ditched and dyked plain with a gray farmhouse in the distance and two forlorn geese in the foreground. No human beings are in sight—Mr. Kersloop would not know how to draw them if they were—but his work shows "breadth of treatment," "mystic tenderness" and several things in Italian which sound very well. Of course the ladies know that the poor fellow has the consumption and is not long for this world? Alas, it is only too true.

After the bargain has been concluded the visitors depart through a side door so that there is no possibility of their seeing again or even remembering the American works of art with which the dealer baited his hook.

A patriotic press is eager at all times to exploit the works of Kersloop and the others of his school, but the Fifth Avenue dealer has not yet learned the art of newspaper booming. Consider for a moment the amount of information of a useful and entertaining nature that is disseminated about even the least important of our soubrettes and authors, and compare it with the pitifully meagre details of life in the homes of artists of the brush that is vouchsafed by the picture dealers who ought to be also managers and press agents. Surely there must be some artists who live in "dainty flats" and are "wedded to their art," like soubrettes, or "do their creative work in the morning" and "study the congested districts of the East Side at close range" like budding authors. The material for booming is there. All it needs is a press agent to put it before the public.

There is one thing, however, that the art dealer should do for his clients which is of far greater importance than newspaper puffery, and that is to furnish fuller information regarding the pictures that he offers for sale than he does now. We are essentially a practical-minded people, and the majority of us are more apt to buy a picture because of some personal interest in what it represents than because of the technical skill in drawing or coloring that it represents, and which, after all, only a very few of us can appreciate. The buyer who is not an art connoisseur is certain to ask questions about a picture that catches his fancy. Where was it painted? What water is that in the background? Who is the man in the foreground? What sort of an old-fashioned machine is that standing by the roadside? They are the sort of questions that an artist would probably scorn to answer, but the best way to sell a picture is to make known all these details to the prospective buyer.

The sort of titles that artists bestow upon their works have been aptly characterized by Mr. Munkittrick in one of his poems:

His "Digging Clams at Barnegat,"
His "When the Morning Smiled,"
His "Seven Miles from Ararat,"
His "Portrait of a Child."

These titles represent precisely the amount of information concerning each picture that can be extracted from the average exhibition catalogue that sells for a quarter of a dollar. Let the manager of one of these art exhibitions print twenty lines of description for each picture instead of one and he will certainly reap his reward in a larger attendance and a much larger sale of pictures.

A Priceless Paradise

By Edmund Dance Cooke

IF SOME weird gnome should seek my home.
Some genie, fairy, witch,
To blink my eyes with every prize
Of life, and ask me "Which?"
I think I'd choose, in half a trice,
This boon: to never ask the price.

I would not claim a gilded name,
Or be a financier,
Not would I hold the wide world's gold;
And yet I somewhat fear
I'd ask a just sufficient slice
That I might never ask the price.

A coat-of-arms has meagre charms
To men of modern views,
Yet were it mine to make design,
I know which one I'd choose:
An open purse, with this device,
"He never, never asks the price."

Is Heaven a state, a place, a fete,
A rapture, or a rest?
The question's old and each may hold
His own opinion best;
But my idea of Paradise
Is where one need not ask the price!

A WOMAN'S WASHINGTON

By The Congressman's Wife

DAVID always wondered why a wise Deity had created idiots and mosquitoes, and in view of some of the recent idiocies among the fashionable votaries of this town, I am constrained to wonder with David why idiots were created, though no doubt the answer would be that society here at the Capital will be made to profit by the idiots just as David profited by both idiots and mosquitoes.

Robert says that it is not becoming in me to notice the idiocies of others of my smart friends, considering the probable idiocies I myself have been guilty of since we came here, and in view of the fact that it is the lot of all humanity to pursue trifles, for "whether we strut at a coronation or shout at a bonfire" it is all one in the long run. But it seems to me to be a very particular sort of idiocy that will make the entire social set of a town become convulsed over every little matter of precedence, and every little bit of etiquette, and, above all, that will split it into factions over interpretations of the invitations to the White House. The question as to what constitutes a "summons" or a "command" has been carried to every tea, dinner and reception of the winter. We took up this subject at a recent luncheon.

"I consider," said the wife of a Cabinet officer, speaking with decision and as though she expected her remarks to rhyme with the Gospels, "that everything which emanates from the White House should be regarded as a command from which nothing but death should excuse us."

"And I consider," said Mrs. Blank, who always took a moderate view of everything, "that there are distinctions in the invitations that emanate from the White House. Any message, or any intimation even, coming from the President himself to Senator Blank is necessarily in the nature of a command to be acted upon at once. Also, any formal card in the name of the President and Mrs. Roosevelt bidding one to dinner is a summons before which any and all other engagements must give way. But I do not regard an informal invitation or request either in the light of a command or a summons, and when Kermit or Ethel telephones to my children to come up there to play with them, why, I do as I please about letting them go, and that is all there ought to be in the whole thing."

"And that is all that is desired by the inmates of the White House," said I, speaking positively, because I knew it was the truth.

"For my part," said Mrs. Z——, "I never shall hold with all this to-do about precedence and etiquette. You folks down here are awfully stuck-up, and I can't see for the life of me that your ways are any better than ours out our way. Anybody in our town is perfectly free to drop in at the Governor's mansion with her knitting if she's a mind to, without waiting for a command, or a summons, that you think so much about down here. And I actually hear that some high and mighty ones of the foreigners think that folks ought to courtesy to the first lady in the land when they go to her parties, just as they do over in Europe. Now, I'd look nice, wouldn't I, at my age, making 'a cheese' before any one? Half the people seem to think that the Almighty sent a little handful of men into this world all booted and spurred to ride through life, and then sent the rest of us millions here to hop-and-go-fetch-it as best we can."

There was a good deal of homely truth in her words, even if we did have to smile at her way of putting it. Mrs. Z—— is always vigorous and plain-spoken. Mrs. Z—— is from the West and has joined the upper ranks of officialdom comparatively lately. She is continually drawing comparisons between Washington and her Western home, and particularly bemoans the fact that she could not bring her cow along when husband came to assist the Government at Washington. She hopes to find ample compensation, however, in her efforts to reform society here. Then an ex-Ambassadress, whose husband had represented us abroad some time ago, said:

"I think the customs and etiquette here are perfectly delightful. They are just the right thing for our country and are a great contrast to what prevails in Europe, I can assure you. I suppose," and she glanced around with a deprecating smile, "all of you have heard of my first appearance at Court, when the General was Ambassador at ——, and I sat down in the presence of Royalty?"

Why Ad. Writing Pays

Incomes from $100 to $500 a Month Through Mail Instruction.

What Two Students Have Accomplished in a Short Time.

BY GEORGE H. POWELL
The Leading American Expert

THE readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST who read in the January 3 issue what I said about advertising writing as a money-making business were, in many cases, surprised at the rapid growth of this new vocation, although they have realized that the magazines and newspapers are constantly increasing their space devoted to publicity.

Just how rapidly this increase is going on may be fairly judged by an examination of the various National publications of to-day and of a year or two back, although the daily papers likewise show the trend of the times in an equally conclusive manner.

And a wonderful bearing, too, it has on the future of the advertising writing business. Taking two different types of the daily press, the New York Sun and World: the records show that the net gain in the amount of advertising carried by the former in its columns during the year 1902 was twenty-eight per cent. over its 1901 total; while the latter publication shows a gain that exceeds one thousand columns for the same period!

These figures are readily comprehended, and they go to prove that commercial America finds advertising so profitable that it is increasing its expenditure over a hundred millions of dollars annually in this one direction.

The young man or woman who is thinking of learning the art of "Ad. writing," as it is commonly called, will, in face of facts and figures, cease to wonder that the competent writer is able to earn from $100.00 to $500.00 a month, and that the picked workers are filling positions at far greater salaries.

Columns might be written showing scores of reasons why modern advertising is forging to the front in leaps and bounds, but this space forbids more than a reference or two.

In the first place, it has been demonstrated in every conclusive test that the retailer who advertises wisely is bound to absorb most of the trade of his competitor who doesn't advertise, and in a like manner the manufacturer is wonderfully successful or not, as he practices or declines the great momentum that only comes with up-to-date advertising methods.

Never before since the creation of man has any one factor appeared in the business world bearing such a mighty money-producing wand as does modern advertising. It is less of an uncertainty than formerly, because its principles are getting to be thoroughly understood and appreciated.

In a word, the new advertiser can be quickly put next to the right methods, and competent advertising writers will take care of his copy and other details, when he has not the time to attend to this himself, as is generally the case.

The lack of a sufficient number of good ad. writers, however, has compelled many a business man to take up correspondence instruction himself, or to put one of his clerks under my tutelage. Scarcely a week passes that some very prominent merchant does not enroll in my course for the specific purpose of learning how to branch out into a wider field. The wholesale grocer wants to create a National demand for his coffees, the shirt manufacturer wants to establish stores in all large cities, the department store is anxious to build a new building or develop a mail order trade—and they all realize that their salvation depends almost wholly upon the judicious use of printers' ink.

And in this onward march to greater prosperity I want to go on record with a prophecy: within the next ten years the present volume of advertising will be doubled over the figures of 1902! So marvelous a weapon as scientific advertising will never be allowed to get rusty from want of use. Let a man discover gold in the coldest confines of the North, and thousands will flock thence if they have to walk. So, too, will our merchants and manufacturers follow the golden path blazed by good advertising and gather their fortunes. The failures of the past will be avoided by reason of greater knowledge, and there will soon be no valid reason for groping in the dark and stumbling over obstacles.

Now a word about the men and women who are being called upon to write the advertising that returns such great dividends. The two young men whose portraits appear above are fair types of my students. Both have achieved skill within a comparatively few months. Mr. C. E. O'Neill to-day presides over the advertising department of one of the largest department stores in Wheeling, W. Va., a position he obtained almost before completing my course of instruction, and within a few years I shall confidently expect to see him in the $5,000.00–$10,000.00 ranks. Mr. Norton Mattocks, the other student whose portrait appears above, is also another success, and although he is employed by one of the largest Duluth wholesale grocers and packers of advertised specialties, yet he does much outside work, and is frequently consulted by advertisers in the grocery trade.

The fact that the Powell System of mail instruction can do so much is amply strengthened day by day by the continued successes of students. That it is the one correct system of teaching advertising there can be no doubt, and the testimony is so different, so much stronger and so much more specific than ever before heard of, that I know it is a power for good, alike to the man or woman who wishes to earn more, or to the business man who is anxious to seize his golden opportunities.

To these I shall be glad to mail my beautiful new Prospectus, the most interesting work of its kind ever issued, together with the strongest kind of testimony. Simply address me George H. Powell, 176 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

WOOD ROLLERS —— TIN ROLLERS

Some of us had heard a rumor of the tale, but we were too polite to admit it, so we waited. She went on with a fine touch of humor:

"Before we made our first appearance at Court the General asked for some instructions. I was given two or three points. I was told that I must back out of the presence of the Emperor and Empress, and I was shown how to do it. I was also instructed that I must not turn my back to any member of the reigning family, and as almost every other man and woman at Court was of the blood royal, you may fancy what a task was before me. When the first Court function came around I went in all the splendor of Court dress and tight shoes, and, as you all may see, I am no sylph. I got along very well, however, and backed away from the Emperor and Empress in good shape, and was congratulating myself on being safely over the worst of it when the General whispered to me, suddenly, in a suppressed voice:

"'Wife, wife, you are turning your back to the Archduke C——'

"I wheeled about promptly only to be met with:

"'Take care; the Archduchess is just behind.'

"I wheeled again, and then heard the General warn me agonizingly:

"'The Prince, the Prince!'

"By this time I was not only very nervous but dizzy, and I said in a whisper to the General, 'Good Heavens! I've got to turn my back somewhere; do, pray, pilot me up against the wall; I suppose I won't be committing any breach if I turn my back to the wall?'

"But the General was obdurate and insisted that the wife of the American Ambassador must face the music, and before the evening was a quarter gone I felt perfectly sure that I had backed all over the map of Europe, and besides, my tight shoes had begun to bite as only tight shoes can on such occasions. At last, when it was almost impossible for me to spin about any longer, a space was cleared and I spied a gorgeous green satin sofa. I said to the General:

"'You see that green sofa over there? Well, Royalty or no Royalty, I'm going to sit on that sofa, even if the Grand Chamberlain makes a face at me.'"

"And did you?" I asked, as the ex-Ambassadress wiped away a tear of laughter.

"Of course I did," she said, "and to this day the General can't bear to see the color, green, anywhere about. But I'm thankful we don't have to back around over here."

"For all that," said the Secretary's wife, "our etiquette is too elastic. If it were not so there would not have been that little episode at my house when I gave a young people's dinner in honor of the Countess de Blank, who is one of the most charming young women who has ever graced the diplomatic corps. At this particular dinner the man who sat next to her, and who ought to have known better, called out to her, aloud, when she playfully purloined some of his salted almonds while his head was turned, 'Cochon! Cochon!' He was in jest, of course, but fancy my consternation and chagrin next day when I was waited upon by a chargé or attaché of her country, and forced to explain that 'pig' in the United States is only a playful term for greediness, and that everybody at the table had perfectly understood it. Now where, I ask, but in Washington, where etiquette is lax, could such an impossible thing have happened?"

"Ah, but the worst mistake and the funniest thing happened here in Mrs. Fish's time," put in Mrs. Blank, "when Mr. Fish was Secretary of State in Grant's Administration. The Fishes gave every two weeks what were called in those days State receptions, to which everybody of importance went. A certain diplomat who was newly arrived in this country and who spoke little English attended one of these State affairs, and became embarrassed because he had to take his leave early in order to keep another engagement. He did not know how to frame his excuses in English, so he sought the help of a young fellow about town, who was a wag, and this wicked young man said:

"'Just go up to Mrs. Fish, bow very low, and say, "I regret, Madame, that I must go, but I have other fish to fry."'"

This yarn capped the absurdities. Then Mrs. Blank went on more seriously:

"What a popular man is Mr. Pulido, of the Venezuelan Legation. He is to become Minister, I hear."

"Yes, he is popular," said I. "Mr. Slocum says he is one of the most popular foreigners in the Metropolitan Club, and that when some of the youngsters in the club the other day, with daring temerity, dubbed him 'Castro,' he took it all in good part, but drew himself up and said with fire, quoting from Cowper, to the surprise of his listeners:

"'Ah, Castro, yes. "Who hath not owned with rapture-smitten frame, the power of grace, the magic of a name?"'"

"That was fine loyalty," we exclaimed. Then the Secretary's wife said:

"I am very glad that Baron von Sternberg is coming back. He used to be very popular here, and he is very popular at the White House from the President down to the children. You know his name is Speck von Sternberg, and when he was here in November visiting the President, and the children, Archie and Ethel, heard his name, they went out at once to take stock of their pets, and the only thing they could find that was suggestive in any way of the Baron was an old speckled hen, which they promptly named Speck von Sternberg, much to the amusement of the Baron, and when the children naively told the Baron that she was the best scratcher among the lot, they were quite overcome at the hilarity this provoked."

"Which of those boys was it who made the remarkable answer to his teacher's question as to his parent's occupation?" asked Mrs. Blank.

"Oh, that was Kermit. Last spring his teacher had his class up and was giving a little talk on the usefulness of work and occupation, and he asked each boy in turn what his father's occupation was. When it came Kermit's turn to answer he seemed entirely surprised to be asked such a question. He seemed embarrassed how to reply. He said haltingly:

"'My father? Why, my father doesn't do anything, sir.'

"'Oh, yes, Kermit, your father is a very busy man. What is his occupation?'

"'Why, my father is—is—— Why, sir, he is—it.'"

We laughed at this, for any of the tales about those children amuses everybody in Washington. Then Mrs. Blank said:

"Little Archie, when he is gotten up for a ride, with his sombrero precisely like his father's, and real spurs and long leggins, and mounted on his pony, is the cunningest little chap I have seen for many a day. He is like a little Hop-o'-my-thumb. To see his pony try to keep up with his father's big horse, and to see that boy try to sit like his father, and to see him dash along over the stones and through the mud with his father's encouraging words of 'That's well done, my son,' is one of the sights about Washington that I am glad to have seen."

"I have often wondered," said I, "whether the President's orderly does not nearly die of laughter sometimes out on these famous rides, particularly when Senator Lodge happens to be along. Senator Lodge rides in the English fashion, and it is the President's delight to steal up and suddenly stir up his horse into a hard run. But no matter how hard they go Senator Lodge just bobs up and down majestically, and seems never to be able to catch up with the President, who is usually a quarter of a mile ahead or just disappearing over a fence, and that orderly never smiles."

"I suppose," said Mrs. Blank, "Senator Lodge's riding might be regarded as scholarly rather than brilliant. He certainly never has ridden a bronco in his life, but it is the conviction of two-thirds of the Senate that he is a power behind the throne. Isn't this about true?" she asked, turning to the Secretary's wife, who was supposed to know the innermost secrets of the court.

"Oh, I think Mr. Lodge is consulted, as are many other public men, but——" And the Secretary's wife broke off with conscious reserve.

"Well," said I, taking up the thread as I remembered what Robert had told me lately about a midnight meeting on the streets of Washington, "I believe that Senator Lodge is the closest confidant the President has. All of us know that the very chairs at the White House have eyes and the walls have ears, and thus some of the most secret and weighty conferences of the nation take place elsewhere. Sometimes when the President is troubled about some particularly bothering public affair he has been known to slip quietly out of the White House in the middle of the night, elude the Secret Service men who are ever on guard, and unattended go to Senator Lodge's house, rout him out of his sleep, and the two, arm-in-arm and with heads bent down, roam the streets together, which, as everybody knows, are the most utterly deserted thoroughfares after twelve o'clock on this continent. They discuss presumably public affairs of moment, until the President, fearing he may be missed and a hue and cry raised, goes home again."

"LEST WE FORGET"

Due respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect ARTISTIC and ENDURING MEMORIALS. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled down slabs appear everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. WHITE BRONZE MONUMENTS are cheaper and Infinitely Better. They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost.

WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? The Right of Way

President James J. Hill, of the Great Northern, is a big-hearted, broad-gauged man little given to ceremony and red tape.

The latest story of his methods comes from a Western city in which his line has car yards and many side tracks. A prominent citizen of the place desired to have a subway built to his property. Its construction involved tunneling under the tracks of the Great Northern.

It seems that he had experienced some delay in getting the corporation's consent, and so when President Hill passed through the city recently the citizen bearded the magnate in his car.

"I want this subway bad," Mr. Hill's visitor explained. "I have petitioned your company but without getting satisfaction. So I have come to you for advice."

The railway builder smiled.

"I have found," he said, "that the best plan in such cases is to go ahead and get permission afterward."

The subway is now in course of construction and no protest has been filed by the Great Northern.

40-Volume Shakespearian Library for 6 Cents a Day

For six cents a day, for a short while, you can buy a complete Shakespearian Library — forty volumes — containing all of Shakespeare's Plays, Poems and Sonnets, with copious notes and explanatory matter. If you are a student of Shakespeare, or if you are accumulating a library of standard authors, or if you wish to read merely for pleasure, you cannot do better than buy a set of the Booklovers' Shakespeare on our Club plan. An entire set will be sent you, on your request, for examination before purchasing.

The Booklovers' Edition

This is the ideal edition for those who love good books. It gives Shakespeare's works complete in forty dainty volumes — light and easy to handle — but well printed, beautifully illustrated and handsomely bound. It is not a cheaply made, trashy edition, but a production worthy of a place in the library of the most fastidious book lover. The type is large and clear, and the work is printed on a superior grade of white paper.

This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text, to which have been added Prefaces, Critical Comments, Glossaries, and Explanatory and Critical Notes. There are over 400 illustrations, many of which are reproductions of rare woodcuts of Shakespeare's time.

Forty Complete Volumes

You will enjoy reading Shakespeare if you read this edition, not only because it is the most accurate edition, but also because it is the best annotated edition ever offered to the American public. Every obscure phrase, every difficult word, every tangled passage, has been discussed and explained by the men best fitted to explain it. In the extent of the information it contains concerning the great poet and his works it is, in fact, a Shakespearian encyclopedia.

The sets are in forty volumes, and with each set is included a Life of Shakespeare by Israel Gollancz, and a Topical Index of Shakespeare's works (comprising one volume) by means of which the reader can find any desired passage almost at a glance.

The entire set contains 7,000 pages, forty beautiful color plates and 400 woodcut illustrations. The volumes are 7¾ x 5½ inches in size — just the right size for easy handling — and they are bound in an attractive cloth or half-leather binding stamped in gold.

The Coupon Cuts the Price in Two

The fact that we have secured an entire edition for cash from the publishers is the reason we are able to offer sets of this splendid Shakespeare at bargain prices. The edition will probably be sold very rapidly, so if you wish to take advantage of this bargain, do not fail to order at once. Our special bargain prices are $27.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $21.00 for cloth binding — payable at the rate of $2.00 a month. Cut out the coupon, sign it, and mail it to us to-day, and we will send you a set, express prepaid, for examination. You do not pay a cent until you examine the books and are satisfied with them.

A BEAUTIFUL PREMIUM

If your order is among the first 250 received, we will send you as a premium with the set a beautiful picture matted and framed in oak (ready for hanging) of six of Shakespeare's characters, executed in colors. The only condition is that you must order promptly, so that your order will be among the first 250. This picture is equal in value to pictures regularly sold at $2.75 each.

THREE IN A GAME

"D'ye believe what this young feller has told you?"

They said they did. Shadwell turned again to Gawthrop.

"It's 'ard lines on men as is sailormen, and ships so short'anded as they always is with greedy owners, to 'ave shipmates as can't do their work. But you look bright, young feller, and if you skips quick and does your best, there ain't no reason as you shouldn't be some kind of use in the world before we're off the Horn. And I say the same to you over there!"

"Go to the devil," replied Hunt sulkily.

"Sailormen don't go there. They goes to Fiddler's Green," said Shadwell. "And mark me! Put the girl out of your minds. This was a put-up job, and she was in it. She'll marry this here Gardiner!"

"He hasn't a cent," said Gawthrop contemptuously.

"It don't follow," said Shadwell stubbornly, "that because women is wicked by nature they ain't silly by ch'ice. I tell you Gardiner 'as gone to wind'ard of you! He's laughin' this very minute!"

And so he was. But Edith Atherton was by no means amused at the sudden disappearance of the two men who were supposed to stand highest in her favor. Whether she cared much or little for either of them or not, it was unpleasant to have them fail to keep their appointments, and to leave San Francisco without a word of explanation. Her first and very natural impulse was to let every one infer that she had rejected both of them. But when old Mr. Gawthrop called on her on the second day she had to own that she understood the mystery as little as the newspapers did. And all the papers were very keen on any scent.

There was one newspaper which suggested that they might have been shanghaied. It was the Era on which Gardiner worked. For though he had made up his mind to do very little more work on any paper, he was loyal to his flag so long as he hoisted it, and meant that the Era should be able to sail in at the last and say "We told you so." And when every one else on the paper failed in getting an interview with Miss Atherton, he volunteered to try.

"You must understand, however," he said to his editor, "that even if I see her I don't promise to write anything about it. You see, I knew her a little when she was in New York two years ago, and though I'm not in the gilt-edged crowd she adorns here I owe her something."

And Edith Atherton saw him, although she did consider a man on a newspaper little, if anything, better than a deck-hand on a Bay ferryboat. She had never understood what he was doing in California at all. He went to interview her, and she interviewed him.

"I'm here as a man from the Era, Miss Atherton," said Gardiner. He spoke almost timidly. It was the first time he had ever been alone with her.

"You are not here as a man from the Era," said Edith.

"You mean——" said Gardiner eagerly.

"I mean that," said Edith; "just that. You are here as the Mr. Gardiner I met in New York."

Gardiner's eyes sparkled. He looked at her, smiled and then laughed.

"But mayn't I ask you anything about the —Mystery?" he asked.

"I don't see what it has to do with me," replied Edith. "But I see your paper says they have been shanghaied. Tell me what that means."

He explained; no man knew better.

"You mean they have gone to sea as common sailors?" she exclaimed.

"That is the theory of the Era," said Gardiner dryly. "If we are right, it will do them both good."

"I'm rather sorry for Sibley Gawthrop," she said. But Gardiner was not so young as to be discouraged by her sympathy for Sibley.

"May I be sorry for him, too?" asked Gardiner boldly. Edith Atherton stared at him and dropped her eyes.

"How is your father?" she asked irrelevantly. "He was a very nice old man."

"So he is," replied Gardiner; "the only trouble was that he believed he owned me. He came from the South, and was one of the few Southerners who, on losing their slaves, played their own game on the men from the North. He and I quarreled about a subject in which I considered he had no right to interfere."

There were no obvious implications in the way he spoke, and Edith Atherton saw none.

"What was that?" she asked innocently enough.

"His view was that I shouldn't marry until he let me. I wanted to marry you."

Edith gasped a little and took hold of her chair as she bent forward.

"Indeed, Mr. Gardiner."

"I still want to, Miss Atherton. And as the lady whom he asked me to marry was married a month ago, I think he will forgive me if I ask him. It was always understood, even when we parted, that he would reinstate me as his partner if I succeeded for myself."

"And have you succeeded?" asked Edith with bent head. Gardiner rose from his chair and went toward her.

"That is for you to say," he cried.

And when he returned to the office he handed in no more than a paragraph. It was considered in some quarters an adequate explanation of the disappearance of Hunt and Gawthrop. Yet it was not adequate for Edith. It was only when she became Mrs. Gardiner, and they were on their way East, that her husband told her the truth.

"I'm really very sorry, now," said Gardiner. "Nevertheless, it will do them lots of good. They required it. You never really liked either of them, Edith?"

"No-o, not that way," said his wife. But she said to herself, "That next day I should have accepted Mr. Gawthrop."

They ran into Laramie Junction, that horrible desert of sagebrush and alkali. A bitter wind drove dust against the windows of their car.

"It's a ghastly prospect," said Gardiner, as he looked out on the prairie.

"It would have been," replied his wife absently.

"It would have been?" asked her husband in surprise.

"I mean it is, of course," said Edith.

The Way of a Bird in the Air

RECENT developments in aërial navigation have renewed interest in the comparative study of the mechanical principles involved in the flying of birds.

There is one exceedingly puzzling law in regard to birds and all flying creatures, the solution of which may work far-reaching influences in the construction of flying craft.

This law, which has thus far perplexed scientists, is that the heavier and bigger the bird or insect, the less relative wing area is required for its support. Thus the area of wing surface of a gnat is forty-nine units of area to every one of weight.

In graphic contrast to that, a condor (sarcorhamphus gryphus) which weighed 16.52 pounds had a wing surface of 9.80 square feet. In other words, though the gnat needs wing surface in a ratio of forty-nine square feet per pound of weight, a great condor manages to sail along majestically with 59-100ths of a square foot to a pound of weight.

The unexplained phenomenon persists consistently throughout the whole domain of entomology and ornithology. Going up the scale from the gnat, it is found that with the dragon-fly this ratio is 30 to 1, with the tipula, or daddy-long-legs, 14.5 to 1, the cockchafer only 5.15 to 1, the rhinoceros beetle 3.14 to 1.

Among birds the paradoxical law that the smaller the creature the bigger the relative supporting wings holds good. A screech owl (scops zorca) weighing one-third of a pound had 2.35 square feet of wing surface per pound of weight. A fish hawk (pandion haliaëtus) weighing nearly three pounds had a wing area of 1.08 square feet to each pound. A turkey buzzard weighing 5.6 pounds had a little less than one square foot of wing surface to each pound. A griffon vulture (gyps fulvus) weighing 16.52 pounds had a wing surface of only .68 square feet to the pound.

To this law, which is a baffling problem thus far to both ornithologists and members of aëronautical societies, there are no exceptions among flying creatures extant, but it is possible that the pterodactyl which winged its way over the cretaceous sea that once extended from the Gulf of Mexico through Kansas was an exception.

Prof. S.W. Williston, of the State University of Kansas, believes that the body of this strange flying reptile was little more than an appendage to the wings, which had a spread of twenty feet.

Scientists, however, hesitate to speak with certainty in regard to the body of the pterodactyl, although more is known of the wings from their impressions in the lithographic stone of Solenhofen, which has a fine grain.

Students of aërial navigation who are devoting much attention to observations of birds say that if the peculiar law governing extant flying creatures could be fathomed the problem of human flight might be solved.

The Quality of Light is of vastly greater importance to your eyes than mere brilliancy. While the light of the Angle Lamp is as brilliant as gas or electricity, it has the beautiful, soft, eye-resting quality of oil. All the splendid light is thrown directly downward without shadow, which insures every ray of light being available, and not wasted upon the ceiling. These are a few of the reasons that have made the Angle Lamp an indispensable adjunct to thousands of homes. Other good reasons are its ease of operation, the absence of smoke and smell under any and all circumstances, and its great economy—eighteen cents' worth of oil a month is the average cost of maintenance. Our Catalogue "L. P." shows all styles from $1.80 up, and is sent free on request.

Opportunity! Success!

Can You Tell the Genuine Article of Either Sort from Spurious Imitations?

If you can, I wish you would write to me and help me with the discussions I and my associates are carrying on in the New Thought Magazine. If you cannot, then I am sure you will be interested in the discussion itself.

William Walker Atkinson, Editor

The New Thought Magazine is the exponent of effort. That means sincere effort toward success. Wherever you are or whatever you are, if you value the inspiration of contact with the minds of others who are also striving for success, you will find it in the New Thought. We call it the New Thought—it is simply made up of old thoughts, about opportunity, effort, self-control, success—that's the sum of it. We try to find and understand the "how." We try to learn to know our own possibilities and limitations, to develop the one and overcome the other. We recognize the vital difference between "I can't" and "I can and I will."

Every man or woman, young or old, who has ambition, has a part with us and we want your sympathy and fellowship. The New Thought Magazine is for sale on news-stands. It costs just 5 cents a copy. You can sample the spirit of it for one nickel. If it agrees with you, each month's copy will cost you just the same price. If, by any chance, your dealer is out or hasn't the magazine, send us his name and yours and we'll see that you are supplied.

Ask for the New Thought Magazine to-day when you pass the news-stand and try it a nickel's worth. If you don't think it's worth a nickel after reading it, take it back and get your money. It will be there for you.

I want to send you free, just for your own reading, a copy of my essay entitled "I can and I will." This will be very helpful to you. Address me at my city office, or come and see me. William Walker Atkinson, 500 Howland Block, 504 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

suppressed shriek—and Frothingham saw Cecilia's hands hastily snatch the written sheets from under the light. Then he heard a voice in his ear—he hardly knew it as hers:

"Come—come quickly!"

He rose and with his hand touching her arm followed her. The door opened—the dim hallway seemed brightly lighted, so great was the contrast. The maid was seated there. She at once rose, entered the medium's room and closed the door behind her. Cecilia and Frothingham went into the quiet little street—the brilliant sunshine, the white snow over everything; in the distance the rumble of the city.

He gave a huge sigh of relief, and wiped the sweat from his face—his very hair was wet and his collar was wilted. He was sickly pale.

"She always wishes to be left that way," said Cecilia, as if she did not know what she was saying.

They walked to the corner together. "I am not well," she said. He ventured to look at her; she was wan and old, and her eyes were deep-circled in blue-black and she was blue-black at the corners of her mouth, at the edges of her nostrils. "I must go home—they will telephone Mrs. Ridgie. Don't say where I was taken ill. Forgive me—it was all my fault—yet not mine. Good-by——" She did not put out her hand to him, but stood off from him with fear and anguish in her downcast eyes.

"The woman's a fraud—a——" he began.

She turned upon him with a fury of which he would not have believed her capable. "Go! Go!" she exclaimed, as if she were driving away a dog. "Already you may have lost me my love. Go!"

He shrank from her. She walked rapidly away, and he saw her hail a cab, enter it, saw the cab drive away. With his head down he strode back the way he had come. He turned into the quiet little street, went to Mrs. Ramsay's door, lifted and dropped the knocker several times. The maid opened the door a few inches and showed a frowning face.

Frothingham widened the space by thrusting himself into it. "Tell Mrs. Ramsay that Lord Frothingham wishes to speak to her," he said in a tone that made her servant his servant.

She went into the ghost-chamber and soon reappeared. "Mrs. Ramsay is too exhausted to see any one to-day."

"Bah!" exclaimed Frothingham, and stalked past the maid and into the ghost-chamber.

The curtains were back and the slats of the shutters were open. Mrs. Ramsay in her great chair by the table was using a bottle of salts. She did not look in Frothingham's direction as he closed the door sharply behind him.

He went to her and stood over her, scowling down at her. "What the deuce did you do that for, Lilian?"

Mrs. Ramsay did not change expression and did not answer.

"No one ever treated you decenter than I did. You——"

"No names, please, Slobsy," said Mrs. Ramsay, shaking her bottle and sniffing it again.

At "Slobsy" he shivered—he was not a lunatic on the subject of his dignity, but he did not fancy this nickname of his Oxford days, thus inopportunely flung at him. He felt that at one stroke she had cut the ground from under his feet.

"I was sorry to do it," she continued. "But I couldn't have you poaching on my preserves, could I now, Slobsy? It cut me to do it"—she looked at him with friendly sympathy—"but you could better afford to lose her than I could. You forgive me, don't you? You always were sensible."

"I'll expose you," he said—he was once more imperturbable, and was looking at her calmly through his eyeglass and was speaking in his faintly satirical drawl.

"Expose—what?" asked Mrs. Ramsay, sniffing at her salts.

He reflected. What could he expose? Clearly, no one but himself to Cecilia, or Cecilia to the public. He knew nothing about Mrs. Ramsay that would prove her a fraud. He turned and hurriedly left the room and the house.

"What luck—just my rotten luck!" he said to himself.

I do not know of any neighborhood more inviting or likely to be permanently satisfactory to seekers of country homes than that of Glenside and the region thereabout, including Ogontz Park." (Signed)

John Wanamaker

This is the opinion of a man of national reputation, well known for his conservative and accurate judgment. He knows Glenside thoroughly, his beautiful homestead and grounds being near it, and has seen the property advance in value year after year. There is every reason why it should make a greater advance in the next twelve months than it has ever done before, because this year alone more than $200,000 has been spent by ourselves in the construction of dwellings, in addition to the other general improvements and new homes erected by individual owners.

$10.00 SECURES A GLENSIDE HOME SITE

One of the Greatest Suburban Properties in the United States

We are willing to guarantee that Glenside property will be selling at 25 per cent. increase a year from to-day

What better form of investment could a saving man or woman have than a home site on property of this kind? It is not a theoretical land scheme, but a beautiful suburban property in actual operation. Again we would impress upon you that all improvements are made — not promised. Glenside is a thriving town now — 93 trains connect it with Philadelphia daily; being a terminus, it has a great advantage of express service (no change of cars)—The Philadelphia and Reading Railway running the entire length of the property, two stations on the property and three others within five minutes' walk. Two trolley lines now under construction to run through the property. Hundreds of houses and stores are already built, but the town is in its infancy. Values are increasing weekly. Only 90 minutes to New York — station short walk. The development of a large undertaking of this sort requires large sums of money. $900,000.00 has already been spent on it. Hundreds of thousands more will be expended. In order to release capital, which will be used in this further development, we are making a

Liberal Offer to Saturday Evening Post Readers

We have set aside a number of valuable home sites especially adapted for investment purposes. These lots range from $200.00 to $1,700.00. Any one of them, in our opinion, is as safe an investment as a United States Bond. Upon payment of $10.00 we will reserve one of these lots, and send you a marked plan showing its location. If you desire any other lot than the one selected, we will gladly make the change.

Glenside Investment a Saving Fund and Life Insurance

You can pay us each month whatever amount you wish to save. If you would rather pay the full amount within thirty days, we will allow you a cash discount of ten per cent. With the deed of sale we will include an ironclad guarantee that the property will increase in value 25 per cent. within a year from purchase, based upon prices at which the ground is then selling. If it fails to do this

We will Refund Your Money at the End of Twelve Months with 6 per cent. Interest Added; and in the event of your death lot will be deeded to your beneficiary without any further payments

Send in your application for a lot to-day. If you can come to Glenside personally, we will pay a proportionate amount of your expenses, according to the size of your investment. On the higher-priced lots we will pay the entire cost of transportation from any point in the United States.

Recommended by Financial Magnates of National Fame

Wm. R. Nicholson, President of The Land Title and Trust Company of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, one of the largest institutions of its kind in the country, located at the corner of Broad and Chestnut Streets, will gladly answer any questions in regard to Glenside, or its owner. It is endorsed by P. A. B. Widener, the great traction magnate, who knows the section thoroughly, because his palatial home, Lynnewood Hall, is within a short distance from Glenside. Wm. L. Elkins, the famous financier, has also consented to reply to any prospective investor who desires his opinion as to the value of Glenside home sites as investments. Either of these gentlemen will answer any inquiry as to the financial ability and standing of the owner of Glenside, also his willingness to perform every obligation made. For further information address

The Law at Heart's Desire

By Emerson Hough

THE CAUSE CELEBRE WHICH AROSE FROM CURLY'S KILLING OF HIS FUTURE FATHER-IN-LAW'S PIG

A GREAT many bowels have been injured in the pastime known as the "double roll." Especially has this been the case with persons not native to the land of Heart's Desire or the equivalent thereof. Even those born to the manner, and possessed of the freedom of a vast landscape whose every particular was devoted to the behoof of any man seized with a purpose of attaining speed and efficiency with firearms, did not always reach that smoothness and precision in the execution of this personal manœuvre which alone could render it safe to themselves or impressive to the beholder. The owner of this accomplishment was never apt to find himself much crowded with company, in the way either of participants or spectators. Yet the art was a simple and harmless one, pertaining more especially to youth, enthusiasm and the fresh air of high altitudes, which did ever evoke saltpetreish manifestations.

The evolution of the "double roll" is executed by taking a six-shooter — let us hope not one of those pitiful toys of the East — upon each forefinger, each weapon so hanging balanced on the trigger-guard and the trigger itself that it shall be ready to turn about the finger as upon a pivot, and shall be ready for instant discharge, the thumb cocking the weapon as it turns; yet so that it shall none the less be discharged only when the muzzle of the weapon is pointed away from the operator's person and not toward it. It is best for the ambitious to begin this little sport with an empty weapon. Thus one will readily observe that the click of the hammer is all too often heard before the whirl of the gun is fully under way, and while the muzzle is pointed midway of the operator's person; the weight of the heavy gun being commonly sufficient to pull back the trigger and so discharge the piece. When the ambitious soul has learned to do this "roll" with one empty gun he may try it with two empty guns. If he finds it possible thus to content himself it will perhaps be all the better for him. To stand upright, with a gun in each hand, even an empty gun, and so revolve the same while its own cylinder is revolving, is not wholly easy, though, when one has finally gotten both hemispheres of his brain into accord with his forefingers, he will ever thereafter be able to understand fully the double revolution of the earth, upon its axis and around the sun; provided always that he is able to perform the "double roll" without hitch or break, pulling right and left forefinger alternately and rapidly until he has heard what in his tentative case must be a series of six double clicks.

This performance with an empty six-shooter is but a pale and spiritless form of the sport of high altitudes. Instead there should be twelve reports, so closely sequent as to sound as one string of explosion. Thus executed the game is a fine one, the finer for being risky. To so stand erect, with an eight-inch Colt in either hand, each arm at full length, one gun shooting joyously down the centre of the street of your native town, the other shooting as cheerfully up the same street — to do this actually, with bark of powder and attendant puffs of dust-cut — this is indeed delightsome when the heart is full of red blood, and the chest swells with charged wine o' life, and the eyes gleam and the muscles harden for very search of some endeavor immediate and difficult! It is the more delightsome when this moment of man-frenzy finds one in such a town as was this of Heart's Desire; where, indeed, a man could do precisely as he pleased; where it was not accounted wrong or ill-balanced to claim the whole street for a half-moment or so of a cloudless morning, and so to ease one's self of the pressure of the joy o' life. To own this little world, to live free of touch or taint of control or guidance, to be brother to the mountains, cousin of the free sky — to live in Heart's Desire and be a man — ah! would that were possible for all of us to-day! Were it so, then assuredly we should exult and take unto ourselves all the privileges of the domain, perhaps even to the extent of attempting the "double roll."

Perhaps, if we were each and every one of us a prospective bridegroom, as was Curly, upon this morning in question, we should be all the more persuaded to execute the "double roll" in mid-street, as proof to the public that all was well. Perhaps, also, if there should thus appear to any of us, adown street upon either hand, an object moving slowly, pausing, resuming again across the line of gun-vision its slow advance — ah! tell me, if that slow-moving object crossing a bridegroom's joyous aim were a pig, a grunting, fat, conceited pig, arrogating to itself much of that street wherefrom one's fellow-citizens had for a moment of grave courtesy withdrawn — tell me, if you were a bridegroom, soon to be happy, and if you could do the "double roll" with loaded guns and no danger to your bowels, and if while so engaged you should see within easy range this black, sleek pig, with its tail curled tightly, egotistically, contemptuously over its back, what, as a man, would you do? What, as a man, could you do in a case like that, in a land where there was no law, where never a court had sat, where never such a thing as a case at law had been known? Consider, what would be the abstract right and justice of this matter, repeating that you were a bridegroom and twenty-three, and that the air was molten wine and honey mingled, and that this pig — but then, the matter is absurd! There is but one answer. It was right, indeed it was inevitable that Curly should shoot the pig; because in the first place it had intruded upon his pastime, and because in the second place he felt like it.

And yet over this act, this simple, inevitable act of justice, arose the first law case ever known in Heart's Desire, a cause which shook that community to the centre of its being, and for a time threatened its very continuance. Ah, well! perhaps the time had come. Perhaps the sun was now to set over all the valleys of Heart's Desire. Perhaps this was the beginning of the end. The law, they say, must have its course. It had its course in Heart's Desire.

But not without protest, not without struggle. There were two factions from the start. Strange to say, that most bitterly opposed to Curly was headed by no less a person than his own intended father-in-law, the man from Leavenworth. It was his pig. The rest of us had lived at Heart's Desire for a considerable time, but there had hitherto seemed no need for law. Order we already had in so far as order is really needed, though the importance of order, or indeed the importance of law, is a matter very much overrated. No man at Heart's Desire ever dreamed of locking his door. His horse might doze saddled in the street if he liked. No man spoke in rudeness or coarseness to his neighbor, as do men in the cities where they have law. No man did injustice to his neighbor, for fair play and an even chance were gods in the eyes of all, eikons above each piñon-burning hearth in all that valley of content. The speech of man was grave and gentle, the movements of man slow, easy and unhurried; neither did any man work by rule, or by clock, or by order. There was no such thing as want or hunger; for did temporary poverty encompass one, was there not always the house of Uncle Jim Brothers, and could not one there hang up his gun behind the door and so obtain credit for an indefinite length of time, entitling him to eat at table with his peers? Had there been such a thing as families in Heart's Desire, be sure such a thing as a woman or child laboring had been utterly unknown. It was a land of men, big, grave, sufficient men, each with a gun upon his hip, and sometimes two, guaranty of peace and calm and content. And any man who has ever lived in a Land Before the Law knows that this is the only fit way of life. Alas! that this scheme, this great, happy, simple, perfect scheme of society should be subverted. And, be it remembered, that this was by reason of nothing more than a pig, an artless, lissom pig, it is true; an infrequent, somewhat prized, a little petted and perhaps spoiled pig, it is true, yet, after all, no fit cause of elemental strife.

But now came this man from Leavenworth, fresh from litigious soil, bearing with him in his faded blue overcoat germs of civilization, seeds of discontent. He wailed aloud that the pride of the community, meaning this pig, which he had brought solitary in a box at the tail of the wagon when he moved in, was now departed; that there was naught left to distinguish this community from any other camp in the mountains; that the pig had been the light of his home, the apple of his eye, the pride of the community; that he had entertained large designs in connection with this pig the following fall; that its taking off was a shame, an outrage, a disgrace, an act utterly illegal, and one for which any man in Kansas would promptly have had the law of his neighbor.

Hitherto the "double roll," even in connection with a curly-tailed black pig, had not been considered actionable in Heart's Desire; but the outcry made by this man from Leavenworth, now the postmaster of the town and in some measure a leader in the meetings of the population, began to attract attention. It began to play upon the nicely attuned instrument of Public Spirit. What, asked the community gravely, was to separate Heart's Desire in the eye of Eastern capital, from any other camp in the far Southwest? Once the town could claim a pig, which no other camp of that district could do. Now it could do so no more forever. This began to put a different look upon the face of things.

"It seems like the ole man took it some hard," said Curly. "He don't seem to remember that I was due to be a member of the family right soon, same as the pig. I don't like to think I'm shy when it comes to comparison with a shoat. Gimme time, and I reckon I could take the place o' the pig in my new dad's affections. But I say deliberate that pigs has got no call to be in a cow country, not none, unless salted. Say, can't we salt this one? Then, who's the worse off for it? Say, what's all this furse about, anyway?"

"That's right, Curly," said Dan Anderson, who stood with hands in pockets and pipe in mouth leaning against the door-jamb in front of his "law office." "You have enunciated a great principle of law in that statement. They have got to prove damages. Moreover, you have got a counter claim. It's laceratin' to be compared to a shoat."

"And me just goin' to be married," said Curly.

"Sure, it ain't right."

"Anderson," said I, moving up to the group, "did you ever hear of such things as champerty or maintenance? The first thing you know you'll get disbarred for stirring up litigation."

"Keep away from my client," said Dan Anderson, grinning. "You're jealous of my professional success, that's all. Neither of us has had a case yet, and now that it looks like I was going to get one, you're jealous. Do you want to pass up the first lawsuit ever held in Donna Ana County? Come now, I'm bored to death. Let's have some fun."

Curly began to shift uneasily on his feet. His hat went still farther back on his red, kinky curls.

"Law!" said he. "Law! You don't mean——" For the first time in his life Curly grew pale. "Why, I'll clean out the hull bunch!" he said, the red surging back in his face and his hand instinctively going to his gun.

"No, you won't," said Dan Anderson. "Do you want to bust up your marriage with the girl from Kansas?"

"Sho!" said Curly, and fell thoughtful. "This looks bad," said he; "mighty bad." He sat down and began to sweat. I do not doubt that Dan Anderson at that moment was a disgrace to his profession, though later he honored it. He winked at me.

"Don't you tamper with my client," said he; and then resumed to Curly: "What you need is a lawyer. You've got to have legal advice. It happens that the full bar of Heart's Desire is now present talking to you. Take your pick. I've got a d——d good idea which is the best lawyer of this bar, but I wouldn't tell you for the world that I'm the one. Take your pick. Here's the whole legal works of the town, us two."

"Law!" said Curly. "Why—law—lawyers! Then who—say, now, I'll pay for the pig. I didn't mean nothin', no way."

Then Dan Anderson rose to certain heights. "You can't settle it that way," said he. "That's too easy. Oh, you can pay for the pig easy enough; but how about the majesty of the law? Where is the peace and dignity of the commonwealth to come in? This is criminal. Nope, you choose. You need a lawyer."

"You—you all got me locoed," said Curly nervously. "Law! Why, I don't want no law. There ain't never been no co'te set here. Down to the county-seat over in Lincoln County, that's all right; but here—why, they don't want no law here. Besides, I can't choose between you two fellers. I like you both. You're both white men. Ef you could rope and shoot better I could git either one of you a job punchin' any day, and thet's a heap better'n practicin' law. I couldn't make no choice between you fellers. Say, I'll hev you both." This with a sudden illumination of countenance.

"That would be unconstitutional," said Dan Anderson solemnly, "and against public policy as well. That would be cornering the whole legal supply of the community, Curly, and it wouldn't leave anybody for the prosecution."

"Sho!" said Curly. Then suddenly he added: "There's the old man. Don't you never doubt he'd prosecute joyful. And there never was a man from Kansas didn't know some law. Why, once, down on the Brazos——"

"He can't act as attorney-at-law," said Anderson. "He's never been admitted to the bar. Say, you flip a dollar."

The thought of chance-taking appealed to Curly. He flipped the dollar.

"Heads, me," said Dan Anderson; and so it fell. That young man smiled blithely. "We'll skin 'em, Curly," said he. "You'll be free as air in less'n a week."

"Now," said Dan Anderson to me, "it's all right thus far. Next we have got to get a Justice of the Peace, and then we've got to get the prisoner arrested."

"'Rested!" said Curly. "Who? Me?"

"Of course," drawled his newly constituted attorney. "Didn't you kill the pig? You just hang around for a little, for when we need you we don't want to have to hunt all over the county."

"All right," said Curly dubiously.

"Where's Blackman?" said Dan Anderson, again addressing me. "We have got to have a judge or we can't have any trial. Come on and let's hunt him up. Curly, don't you run away, mind. You trust to me, and I'll get you clear, and get you married, both."

"All right," said Curly again. "I'll jest sornter down to the Lone Star, and when you all want me I'll be in there, either takin' a drink or playin' a few kyards."

"Let's get Blackman now," said his lawyer. Blackman was the duly constituted Justice of the Peace in and for Heart's Desire. Nobody knew precisely when or how he had been elected, and perhaps indeed he never was elected at all. There must be a beginning for all things. The one thing certain as to Blackman was that he had once been a Justice of the Peace back in Kansas, which fact he had not been slow to announce upon his arrival in Heart's Desire. Perhaps from this arose the local custom of calling him Judge, and perhaps from his wearing the latter title arose the supposition that he really was a judge. The records are quite silent as to the origin of his tenure of office. The office itself, as has been intimated, had hitherto been one purely without care. At every little shooting scrape or other playfulness of the male population, Blackman, Justice of the Peace, became inflated with importance and looked monstrous grave. But nothing ever came of these little alarms, so that gradually the inflations grew less and less extensive. They might perhaps have ceased altogether had it not been for this malignant zeal of Dan Anderson, formerly of Princeton, and now come, hit or miss, to grow up with the country. Blackman was ever ready enough for a lawsuit, forsooth pined for one. Yet what could he do? He could not go forth and with his own hands arrest chance persons and hale them before his own court for trial. The sheriff, when he was in town, simply laughed at him and told his deputies not to mix up with anything except circuit court matters, murders, and more especially horse-stealings. Constable there was none; and policeman—well, one does wonder just a trifle what would have happened to any such thing as a policeman or town marshal in the valley of Heart's Desire! In short, there was neither judicial nor executive arm of the law in action. One may therefore realize the hindrances which Dan Anderson met in getting up his lawsuit. Yet he went forward in the attempt patiently, driven simply by ennui. He did not dream that he was doing something epochal.

Blackman, Justice of the Peace, was sitting in the office of the Golden Age when we found him, reading the exchanges and offering gratuitous advice to the editor. He was a short-ish man, thick both in body and in wits, with sparse hair and hay-colored, ragged mustache. His face was florid, his pale eyes protruded. He was a wise-looking man, excellently well suited in appearance for the office which he filled. We explained to him our errand. Gradually, as the sense of his own new importance dawned upon him, he began to swell, until he apparently assumed a bulk thrice that which he formerly possessed. His spine straightened rigidly; a solemn light came into his eye; a cough that fairly choked with wisdom echoed from his throat. It was a great day for Blackman, J. P.

"Do I know this man, this cowpuncher?" said he. "Of course I know him, blank him, and I know what he done, too. Such a high-handed act never ought to be tolerated, sir! Destroyin' property—why, a-destroyin' of life an' property, fer he killed the pig—and this new family o' citizens, dependin' in part on the pig fer their sustenances this comin' season; to say nuthin' of his nigh shooting me up as I was crossin' the street from the post-office! Try him! Why, o' course we ought to try him. What show have we got if we go on this lawless way? What inducement kin we offer Eastern capital to settle in our midst if, instead of bein' quiet and law-abidin', we go on a-rarin' and a-pitchin' and a-runnin' wide open, every man for hisself? What are we here for, you, and you, and me, if it ain't to set in trile over sech britches of the peace?"

"You're in," said Dan Anderson succinctly. "Get over to your 'dobe. We'll hold this trial right away. I guess all the boys'll know about it by this time. I'll go over and get the prisoner. But, hold on! He ain't arrested yet. Who'll serve the warrant? Pat Garrett (the sheriff) is down on the Hondo, and his deputy, Poe, is out of town. There ain't a soul here to serve a paper. Looks like the court was some rusty, don't it?"

"Warrant!" said the Justice, "Warrant! You don't need no warrant. Wasn't he seen a-doin' the act?"

"Oh, but it wasn't a real first-class felony," demurred Dan with some shade of conscience left.

"Well, I'll arrest him myself," said the Justice. "He's got to be brought to trile."

"Well, now," I ventured to suggest, "that doesn't look exactly right, either, since you are to try the case, Judge. It's legal, but it isn't etiquette."

Blackman scratched his head. "Maybe that's so," said he. Then turning to me, "'Spose you arrest him."

"He can't," said Dan Anderson. "He's the prosecuting attorney—only other lawyer in town. It wouldn't look right for either the judge or prosecutor to make the arrest. Curly might not like it." This all seemed true enough, and we fell into a quandary.

"I'll tell you," said Dan Anderson at length. "I'd better arrest him myself. I'm going to defend him, so it would look more regular for me to bring him in. Looks like he wasn't afraid of the verdict. We ain't, either. I want you to remember, Judge, if you don't clear him——"

Here I interrupted, feeling that the majesty of the law was not fully subserved by threatening the trial judge in advance.

"Well, come along, then," said Anderson. "Let that part of it go. Come over and let's get out the warrant."

I was not with them when the warrant was issued, though that part of the proceedings might naturally have seemed rather the duty of the prosecution than of the defense. Dan Anderson afterward told me that Blackman could not find his law book (he had only one, a copy of the statutes of Kansas) for a long time, and then couldn't find the proper place in it. Legal blanks did not exist in Heart's Desire, and all legal forms had departed from Blackman's mind in this time of excitement. Dan Anderson himself drew the warrant. As it was read later by himself to Curly at the Lone Star it did not lack a certain charm. It began with "Greeting," and ended with, "Now, therefore, in the name of God and the Continental Congress." Anderson did not crack a smile in reading it, and so far as that is concerned, the warrant worked as well as any and better than some. I would give much fine gold to get possession of that document to-day. It might amuse the constituents of the Honorable Daniel Anderson. Curly, because he felt that he was in the hands of his friends, made no special demurrer to the terms of the "writ," and in a few moments the Lone Star was empty and Blackman's adobe was packed.

"Order! order! gentlemen," called Blackman, Justice of the Peace, clearing his throat. "This honorable justice court is now in session. Gentlemen, what is your pleasure?"

He was a little confused, but he meant well. It seemed incumbent upon the prosecutor to make some sort of a statement, but the attorney for the defense interposed. He moved for the discharge of the prisoner on the ground that there was no territorial law and no city ordinance violated; he intimated that the pig had perhaps been killed accidentally, or perhaps in self-defense; the prisoner was wrongfully restrained of his liberty, etc. The ire of Blackman, J. P., at this was something to behold. He to be deprived of his opportunity thus lightly? Hardly! He overruled all this at once and rapped loudly for order.

"The trile will go on," said he.

"Then, Your Honor," cried Dan Anderson, springing to his feet, "then I shall resort to the ancient bulwark of our personal liberties. I shall sue out a writ of habeas corpus, and take this prisoner out of custody. He is wrongfully restrained of his liberty. I will sue this court on its bond—I'll take a change of venue—we'll leave no stone unturned to set this innocent man free and restore him to the bosom of his family!"

This speech produced a great effect, as murmurs of approbation testified. The doughty Justice of the Peace was not, however, so easily to be reckoned with. He pointed out that there was no officer to serve a writ of habeas corpus; that the court had given no bond to anybody and did not propose to do so; that there was no other court to which to apply for a change of "vendew," as he termed it; and reiterated once more that the "trile must go on." The prosecution was, therefore, once more called upon to state the case. Again the attorney for the defense protested, a foreshadowing of his fighting-blood reddening his face.

"I call for a jury," said he. "Does this court suppose we are going to leave the liberty of this prisoner in the hands of a judge openly and notoriously prejudiced as to the facts of this case? I demand a trial by a jury of the defendant's peers."

Blackman reddened, but was game. "Jury goes," said he. "Count out twelve fellers there, beginnin' next the door."

"Twelve!" said Dan Anderson, for the moment almost losing his gravity. "I thought this court might be content with six for a justice's jury; but realizing the importance of this court we are willing to agree on twelve."

It was so agreed. The jury took in every man in the little room but three. "They'll do for a veniry," said Blackman, J. P., learnedly. Under the circumstances one can perhaps forgive him for becoming at times a trifle mixed as to legal proceedings.

At least, it was easy to agree as to the jury; for obviously all the population of the place was fully acquainted with all the facts in the case, and each one had freely expressed his opinion upon the one side or the other. There seemed to be no reason for excusing any juror for cause; and upon the other hand, there are often very good reasons in a Land Before the Law for not bringing up personal matters of this kind. Indeed, the trial judge settled all that. He looked over the twelve good men and true thus segregated, and remarked briefly, "They're his peers, all right. The trile will now proceed."

Whereupon he swore them solemnly and made a record in his fee-book, to the later consternation of his jurors. "Ain't this court a notary, too?" said Blackman later. "And ain't a notary entitled to so much fee for administerin' a oath? And didn't I administer twelve oaths?" There was small answer to this, after all. The laborer is worthy of his hire; and Blackman really labored in this case as in all likelihood few justices ever did before or since.

The prosecuting attorney, who, it may be seen, held his office much as did the justice of the peace, by the doctrine of nemine contradicente, now arose and made the opening statement. There was some doubt as to whether this was a civil or criminal trial, but there was no doubt whatever of the existence of a trial of some kind; neither did there exist any doubt as to the importance of this, the first case the prosecuting attorney had ever tried, outside of moot courts. It was the first speech he had ever made in public, barring college "orations," carefully memorized, and an occasional Fourth of July speech which might have been better for more memorizing. The attorney for the prosecution, however, arose to the occasion—at least to a certain extent. He spoke in low and feeling tones of the struggling little community of hardy souls thus set down apart in the far-off mountain country of the West; of its trials, its hopes, its ambitions, of its expectations of becoming a mountain emporium which should be the pride of the entire territory; he went on to mention the necessity for law and order, pointing out the danger to the public interests of the community which must lie in a general reputation for ruffianism and lawlessness, showing how Eastern capital must ever be timid in visiting a town of such reputation, apart from investing any money therein; then, changing to the personal phases of the case, he spoke of the absolute disregard of law shown in the act charged, mentioned the red-handed deed of this lawless and dangerous person who had thus slain a pig, no less the pride of the community than the idol of the family now bereft.

At this point the jury began to look much perturbed and solemn and the prisoner very red and uneasy. Prosecution closed by offering to prove all charges by competent testimony. This latter was a dangerous proposition to advance. We could not well ask the jurymen to testify, and of the "veniry," more than half had now slipped out for a hurried and excited visit at the Lone Star, there to advise their countrymen of what was going on at Blackman's adobe.

Counsel for the defense arose calmly to make his opening statement. My heart leaped when I saw Dan Anderson then. In a flash I saw the success which later was to be his in the forensic arena. The man was a natural criminal lawyer. It was simply destiny which had driven him into this comedy, this little farce of his own arrangement. He had merely longed to be at his art, at his profession, had simply longed to be using the weapons which he felt ready in his hands. It was not comedy now, when Dan Anderson arose and faced judge and jury here in Blackman's adobe. It was the gravity of the Law which sat upon his face and which was reflected to the soul of every man there present. There came a swift, sudden chill, a gripping as of iron, a darkening, a shrinking of the heart of each man in that little room. It was the coming of the Law! Ah! Dan Anderson, you ruined our little paradise; and now its walls are down forever, even the walls of our city of content, in the golden valley of Heart's Desire.

Dan Anderson stood, young, tall and grave, one hand in the bosom of his shirt, for hardly one present wore a coat. His posture was calm, self-possessed, easy, graceful. He had his audience with him before he spoke. When he began he caught them the tighter to his cause, using not merely flowing rhetoric of speech, but the close-knit, advancing, upbuilding argument of a man able to "think on his feet," that higher sort of oratory which is most convincing with an American audience or an American jury. And they who listened knew vaguely that a new influence had now come to Heart's Desire, and that the advocate thereof, its proper apostle, was now speaking to them in the person of this man, who but a day before had seemed a mere boy.

HE HAD HIS AUDIENCE WITH HIM BEFORE HE SPOKE

The statement of the prosecution, said Dan Anderson, was on the whole a fair one, and no discredit to the learned brother making it. In any case at law there must perforce be two sides, that of prosecution and that of defense. It was the duty of prosecution to so specify and to prove if possible wherein the law of the land or of the community had been violated. None would more readily than himself yield acquiescence to the statement that law and order must prevail; that here, in this little community, the old ways must cease, and the course of the ancient social compact set on, as in the older communities of the world. Without law there could be nothing but anarchy, and under anarchy progress was at an end. The individual must give up something of his rights to the state and the community. He gave up a certain amount of liberty, but received therefor an equivalent in protection, in the support of the whole community, so long as he observed that law which was the expressed will of all; the united and joint judgment of all as to what was right and just. Under the social compact each man might feel that he was not alone, but that with him were many brothers, ready to protect him, his family, his property, which otherwise must fall to any who might by force possess himself thereof. The law was, therefore, no oppressor, no monster, no usurer, no austere being, reaping where it had not sown. The law was nothing to be dreaded, nothing to be feared; and indeed, upon the other hand, it was nothing to be scorned. To prosecute offenses was no disgrace; it was a duty.

There must be a beginning, continued Anderson, laying another premise for his argument. There must be something established. The pound measure was one pound, the same all over the country; a yard measure was a yard, and there was no guesswork about it. It was the same. It was a unit. So with the law. It must be the same, a unit, soulless, unfeeling, just, unchangeable. There must be no guesswork about it. There must be no mutability in that principle which took hold of the very gates of Heaven and placed itself brother and kin to Him in whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. By the united will, the joint consent, the recorded joint consent of the entire social body in regard to certain specific and easily recognizable acts, the attitude of the law was thus or so, and not otherwise. It was not subject to change. Very well. This was the law and it was right. It was not for the individual to pass upon any of these questions. It was for the courts to do so, the approved machinery set aside, under the social compact, for reducing the friction of the wheels of society, for securing the permanency of things beneficial to that society, and for removing things injurious thereto. The Law itself was immutable. It was right, because the ultimate spirit of fair play had said that it was right. The courts must administer that Law without malice, without feeling, impersonally, justly.

In so far as there had hitherto been no Law in Heart's Desire, went on the speaker, thus far had our citizens dwelt in barbarism, had indeed been unfit, under the very definition of things, to bear the proud title of citizen of America, the justest, the most order-loving, as well as the bravest and the most aggressive nation of the world. The time had now come for the establishment in this community of the Law, that beneficent agency of progress, that indispensable factor, that inseparable attendant upon civilization. Upon the sky should blaze no more the red riot of anarchy and barbarism. Upon the summit of the noble mountain overtopping this happy valley there should sit no more the grinning figure of malevolent and unrestrained vice, but the pure form of the blind Goddess of Justice, holding ever aloft over this happy land the unfaltering sword and the unwavering scales, so that all might look thereon, the rightdoers in smiling security, the wrongdoing in terror of their deed. This was the Law.

"And now, gentlemen of this jury," said Dan Anderson, "I stand here before you to make no excuses for this Law, to palliate nothing in the way of its workings, to set no tentative or temporizing date for the time of the arrival at this place of the image of the Law. I say to you here to-day, at this hour, that image now sits there enthroned above us. The Law is not to come. It has come! It is here! We are in its holy presence, before its sacred altar, which no man may violate. Every one of us here, attorney, juryman, witness, is a servant in this temple of the Law; the servant of this court, who in turn is the servant of the Law; which in turn is the servant of the people of America; who, thank God! are the absolute slaves of the undying principles of justice and fair play."

The old days were, therefore, done, he went on. Henceforth we must observe the Law. We were here now with the intention of observing that Law. Should we therefore fear it? Should we dread the decision of this distinguished servant of the Law? By no means. To show that the Law was no dragon, no demon, he would now, in the very face of that Law, in the very face of the full severity of that Law, proceed to clear this innocent man of that cloud of doubt and suspicion which for a brief moment the social body had cast upon him—not in malice, but only in a desire for the good of all. He would show to the gentlemen of this jury and to this honorable court that there had been no violation of the Law through any act of his client, this honest, open-faced, intelligent young gentleman, long known among them as an upright and fair-dealing man. The Law, just, exact, would now protect this prisoner, just as it would assure these others of the social body that they, too, had had protection. The pound was a pound. The yard was a yard. The Law was the Law. It was no matter of guesswork. If the lawmakers representing us all had failed to set down certain stipulations, it was not for us now and here to seek to remedy that lack. We must not seek to be judge and jury and legislator, each for himself. We must take the Law as we found it. Otherwise we destroyed all the intent and purpose of that Law, and left ourselves utterly without protection, naught but barbarians, after all. This was no case in equity. This judge could not do merely what he supposed was right. He must do what the Law told him to do; and if he did not, the Law would punish him for his failure to do so. The prosecution must, therefore, show that some specific article of the Law had been violated. The State must show from competent testimony that an act of transgression, specific, unmistakable, had been committed. We must not suppose, or guess, or believe that perhaps it might have been committed. We must know that it had been committed, and at the time and place charged, and by the person accused. If there were any doubt as to the testimony, any shadow of wavering in its fabric, it must be shown that there was a reasonable motive for this act charged, at the specific time and place charged. There must be no guessing at that. The Law did not deal in hit-or-miss. It took no chances. In its greatness of love and charity and kindness, in its transcendent hope that each and every man was innocent, in its wish that each and every man should have that freedom and personal liberty which made the dearest birthright given to humanity, the Law demanded that the social body should hold this man untainted, pure and innocent, until by such absolute proof he had been shown specifically guilty. It was not for the defense to take the first step in this matter. The burden of proof must lie upon the prosecution. His client was innocent until the prosecution had advanced and made its proof. Upon the failure of that attempt he would still remain innocent, uninjured, untainted, free.

"Now," continued Dan Anderson, casting an eye about him as calmly as could have done any old trial lawyer examining the condition of his jury, "what are the charges made by the State? That the law of the Territory has been violated? The prosecution specifies no section or paragraph of the statutes of this Territory holding it unlawful to shoot any dangerous wild beast at large in this community. We do not admit that our client shot anything, or shot at anything whatever. We shall prove that at the time mentioned he was engaged in a simple, harmless and useful pastime, a pastime laudable of itself, since it tends to make the participant therein a better and more useful citizen. We reserve our defense as to those heads pending a review of the evidence which shall have been introduced by the State. You will agree with me that it is beneath contempt to think that for a single moment any human life has been in danger from any act, any innocent, unmalicious act of this good young man who thus sits before you under the stigma of a vague and unspecified crime. There is no territorial law forbidding any act which he is here charged with committing. Neither has the body social in this thriving community placed upon its records any local law, any indication that a man may not do without let or hindrance any act such as those charged vaguely against this good young man, who has only availed himself

Pretenders and Rois Fainéants

By William T. Stead

THIS series of articles would be incomplete if it were exclusively devoted to those genuine Money Kings of the modern world of finance. In the world of finance as in the political world we have Pretenders who pose as the genuine rulers, but sooner or later come to ignominious collapse, and millionaires who are rois fainéants, do-nothing monarchs, mere King Logs in the financial world. In England there have been several, and in Russia at one time the False Dmitri almost succeeded in establishing permanently his claim to rule; so in the financial world we have pretenders to sovereignty, men who for a season usurp a controlling position in the money market. They hold their court, they have their parasites and flatterers, and they are acclaimed in all the newspapers as veritable monarchs; and then some fine day the smash comes and they are seen no more. It is unfortunate that of late years England has produced no Money King of the genuine breed, but as if to make up for this deficiency she has produced an exceptional number of pseudo-kings, adventurers who came from nothing and returned thither, but who made a more or less meteoric display of their capacity for swindling the public. The Swindler King is a variety with which the investing public is only too familiar. He is sometimes a thief pure and simple who escapes imprisonment merely because his stealings are done on such a large scale that the very magnitude of his larcenies secures him immunity. There are others who cannot be said to be swindlers inasmuch as they do not intentionally deceive the public. They began by deceiving themselves, and in all honesty and sincerity of purpose they succeeded in inducing multitudes of their fellow-men to invest millions in worthless securities in the full conviction that they were playing the part of great philanthropists in making the fortunes of all their friends. The most remarkable of the latter type was undoubtedly John Law, of the great Mississippi Bubble, which about two hundred years ago made him the Money King of Old France. We have had no one in later years who could compare with John Law. That enterprising Scotchman cornered a whole realm, and the King made him practically supreme over the national exchequer. Nearly all pseudo-kings go up like a rocket only to come down like the stick, and John Law was no exception. In three years he had soared to the zenith and had fallen out of sight. Yet, although the craze in which he rose to such astounding notoriety cost the public millions, Law himself profited nothing by their folly, and died some years afterward in Venice little better than a beggar.

The King Pin of the Pretenders

It has been noticed as a curious fact that in the United States the financial genius who founds a great fortune does so usually upon a solid basis, and while founding his own dynasty contributes at the same time to the prosperity and development of the community. He may exact too large a profit or toll from the public for his services, but he renders services. Even the predatory monopolist who bribes aldermen to betray the public trust by handing over the street franchises for a mere song or for mere boodle, does build the street railway and operates it for the benefit of the public as well as for his own profit. In England for many years we have not witnessed any sudden rise of great fortunes with the possible exception of Sir Thomas Lipton, whose fortune, however, was not made in finance; but we have had a succession of pseudo-kings who for the time being have played the part of reigning financiers for a short season. Of these men we have had five examples. The first was the German Gottheimer, who made a great fortune and lost it under the name of Baron Grant. After Grant came Mr. Jabez Balfour, of the Liberator Building Society, who at the height of his glory sat in Parliament, and who in the depths of his disgrace was consigned to a convict prison. He is notable as being the only one of these pseudo-kings who was actually clapped into jail. The others all escaped any other punishment than that of standing in the pillory of the bankruptcy court or of being gibbeted in the public press.

The third was Mr. Bottomley, who figured as a small Pierpont Morgan in his way, with a craze for amalgamating concerns; but unlike Mr. Morgan he had no millions at his back, and the companies which he amalgamated for the most part gained nothing by amalgamation and lost a great deal. The fourth, and one of the most extraordinary types, was Mr. Hooley, the company promoter, whose financial methods were as crude as they were daring, and whose phenomenal success was one of the great city scandals of the last century. Finally we have as the latest specimen Mr. Whitaker Wright, the promoter whose affairs have been for the last two years under the examination of the courts. Each of these contemporary financial pretenders pursued his ends in his own particular method, but there are certain features common to all. They were none of them men of culture, education or position. Apart from their capacity to impose upon the credulity of the investing public none of them had any exceptional ability. The methods by which all rose to their temporary notoriety were substantially the same.

The late Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Russell, of Killowen, took occasion a year or two before his death to set forth in an address to the newly elected Lord Mayor a statement of the methods by which the fraudulent company promoter obtained great wealth without either honest toil or honest endeavor; he mentioned no names—nor was it necessary. Neither do I suggest that any of the men whom I have named adopted any or all of the methods stigmatized by Lord Russell. But it was in the world of such company promoters they made their pile. He described the methods by which such men rose to the possession of riches under four heads. First, the promoter would secure a property honestly worth $500,000. A flaming prospectus would then be drawn up putting an extravagant estimate upon the value of the property and securing credence for the assertions of the prospectus by printing certain well-known names of peers, members of Parliament, and others as members of the board of directors. These directors, whose names are accepted by the public as a guarantee of the honesty of the company and the bona-fide nature of the property offered to them for sale, are men who for the most part sell their names for money down, and become thereby accomplices in the fraud practiced upon the public. The same methods are employed in the second class of frauds mentioned by the Lord Chief Justice. The second class differs from the first, inasmuch as in the first case the promoter has a really valuable property to dispose of, although it may be worth only a quarter or one-fifth of the price at which he offers it to the public. In the second class the property itself is purely imaginary. Lord Russell mentioned one case in which property on the West Coast of Africa was said to have been sold for $240,000. There was no property in existence for which any such sum had been paid, but an agent who was sent to the West Coast to examine into the matter reported that there was a piece of property which had been bought for $700 from a native chief which bore some resemblance to that described in the prospectus. In another case a promoter bought a business for $3000. He then put it on the market and sold it to a credulous public for $380,000.

The third method of fraud is that of allotting shares when an insufficient capital has been subscribed, the promoter taking possession of the money, and the directors who are his creatures issuing debentures. The company then buys largely from unsuspecting creditors who know nothing of the debentures. When difficulties come the debenture holders sweep off every stick that belongs to the company, and the creditors are left without a remedy. The fourth and last method mentioned by Lord Russell was where one man consents to convert his business into a limited liability company. He takes payment in debentures. The company then runs into debt, the original founder, who is the debenture holder, holds the property, and when they stop payment the creditors are left out in the cold. The Lord Chief Justice declared that these nefarious practices of the company promoter entailed, according to statistics furnished him by the Official Receiver, an average net loss to the public of $20,000,000 a year. In the years 1891-'97 $28,000,000 had been lost either by shareholders or creditors owing to one or another of these descriptions of fraud in companies which had been wound up compulsorily. How much had been lost in cases in which the Official Receiver did not intervene no one knows.

The Stock-in-Trade of the Promoter

The stock-in-trade of the fraudulent promoter who aspires to be a Money King in the London market is very simple. He needs unlimited assurance and implicit belief in the gullibility of the public, and the capacity to divine what kind of bait the public will rise to most greedily. Given these qualities and the necessary minimum of money to enable him to make a start there is no reason why he should not succeed for at least two or three years. They nearly all act in the same way both in the raising of money and the spending of it. Mr. Hooley frankly avowed that nearly everything depended upon the first page of his prospectus. If it was garnished with popular names and had an attractive appearance the money came in freely enough, especially if the newspaper press had been induced to sound the praises of the new investment in the form of a series of judicious paragraphs paid for directly or indirectly before the stock was offered to the public. It is all very like the proceedings in the thieves' kitchen, in which peers, baronets, and men holding names well known in society consent for money down to join hand in hand with needy pressmen and unscrupulous financial editors who conspire, the one by lending their names, the other by lending their pens, to lure the investing public into the toils of the company promoter, who recognizes the buying of titled directors and the bribing of a venal press to be the essential factors of his success. Mr. Hooley once bought an Earl for $125,000 down to serve on the board of directors of a company which he was promoting, and according to his own statements made in court he spent $750,000 in propitiating the press. Mr. Hooley did this in a naked and unashamed fashion which gave considerable scandal. He posed as a shining light of the Conservative party, and paid a Conservative baronet, who at one time had been Judge Advocate General, the sum of $50,000 to secure his election to the Carlton Club. He subscribed $50,000 to the election funds of the Carlton Club. In return for his liberality Mr. Hooley said he was promised a safe seat in Parliament, but this did not content his soaring ambition. He wanted to be made a Jubilee baronet and sent a check for $250,000 to the Conservative party organization, in the firm belief that the money being paid down the baronetcy would be given him in due course. This crude method of procedure, however, caused the gorge of the Conservatives to rise, and Mr. Hooley's check was returned.

As all these pseudo-kings make their money freely so they spend it with a lavish hand. Baron Grant built a house which was the talk of London. He laid out Leicester Square as a public garden, and in the centre erected a statue to Shakespeare. Mr. Hooley's distribution of money was on an equally lavish scale. He lived at the rate of £10,000 a year, and gave away four times that amount. His penchant was to endow churches, and he created no small scandal by presenting St. Paul's Cathedral with gold communion plate to the value of $7500. Mr. Whitaker Wright, the latest of the pseudo-kings who have attained notoriety, lives like a great noble at his country-seat at Lee Park, in the County of Surrey. Mr. Whitaker Wright's companies have been in the bankruptcy court, but he himself has managed to escape bankruptcy. Mr. Hooley is an undischarged bankrupt, but he lives in luxury at Papworth Hall in the Midlands, where he is the impecunious guest of his wife, who in the days of his fleeting prosperity seems somehow to have come into the possession of considerable property.

Editor's Note—This is the sixth article in a series of eight by Mr. Stead on the Money Kings of the World.

The precise sum which the public lost by the ascendency of these adventurers cannot be accurately ascertained. Baron Grant, with his Emma Mine and other enterprises of a similar nature, is said to have cost the investing public about $20,000,000. In the Liberator smash the unfortunate investors, most of them people in very poor circumstances, who had put their little all into the building society managed by Balfour, lost $10,000,000. As to the loss suffered through Mr. Hooley, between 1894 and 1898 he promoted fifteen cycle companies and nine other corporations with a nominal capital of $90,000,000. He bought these concerns for $45,000,000. He then converted them into new corporations, selling them to the stockholders for $70,000,000. His gross profit was $25,000,000, but according to the statement made by the Official Receiver, the promotion expenses swallowed up $5,000,000, and $20,000,000 was lost in selling shares at a discount and buying at a premium to deliver on contracts, together with payments made to other persons who had a share in the profits. The net result of the promotion of these companies was a loss of $445,000.

The case of Mr. Whitaker Wright deserves special attention because of the light which it sheds upon the practical working of British institutions. It is the peculiar distinction of Mr. Whitaker Wright that his financial operations have been made the subject of an exhaustive official report which sets forth in plain and unmistakable terms the nature and the extent of his operations. Yet when the Attorney-General was appealed to to instruct the Public Prosecutor to take proceedings against Mr. Wright he refused to move. Why? That is the question which every one is asking. In default of any official information rumor is busy with all manner of stories, which are passed from one gossip to another in the city until they attain the most extravagant proportions. The almost universal belief in England is that Mr. Wright involved too many people of the Smart Set in his operations for the Government to dare to institute a public prosecution. That he influenced the press is admitted. That he allowed many seedy people in society a share is loudly asserted, but this in itself would hardly suffice to explain the inaction of the Government; hence people say, as they always do whenever anything is hushed up, "the Court is in it." So far as the King is concerned the report is as baseless as the equally persistent rumor that the South African inquiry was hushed up in order to conceal the King's share in the financial speculations preceding the Jameson Raid. The story goes that the King received £10,000 in order to induce the Marquis of Dufferin to become chairman of Mr. Wright's ill-fated company. Of this there is not a particle of evidence and it seems to be a lie on the face of it. Much more persistent and much less improbable is the story that Mr. Wright succeeded in compromising another member of the Royal family, who has a country-seat near Mr. Wright's, by allowing him to "stand in" with one of the many deals by which Mr. Whitaker Wright enriched his friends at the expense of the public. Rumor asserts that the name of a certain Royal Duke is to be found on the books of the bankrupt company, and other gossips profess to know that the profit of the Royal Duke in question amounted to not less than two hundred thousand dollars. Whatever truth or untruth there may be in these rumors they are greedily swallowed by the public.

It is some relief to turn from these pretending Money Kings who are accorded such strange immunity in Great Britain to British Money Kings of another order, the "Do-Nothing Kings." These millionaires are so far from swaying any sceptre that they are hardly known to exist until they die and their estates become chargeable with death duties. We hear comparatively little about millionaires in England, but they are numerous enough, as the statistics prove. Last year there were five estates which paid death duties on more than $5,000,000 each; the total value of their estates amounted to nearly $50,000,000. Of the five men whose estates in 1897 were reported more than $5,000,000 each, not one was a man of political importance. Lord Fitz William, who headed the list with an estate valued at nearly $15,000,000, had as a peer a seat in the House of Lords, and as a great landowner exercised considerable local influence in places where his property lay, but was absolutely a cipher in the great world of politics or finance. The same might be said of the second in the list, an old Greek merchant of the name of Vagliano, who died worth $14,000,000, but whose very existence was almost unknown to the public until the extent of his fortune was printed in the papers. The third, Mr. Sutton, who left $10,000,000 to be spent in the improvement of the houses of the working-classes, made all his money as a carrier of parcels, or what would be called in America a founder of an express company. He was a useful man as a carrier, and his money will be spent in the erection of model dwellings, but in society or in politics he was an absolute nonentity. The fourth millionaire who died this year was a rubber merchant of the name of Dick; he amassed a fortune of $5,000,000 in Glasgow, but despite his wealth he does not seem to have wielded any local influence, and in politics he was a cipher. And so we might go through the list. The English millionaires who make their money in trade or manufactures are for the most part men of little or no imagination and no ambition beyond that of amassing wealth. Sometimes they enter Parliament, but no millionaire in the House of Commons, with one or two exceptions, has been so influential as plain John Burns, the labor member for Battersea. One of those exceptions, almost the only millionaire who attained Cabinet rank, was W. H. Smith, who began life little better than a newsboy and who established a monopoly for supplying newspapers on the great English railways, and he died a Cabinet Minister, leaving behind him a fortune of nearly $9,000,000. In the last fifteen years eighteen millionaires' estates exceeding $10,000,000 paid toll to the Exchequer. The total value of these eighteen estates was $216,000,000. Three were members of the House of Lords, two were foreign Barons, three were Americans, but none of them could be said to have been other than a roi fainéant as far as his money was concerned. Mr. Smith wielded political power which he would never have gained had he been a poor man, but his wealth alone would never have made him leader of the House of Commons.

The British millionaire is an unobtrusive person for the most part. South Africa with its gold and diamonds has produced several Money Kings of a different stamp from those who make their money within the United Kingdom. Barney Barnato, Mr. Robinson and Mr. Beit are all potentates of a different order. Barnato is dead; Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Beit if he lives, will probably be more potent in settling the future of the Transvaal than Mr. Chamberlain or Lord Milner. But Mr. Beit was reared in the school of Mr. Rhodes, and he has succeeded to a part of his inheritance.

It is characteristic of these steady-going, stolid British millionaires that they are a long-lived race; the possession of great wealth seems distinctly favorable to longevity. It is not the case with the genuine Money King who rules as well as reigns. Hirsch, Barney Barnato and Rhodes all died at a comparatively early age, but the average life of the British millionaires of the steady-going variety who concentrate their attention upon making their pile, and leave other people to do the ruling, is from seventy to seventy-five years of age.

The result, from this very imperfect survey of a field full of interesting facts, is that the United Kingdom is much less fertile in the production of Money Kings than the United States. Possibly the English, having a real Royal family, are indifferent to the millionaire kingship. Mr. Rhodes used to dream of a mission to millionaires, which was to result in the pooling of those great aggregations of wealth in one joint fund, the annual interest of which was to be devoted to the promotion of great political ideas. His missionaries would certainly have had a tough task before them in tackling the British millionaire of the average stamp. Sir William Harcourt probably took a safer and certainly a more direct road to the utilization of the accumulated wealth of the British Money Kings when he carried the law imposing heavy death duties upon the estates of the rich. In Great Britain the death duties, as they are called, yield to the Exchequer the sum of $90,000,000 every year—that is to say, the State appropriates at death for the use of the nation at large a sum equivalent to ninety fortunes of one million dollars each. The death duties have become one of the sheet-anchors of the Exchequer. Contrary to the many lugubrious vaticinations, this tax does not seem to have impaired in the least the instinct of the moneyed classes to accumulate wealth.

A ROYAL PLAYWRIGHT

By Vance Thompson

THE TRIALS OF HIS COLLABORATION WITH LEONCAVALLO THE COMPOSER

THE Emperor of Germany, tired of playing an operatic rôle chosen for him by ancestral stage managers, recently wrote an opera. By chance I know all about it; indeed, with a critical eye I scanned the Imperial first and second acts; they are very good, too—tremendously theatrical. The Emperor took Roland for his hero—that paladin of the court of Charlemagne—the famous hero of mediæval chivalry. He chose Leoncavallo to compose the music. Unquestionably Leoncavallo is the foremost operatic composer of our day. So the Emperor did well. This great man is about five feet four in height and weighs two hundred and sixty pounds. He is not fat; he is simply big and muscular. When he is seated he looks like a middle-aged giant—with his square shoulders, his huge mustache and his big head; when he stands up you look down to see what has become of his legs.

He came to Paris for a week's respite from Roland, leaving the wife and babies at their home in Italy. He spent the week with an American friend in Auteuil. Of course the Parisians breakfasted and dined him. He lunched with Gaillard, the manager of the Opera House, one day; that night the composers and musicians of Paris had arranged a banquet at which he was to be the guest of honor. The luncheon lasted a long time. At four o'clock Leoncavallo said: "Excuse me, I must go up to Auteuil and dress for the banquet."

Gaillard took him to the station and put him on the little train which runs in a circle round Paris, stopping at Auteuil as it stops everywhere else. And the train started; it stopped and went on—always the trainmen shouted vague names of stations; Leoncavallo sat still and the little train ran on; it dipped into tunnels and crept under streets; it went round and round Paris—stopping every now and then at Auteuil. After two hours of this riding in a ring, the composer lost patience and got out. As luck would have it he found himself at the station he had started from—so he took a cab and came up pell-mell to Auteuil.

"I've only time to shave and dress," he said to the lady of the house.

"Oh, but there are some telegrams for you," she explained; "I laid them here on the table."

Leoncavallo read one of them—it was from his wife. Another was from his publisher in Milan. These he answered. Suddenly he roared aloud. The harmless Americans who did not know what a composer was, and were drinking mild tea in the adjoining room, came rushing in. Leoncavallo held a blue telegraph slip in one hand and was tearing his hair with the other.

"I won't put up with it," he shouted; "he has telegraphed me again—the same thing—about the second act! I won't stand it even from an Emperor! I told him once—go away, let me answer this telegram in peace—go away!"

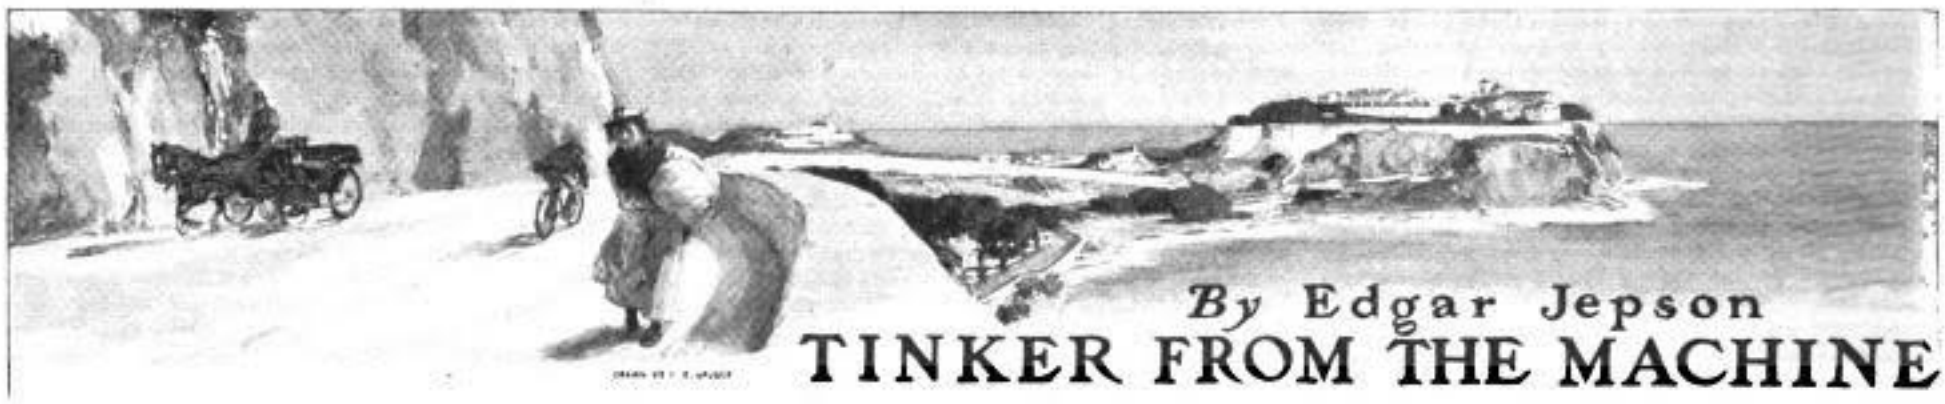
The Americans went meekly away and drank their tea. Only the man of the house lingered.

"What's it all about?" he asked.

"That scene in the second act—the Emperor has telegraphed again—he can't change it now—— Now get out and let me answer this telegram. I'll speak my mind once for all. He may be the Emperor of Germany, but I am Leoncavallo. Go away—let me answer this!"

The man of the house went away and drank tea; time passed—just as it does in historical novels; it was seven o'clock; it was half-past seven—always the composer kept on composing his telegram to his Imperial collaborator. A quarter of eight. Suddenly Leoncavallo stormed into the tea-room, waving a sheet of letter-paper.

"That will answer him," he said grimly. "Only two days ago I told him the same thing—but this will settle it. Where's the nearest telegraph office? At the corner?"



Hatless and fierce the great composer rushed out without waiting for an answer. Then the lady of the house asked the man of the house what it was all about, and when he told her she said:

"You idiots! That wasn't a new telegram—it's the one he got when he first came—I put it on the table because I thought he might want to keep it as a souvenir."

So the hatless host ran after the hatless composer and caught him just as he was sending off the telegram. He explained matters and dragged the excited musician home again—so perhaps, after all, he is the real author of the Roland which the Emperor Wilhelm and Leoncavallo would doubtless claim as their own.

THE ADMIRABLE TINKER

By Edgar Jepson

TINKER FROM THE MACHINE

"I've been thinking it over," said Hildebrand Anne Beauleigh with a very serious air, "and I've come to the conclusion that I ought to get Elsie a governess."

"My dear Tinker," said his father, "if you add to our household at your present rate, I foresee myself buying a caravan and traversing Europe in state."

"Like a circus," said Tinker brightening. "It would be great fun—for a while. I think," he added thoughtfully, "that I could brighten Europe up a bit."

"I do not doubt it," said Sir Tancred politely.

"Well, you see, sir, it's like this," said Tinker. "When I adopted Elsie you said I was to take all the responsibility, and I think I ought to look after her education; it's no good adopting sisters by halves."

"You are right, of course," said Sir Tancred. "But I'm sorry for you. For a boy of twelve your knowledge of the things taught by governesses is small. Your spelling, now: it is—shall we say phonetic?"

"I don't think a gentleman ought to spell too well, any more than he ought to speak French with too good an accent," said Tinker firmly.

"There's a good deal in what you say," said Sir Tancred. "But I'm afraid that when Elsie has learnt geography—say the position of Schleswig-Holstein and Roumania and Leeds, and other such places to which we should never dream of going, she might look down on you for knowing only the towns on the great railways of Europe and America."

"She might. But I don't think she's like that, though of course with a girl you never can tell. I think it's more likely she would want to teach me where they are. But she ought to be educated, and I must chance it."

"Well, if you ought, you must," said Sir Tancred. "But one thing I do beg of you: do not have her taught the piano—the barrel organ if you like; but not the piano."

"No; I won't. A piano would be so awkward to move about—it would want a van to itself."

"I was thinking rather of the peculiar noises it makes in the hands of the inexperienced," said Sir Tancred.

"I know," said Tinker in a tone of genuine sympathy.

Tinker went to Elsie, whom he had left in the gardens of the Casino, and told her that his father had given him leave to get her a governess. They had already talked over the matter at length; but on hearing that it was so near accomplishment her face fell, and she said: "Don't—don't you think I ought to help choose her?"

"It wouldn't be regular," said Tinker firmly.

After déjeuner he caught a train to Nice, and went straight to Madame Butler, that stay of those who seek maids, companions, nurses or governesses on the Riviera. He sent in his card, and was straightway ushered into the office where she received her clients. She was sitting at a desk, and by one of the windows sat a very pretty young lady who looked as if she were waiting to interview a possible employee. A certain surprise showed itself on the face of Madame Butler; she had plainly expected a client of more mature years.

Tinker bowed and sat down.

"You wished to see me—on business?" said Madame Butler with some hesitation.

"Yes," said Tinker. "I want a governess for my sister—my adopted sister. I'm responsible for her, and I've decided that she must be educated. I told my father, Sir Tancred Beauleigh, and he gave me leave to get her a governess. So I came to you."

"Yes," said Madame Butler, smiling; "and what kind of a governess do you want?"

The pretty young lady, who had been regarding Tinker with smiling interest, turned away with the proper delicacy and looked out of the window. Tinker's face wore a very serious, almost anxious air. "I've worked it out carefully," he said. "Elsie's ten years old, two years younger than I am, and there is no need for her governess to have degrees or certificates or that kind of thing; she will only have to teach her to write nicely and do sums, not fractions, of course; useful sums, and some needlework, and look after her when I'm not about. So I want a lady, young and English; and I should like her to be a bit of a sportswoman, don't you know? I mean," he added in careful explanation, "I should like her to be cheerful and good-natured, and not fussy about the things that really don't matter."

"I think I know the kind of governess you want," said Madame Butler. She ran her eye over two or three pages of her ledger, and added, "But I'm very much afraid that I haven't one of that kind on my books at present."

"That's a pity," said Tinker. "Must I wait long?"

"I'm afraid so. People chiefly want ladies with certificates and degrees, so the others don't offer themselves."

The pretty young lady turned from the window with the quickness of one suddenly making up her mind.

"How should I do?" she said in a charming voice.

Madame Butler turned toward her quickly with raised eyebrows, but said nothing. Tinker turned, too, and his face lighted up with an angelic smile. He looked at the pretty young lady carefully, and then at the pretty young lady's tailor-made gown, and the smile faded out of his face.

"I'm afraid," he said sorrowfully, "you would be too expensive."

"What salary were you thinking of giving?" she said with a brisk, businesslike directness.

"Thirty pounds a year," said Tinker; and then he added hastily: "Of course it's very little; but really the work would be quite light, and we should try to make things pleasant for her."

"But surely, for a governess without certificates, that's a very good salary. Isn't it, Madame Butler?"

"It is, indeed," said Madame.

"It can't be, really," said Tinker. "But I suppose people are mean."

"Well, it would satisfy me," said the pretty young lady. "But unfortunately I'm an American, and you want an Englishwoman."

"I only don't want a foreigner," said Tinker. "I should be awfully pleased if you would take the post."

"The pleasure will be mine," said the pretty young lady. "And about references? I'm afraid I cannot get them in less than ten days."

"Pardon," said Tinker. "Your face is good enough for me. I mean, it is really quite reference enough."

The pretty young lady flushed with pleasure, and said, "That is very nice of you—but your father might think them necessary."

"This is my show—I mean, this matter is entirely in my hands: I look after Elsie altogether. And I think we might consider it settled. My name is Hildebrand Anne Beauleigh."

"My name is Dorothy Rayner."

"Rainer?" said Tinker with sudden alertness. "There is an American millionaire called Rainer."

"I spell my name with a 'y'," said Dorothy quickly. Madame Butler once more raised her eyebrows.

"Well, when will you come to us? We are staying at the Hotel des Princes at Monte Carlo."

"To-day is Wednesday. Shall we say Saturday morning?"

"Yes; that will do very well. Oh, by the way, I was quite forgetting—about music."

"I'm afraid," said Dorothy, and her face fell, "I can't teach music."

"That's all right," said Tinker cheerfully. "My father was terribly afraid that any one I got would want to."

He explained to Dorothy their nomadic mode of life; paid Madame Butler her fee; bade them good-by, and went his way. On his return he found Elsie full of anxious curiosity; but his account of his find set her mind at rest. He ended by saying: "It will be awfully nice for you, don't you know? She looked as though she would let you kiss her as often as you wanted to."

"But I shall kiss you just the same, night and morning," said Elsie firmly.

"Of course, of course," said Tinker quickly, and by a manful effort he kept the brightness in his face. He told his father that he had found a governess.

"References all right?" said Sir Tancred.

"Yes; she carries them about with her," said Tinker diplomatically.

"I suppose I ought to see them, don't you think?"

"You will," said Tinker.

On her arrival on the Saturday morning Dorothy found the children awaiting her on the steps of the hotel; and to Tinker's extreme satisfaction she at once kissed Elsie. When she had been taken to her room, which was next to Elsie's, and her trunks had been brought up, it was time to go to déjeuner, and Tinker conducted her to the restaurant. They found Sir Tancred and Lord Crosland already at table: they rose at the sight of Dorothy, and Tinker introduced them to her gravely. Sir Tancred was naturally surprised at being suddenly confronted by a startling vision of beauty, when he had expected an ordinary, young, fresh-colored, good-natured Englishwoman. But for all the change worked in his face by that surprise he might have been confronted by a vision of corkscrew curls. Lord Crosland, however, so far forgot the proper dignity of a peer as to kick Tinker gently under the table. Tinker looked at him with a pained air.

Dorothy was no less surprised by the sight of Sir Tancred; she had had a vague notion that she should find him a sedate gentleman of forty-five. She was a little shy at first; but Sir Tancred soon set her at her ease, and she took her part in their talk, showing a very pleasant, mirthful spirit.

When she went away with the children Lord Crosland lighted a cigarette and said thoughtfully, "Well, Tinker has made a find. She is a lady."

"I should be inclined to say gentlewoman," said Sir Tancred. "Lady is a word a trifle in disrepute; there are so many of them, and so various, don't you know?"

"Gentlewoman be it," said Lord Crosland. "But he's a wonderful young beggar for getting hold of the right thing. What a beautiful creature she is!"

"She is beautiful," said Sir Tancred grudgingly.

"Woman-hater! Ha!" said Lord Crosland.

Dorothy found herself admitted to a frank intimacy in this little circle into which whim had led her. She spent most of her time with the children. She gave Elsie two hours' lessons a day, and, since she had a knack of making them interesting, Tinker often enjoyed the benefit of her teaching. After lessons she shared most of their amusements, and learned to be a pirate, a brigand, an English sailor, a Boer, and every kind of captive and conspirator. She rarely tried to restrain Tinker's fondness for pulling the legs of his fellow-creatures, for she found that he had the happiest knack of choosing such fellow-creatures as would be benefited, morally, by the operation. But she was a check on his more reckless moods, and kept him from one or two outrageous pieces of mischief. For his part, he found the responsibility of looking after her and Elsie not a little sobering; and he was quite alive to the fact that at Monte Carlo, that place of call of the adventurers of the world, one's womankind need a protecting male presence. Quietly and unobtrusively Sir Tancred seconded him in this matter; if Dorothy had the fancy to take the air in the gardens after dinner she found that he or Lord Crosland, or both of them, strolled with her and the children. She was growing very friendly with the two men and beginning to take a far deeper interest in Sir Tancred than she would have cared to admit even to herself. His face of Lucifer, Son of the Morning, his perfect thoughtfulness, his unfailing gentle politeness and his very coldness attracted her; and, always watching him, she had now and again a glimpse of the possibilities of energy and passion which underlay the mask of his languor. At times, too, her woman's intuition assured her that, for all his dislike, or rather distaste, of women, she attracted him.

Unfortunately, but naturally, Sir Tancred and Lord Crosland were not the only men who found her beautiful. M. Le Comte Sigismond De Puy-de-Dôme, hero of many duels and more scandals, and darling of the Nationalist press, also saw her beauty. With him to see was to act; and he never passed her without a conquering twirl of his waxed mustaches, and a staring leer which he fondly believed to be a glance teeming with passion. Since even he, conscious as he was of his extraordinary fascination, could hardly mistake her look of annoyance for the glow of responsive emotion, he resolved on more masterly action. He kept a careful watch, and one afternoon followed her and Tinker and Elsie on one of their walks. They went briskly; and at the end of a mile he was maintaining a continuous, passionate monologue in tones vibrant with the deepest feeling on the subject of his tight, but patent-leather, boots.

A mile and a half on the way to Mentone they turned aside down a road into the hills. He followed them for a while over the loose stones and along the ruts of the roadway with considerable pain, and was on the very point of abandoning the pursuit when he came on Dorothy and Elsie sitting in a shady dell from which the wooded slope of the hills rose steeply. Careless of his boots and of the fact that they had suffused his face with an unbecoming purple, he strode gallantly up to them, and plunged into a detailed account of the passion with which Dorothy's beauty had inflamed his heart, wearing the while his finest air of a conqueror dictating terms.

Dorothy surveyed him with a contemptuous wonder over which her sense of the ludicrous was slowly gaining the mastery; Elsie stared at him. At last he ended the impassioned description of his emotions with a yet more impassioned appeal to Dorothy to fly with him to a far-off shore forever shining with the golden light of love; and Dorothy laughed a gentle laugh of pure amusement.

Count Sigismond flushed plum-color; his eyes stood well out of his head; he drew himself up with a superb air, a little spoiled by a wince as his left boot deftly reminded him that he was wearing it, and cried: "Ha! You laugh! You laugh at Sigismond De Puy-de-Dôme! Mon Dieu! You shall learn!" And with a sudden spring he grabbed at Dorothy.

She jerked aside, sprang up and away from him. But he was between her and the exit from the dell; he crouched with the impressive deliberation of a villain in a melodrama for another spring; and Elsie screamed, "Tinker! Tinker!"

Count Sigismond heard a rustling in the bushes above, and looked up to see them parted by an angel child in white ducks, bearing a bunch of lilies in his hand, who gazed at him with a serious, almost pained face, and leapt lightly down.

With a "Pah! Imbécile!" addressed to himself for delaying, the Count sprang toward Dorothy, was conscious of a swift, white streak, and the head of the angel child, impelled by wiry muscles and a weight of seventy-six pounds, smote as a battering-ram upon the first and second buttons of his waistcoat. He doubled up and sat down hard in one movement; then turned on his side and gasped and gasped.

"Come along!" cried Tinker in a most imperative tone. "A row is a horrid nuisance when there are women in it!" And he caught his charges, each by an arm, and bustled them out of the dell and down the road. Dorothy laughed as she ran; never before had she seen vaulting arrogance brought low in so sudden and signal a fashion. At last she stopped, dabbed away the tears of mirth, and said, "Oh, Tinker, I am so much obliged to you! It's all very well to laugh now; but it might have been horrid!"

"It was the simplest thing in the world," said Tinker. Then rubbing his head ruefully he added, "I wish those foreigners would not wear gold buttons on their white waistcoats in the daytime. They have no more notion of how to dress than a cat—the men haven't."

They hurried along, looking back now and again to see if they were followed. They were not; for Count Sigismond was now sitting up in the shady dell, staring round it with fishy eyes, and wondering dully whether he owed his disaster entirely to an angel child or whether Mont Pelée had affected the neighborhood. He gasped still.

As they drew near the town Tinker grew thoughtful; suddenly he stopped and said seriously: "Now, look here, both of you. We mustn't let my father know about this, or he'll certainly thrash that bounding Frenchman; and that wouldn't be good enough, don't you know?"

"It would be very good for him," said Dorothy with some vindictiveness.

"Yes; but not for my father," said Tinker very earnestly indeed. "For all that he looks like a swollen frog, Le Comte De Puy-de-Dôme is the most dangerous pistol-shot in Europe. He's killed two men in duels already."

"Has he?" said Dorothy quickly, and the color faded in her cheeks. "Then we must indeed say nothing about it."

"Swear," said Tinker, raising his right hand.

"We swear," said Dorothy and Elsie in one voice, raising their right hands. It was a formality which had to be gone through many times when they played at being conspirators; their words and actions were mechanical.

"That's all right," said Tinker with a sigh of relief.

Count Sigismond returned to his hotel in a very hot fury. His outraged pride clamored for vengeance, and he sought for some one on whom to be revenged. He was surprised at the end of two days to hear nothing of his discomfiture; but his fury lost nothing by growing cool, and on the third night he picked a quarrel with Sir Tancred.

Next morning Sir Tancred asked Dorothy to take the children to Nice for a few days, since he had heard that there was some fever at one of the smaller hotels. He watched over their departure himself, and Tinker was aware of an indefinable something in his manner which puzzled him. It was that something which gave him a curious, unsettled feeling as if they were going on a much longer journey. As they left the hotel Lord Crosland came up from the Condamine carrying a square case under his arm; it did not escape Tinker's observant eye, but in the bustle of their removal he gave it but scant attention. In the evening Dorothy noticed that he was restless and absent-minded, and asked him what was the matter.

"I don't know," he said. "I have a funny feeling as though something was going to happen, and I can't think of anything. It's just as if I'd missed something I ought to have noticed. It always makes me uncomfortable. Yet I can't think what it can be."

She made many suggestions, but to no purpose; and he went to bed dissatisfied. He awoke once or twice in the night, a very rare thing with him; possibly, so close was their kinship, his father's disturbed spirit in some obscure and mysterious fashion was striving to warn him, or prepare him for calamitous tidings. In the early morning he slept soundly, and awoke rather later than his wont; and even as he awoke the square case which Lord Crosland had carried sprang into his mind, and he knew it for a case of pistols. In a flash everything was clear to him; his father was going to fight Count Sigismond, and had sent him to Nice to be out of the way.

He sprang out of bed and dashed for his watch; it was two minutes past seven. They would fight at eight; he had nearly an hour. In three minutes he was dressed and racing down the stairs. He met Dorothy coming up.

"What's the matter?" she cried, at the sight of his white face.

"My father—he's fighting Le Comte De Puy-de-Dôme, and he got us out of the way!"

—BY A VIOLENT EFFORT HUSHED HIS HYSTERIC SOBBING

He did not see her turn pale and clutch the banisters; he was racing out of the hotel. He ran to the coach-house, wheeled his bicycle into the courtyard, mounted, and rode down the street. He went at a moderate pace through the town, but once on the Corniche road he drove the machine along as hard as he could pedal. He was well on his way before his mind cleared enough for him to think what he was doing; and then his heart sank: he could do nothing. He could not interrupt a duel; that was the last enormity. And if he did interrupt it, it would be but for a few minutes; it would take place all the same. As the sense of his helplessness filled him, two or three great tears forced themselves out of his eyes. He dashed them away with a most unangelic savageness; then conscious only of a devouring desire to be near his father in his perilous hour he drove on the machine as hard as he could. As he drew near Monaco a kind of hopelessness settled on him. He almost wished, since he could not stop it, that he might find the duel over. Now and again a dry sob burst from his overloaded bosom.

It was ten minutes to eight when he came up the slope from the Condamine. His legs were leaden, but they drove on the machine. At last he came to the path which leads to the half glade, half rocky amphitheatre in which the gentry of the Principality and of the rest of the world who chance to be visiting it settle their affairs of honor, slipped off his machine, and ran down it as fast as his stiff legs would carry him. A few yards from the end of it he turned aside into the bushes; came to the edge of the glade; saw his father and Count Sigismond facing one another some forty yards away; saw a white handkerchief raised in Lord Crosland's hand; and in spite of himself his pent-up emotion burst from him in one wild eldritch yell.

It still rang on the quivering air when the handkerchief fluttered to the ground, and the pistols flashed together.

Now to those who enjoy an intimacy with Tinker an eldritch yell is neither here nor there. Piercing as this one was, it barely reached Sir Tancred's consciousness; but it smote sharply on Count Sigismond's tense nerves, and deflected the barrel of his pistol just so much as sent the bullet zip past Sir Tancred's ear at the moment he received Sir Tancred's bullet in his elbow and started to traverse the glade in a series of violent, but ungainly, leaps, uttering squeal on squeal.

Tinker turned and bolted, sobbing, gasping and choking in the revulsion from his hopeless dread. He seized his bicycle, ran it along the road some fifty yards, turned in among the bushes, flung himself down and sobbed and cried.

There was confusion on the scene of the duel; Count Sigismond's seconds had to chase him, catch him and hold him while the doctor dressed his wound. Then they fell to a discussion as to whether the eldritch yell had been uttered by the Count or by some one in the wood round the glade; it had fallen upon very ragged nerves, and for the lives of them they could not be sure. Lord Crosland threw no light at all upon the matter, though he did his best to help their dispute grow acrimonious; Sir Tancred preserved the discreet silence of a principal in a duel; the Count Sigismond only moaned.

At last they turned their attention to him, and carried him to the top of the path. Sir Tancred and Lord Crosland started for the town to send up a cab for him.

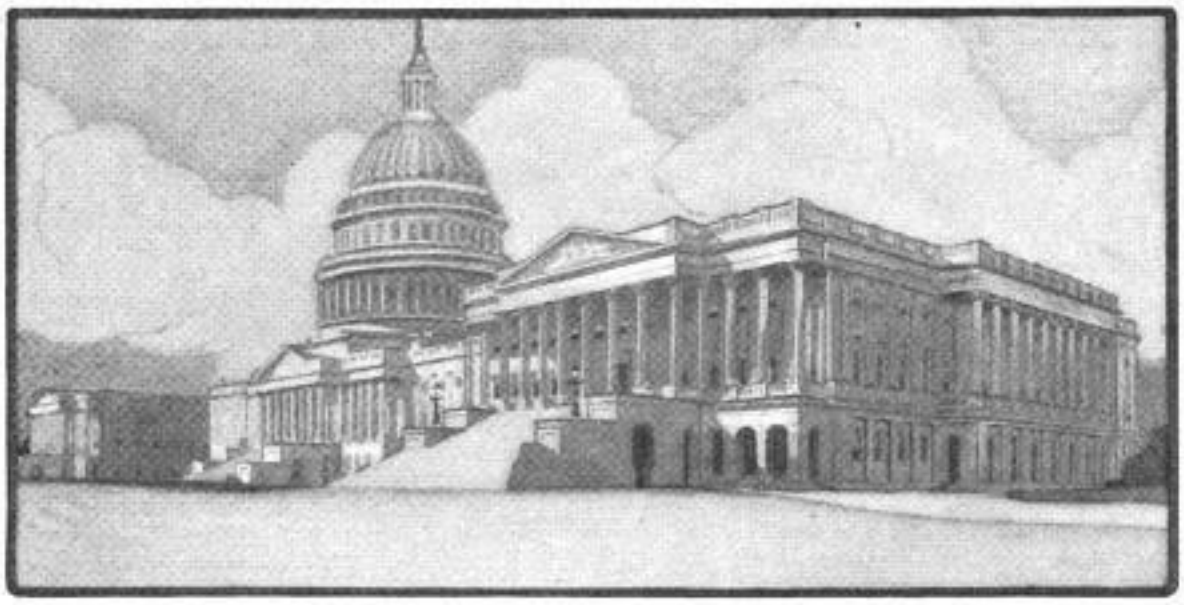
When they were out of hearing Lord Crosland said: "Most likely that yell saved your life, old chap."

"I should say that there wasn't a doubt about it; but really, in the case of a sweep like Puy-de-Dôme, I can't say that I mind a little irregularity. Besides, my conscience is quite clear. Heaven knows I did my best to keep Tinker in the dark."

"It can't be done," said Lord Crosland with conviction.

Tinker heard their voices, and by a violent effort, which did him good, hushed his hysteric sobbing. He heard the cab rattle up and rattle away. Twenty minutes later he mounted his machine, and passing through the back streets of Monte Carlo rode slowly back to Nice. On his way he washed his face at a spring; and when he mounted his machine again he said to himself firmly, "I'm not ashamed—not a bit."

As he wheeled his bicycle into the coach-house of the hotel Dorothy ran into it, caught him by the arm and cried: "Did they fight? Is your father hurt?"



He looked at her white, strained face, and said, with a dogged air, "My father's all right. What do you mean about fighting? I—I've been for a ride—on my bicycle."

"Then you did stop it!" cried Dorothy; and before he could ward her off she had kissed him.

"Look here," said Tinker firmly but gently, "these things won't bear talking about. They won't, really."

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

A CROWDED SESSION, WITH MUCH ANXIETY OVER VENEZUELA IN THE ADMINISTRATION AND MUCH CHAFING AGAINST QUAY METHODS IN THE SENATE

THE teeth are on edge in Washington — not merely the teeth, but everybody's teeth. It is a time of stress and struggle, of friction and fight. A dozen contentions are going forward at once. The remainder of the session will be of intense interest. There are many things to do; there is very little time to do them; and in every case there are resourceful men opposed to doing anything. The constant battles for precedence, for obstruction, for right of way and for side-tracking will keep the actors at the highest tension.

The Statehood contest developed the sharpest tactics, the keenest personal antagonism, and the most resolute and unyielding purposes on both sides. Senator Morgan lifted up his everlasting voice against the Panama treaty, and there are concealed forces behind. The knights of the anti-trust crusade in the House are chafing and restive under the more subtle and skillful management of the Senate. The diplomatic world has been deeply stirred over Venezuela, while less diplomatic but not less interested American observers have found it hard to check their rising indignation. Cuban reciprocity is halted between general acquiescence and occult obstruction. The President is driving a twelve-in-hand with restless energy, while Senator Hoar faintly pipes out against executive intrusion. What with Venezuelan clouds, Panama difficulties, treaties galore, color questions, Presidential activity, Senatorial combats and Congressional jealousies, the Washington pot is fairly boiling over. The attempt may be made to put the cover on, but the seething goes on below.

The struggle over the Omnibus Statehood bill grew into what was well-nigh a political duel between Senator Quay and Senator Hanna. Senator Beveridge, as chairman of the Committee on Territories, is the floor leader of the fight against admission, and he has led it with force and ability. Behind him is Senator Hanna, who has thrown all his vigor and authority into the contest. There have been various secondary but interesting chapters. Senator Knute Nelson, the stalwart representative of the Scandinavians, made a long and convincing speech against admission. He is a hard-headed Senator of shrewd common-sense, and his array of facts and reasons was conclusive. Indeed, the argument has been on one side and the numbers and strategy on the other.

But, notwithstanding other phases, it has been largely a combat between Quay and Hanna. No love has been lost between them since Hanna gave the casting vote which decided against seating Quay on the Governor's appointment, and when Richard and Richmond met on Bosworth Field it was sure to be a fierce battle. Though his methods were well known, Senator Quay has nevertheless astonished his associates by the extent of his resources and the ingenuity of his tactics. He is daring, audacious and unhesitating. He is Napoleonic in his dash and decision, in his celerity of movement and in the character of his surprises. He turns up in the most unforeseen way and strikes the most sudden and unexpected blows. To tack his Statehood bill as a rider on the Agricultural Appropriation bill, and then refer it to his own private and personal committee which has nothing to do with either agriculture, appropriations or Statehood, and which never meets, was a manœuvre which nobody but a Quay would think of.

The question with him was not whether his move would receive approval, but whether it would outwit his opponents and gain an advantage for his measure. He is bold and unshrinking in using the power he possesses. With a majority behind him he wields it with autocratic will. In State politics he surprises friend and foe alike by his quick turns and unannounced devices, and he has applied in the national and courtly forum of the Senate the deft and fertile expedients which he has employed so successfully in undisputed control of a State machine. Both Quay and Hanna are masterful political leaders. Quay relies more on his resources and Hanna more on his cause. Quay has the greater boldness and Hanna the greater grasp. Quay is more the chief of a compact clan and Hanna more the premier of a free council. Neither is Machiavellian — though Quay is reticent and secretive — and both are direct and go straight to the mark.

There would be a compromise if there were not such intensity of feeling, and there may be yet. But each side wants to fight it out to the end. One side has the advantage of numbers and of iron purpose. The other has the advantage of right and the almost illimitable power of opposition in the Senate. The chapter of accidents is in its favor. Any delay counts for it. While those who want to defeat other things may aid in keeping the Statehood bill at the front, those who want to pass other measures will not be willing to let it block the way. It has the difficulty of the affirmative and the opposition has the strength of the negative. With such a situation it is not hard to measure the chances.

Senator Hoar Lectures the President

Senator Hoar's remonstrance against the intrusion of Presidential authority and influence into the activity and legislation of Congress finds theoretical assent and practical rejection. The venerable Massachusetts statesman is a Senator of the old school. He has great reverence for the traditions of the fathers, for the fundamental principles of our political system, and for the constitutional division and boundaries of authority. The President, according to his view, is to communicate with Congress by message; he is to pass upon bills by signing or vetoing them when they come regularly before him in due process; Congress is to legislate without his interference except through his public recommendations; and conferences at the White House to arrange what shall be done at the Capitol, and announcements that this or that measure is an Administration measure, are equally objectionable.

All this Senator Hoar found occasion to utter in very plain terms. "There is a constitutional method," he said, "by which the President conveys his approbation or disapproval of bills, and outside of that method I hold it contrary to the privileges of the Senate to have the opinion of the President of the United States stated in legislation. It is nobody's business to be arranging with the President what the Senate shall do! We are an independent body." This was indeed a sharp lecture both to the President and to the Senate. And the general judgment found expression when, upon its conclusion, Senator Spooner rose and said: "Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is absolutely right, of course. I move that the Senate do now adjourn." That was the only rejoinder. Theoretically right, but not worth answering!

Senator Spooner's suggestive response reflects the truth. Senator Hoar's position is technically correct, but practically erroneous. It goes back to the original constructive division of powers and overlooks the development of actual conditions. The real working of our political system has changed in this as in many other ways without any change in the text of the Constitution. The President is not merely the Executive but the Premier of the Government and the leader of his party. If he would win either administrative or political success he must impress himself on Congress and mould its action. The President who failed to do this would discredit himself and imperil his party. Once in a century comes a Henry Clay who from his place in the Senate dominates his party in Congress and in the country; but it is only at the rarest intervals that such an overtowering Congressional leader appears, and generally the real leadership must fall to the President.

Senator Hoar says the House of Lords or Commons would resent an assertion of the King's wishes or authority in its debates or in its actions. But that is a false comparison. There is no parallel between the two cases. The British monarch reigns, but does not rule. The position of the President is not that of the King, but rather like that of the Prime Minister. He is the real chief of the Government and, if he be a masterful man, the real leader of the party in power. As such he must shape policies in administration and in legislation. Inevitably very much depends on the quality of the man. There are Addingtons as Prime Minister and there are Pitts; there are Salisburys and there are Balfours. So as President there is sometimes a Polk and sometimes a Jackson, now a Hayes and then a Cleveland, or a McKinley, or a Roosevelt.

Cleveland did not steadily sway Congress as McKinley did. His temperament and impulse would have led him to conform more closely to the theory which Senator Hoar lays down. His natural disposition was to attend to his end of the line and let Congress attend to its end. But he found it vital to control Congress at times, as when he forced the repeal of the silver purchase act, and when he did assert himself he did it with a vigor and energy that left no doubt of his purpose. No rational man questions that the exercise of his power in that case was essential to the public welfare. McKinley held his control less by coercion than by persuasion, and how much less would have been his success, and how much inferior would have been the success of the country, if he had not kept his close touch and his skillful hand had not constantly guided the action of Congress!

But there are other considerations which cannot be overlooked. It is a poor rule that doesn't work both ways. If Senator Hoar resents the intrusion of the President into the Capitol, why shouldn't he resent the intrusion of the Senate into the White House? If the President goes beyond his prerogative in influencing legislation, does not the Senate overstep the division line in controlling appointments? It is a common observation, indeed, that the Senate is gradually absorbing the powers of the Government. If we were to search for the real subject of criticism in the transgression of the constitutional distribution of powers, it might lead us in the opposite direction from Senator Hoar's pursuit. Besides, the President is more directly responsible to the people than the Senate, and experience shows that he more nearly represents the people. If he trenches on the field of Congress, is it not generally to enforce the popular will?

As for President Roosevelt, does Senator Hoar delude even the rotund imagination of thirty years under the lofty dome with the idea that a Senatorial lecture will restrain his activity? Does the Senator expect to make him over again? Does he hope to reconstruct temperament and organization and mental fibre and moral quality? To imagine President Roosevelt shutting himself up in the White House and contenting himself with an occasional message to Congress is to imagine the impossible. He could not fail to assert himself without changing his whole being. But the very intensity of his method would defeat itself if he did not stand for the right — if he did not represent what, thus enforced, is irresistible. His vehement force would arouse opposition if his popular cause did not compel assent. But when he personifies the popular will and gives it the edge of his own it is impossible to stand against him. Senator Hoar may remonstrate against trespassing on the prerogative of the Senate, but all in vain. Before these words can be read there will doubtless be a settlement of the Venezuela imbroglio. The delay already experienced in reaching an adjustment has exceeded reasonable limits, and the conduct of the controversy on the part of the allied Powers has evoked much criticism and resentment in this country. This irritation has been shared by the highest authorities as well as by the people. There has been little fear of any serious complication. That could only come through some accident or some inflammatory act which would precipitate a clash and carry the affair beyond the control of the Governments. But the delay of settlement has left room for such accidents, and the needless violence of the allies in their blockade, and their excessive demands in the discussion of terms, have created an unpleasant impression. It is difficult to understand why the allied Powers allowed themselves to be betrayed into such palpable mistakes. If they had determined to force an issue their exasperating action would be easy to comprehend; but as that is precisely what they had determined to avoid, it is hard to see the discretion of such a course.

They started with two great advantages. In the first place, they expressly and almost effusively declared that they would give no offense to the United States, and that declaration was unreservedly accepted. In the second place, the United States had no sympathy with Castro. He was regarded as an adventurer who had not been scrupulous in his administration or in his obligations. There was, therefore, no disposition in this country to object to coercive measures so long as they were not harsh and did not infringe on the Monroe Doctrine. It was only when they were accompanied by ruthless destruction of Venezuelan vessels and wanton bombardment of Venezuelan villages and by attempted exactions beyond reason in the settlement that the tide of adverse feeling rose.

There is a widespread suspicion that sinister purposes and ulterior designs lay behind this European attack on Venezuela. Our Government does not share this opinion. It may be said that among the navy officers lower than the top the feeling is universal that a conflict sooner or later is inevitable. This conviction springs from various sources. It comes in part from the bearing and expressions of German naval officers; in part from the idea that the new German Navy, which has never had a chance to fight, will seek to share the glory of the German Army; in part from the belief that deep-seated designs on South America will involve war. Whether well-founded or not, this sentiment pervades our Navy, and it therefore finds nothing surprising in the arbitrary exhibitions on the Venezuelan coast and in the imperative and exacting spirit of the negotiations.

But it may be repeated that the highest authorities in our Government do not entertain this conviction. They believe that the Kaiser was frank, open and sincere in his demonstrations of friendship for this country, and that his true spirit was indicated in the mission of Prince Henry and all the cordial expressions with which it was accompanied. They accept the repeated and positive assurances given before the movement against Venezuela that no step would be taken to which the United States would object. And they do not believe that the Kaiser has any designs which are inconsistent with these friendly expressions.

How, then, are the reprehensible acts to be explained? It is thought that they were not ordered or inspired by the Kaiser, but that they were the overzealous and superserviceable performances of the commanders. The same eager and restless desire to do something which generally characterizes the officers of the new German Navy is credited with the responsibility of these aggressive displays. When they have been made the Kaiser cannot well disavow them. He may even give them a passive approval. He does not wish to impair initiative or ambition on the part of his officers, and he would rather see an excess of zeal and activity than the indifference and torpor which never do anything.

These officers have not yet learned restraint. They understand the force of the Navy better than its code or its courtesy. They find their type in Admiral Dietrich who came so near crossing Dewey's path at Manila. Had it not been for the warning and counsel of Admiral Seymour, the more experienced and accomplished British commander, it is probable that Dietrich would have overstepped the bounds of neutral obligation and clashed with Dewey, not so much because he had the spirit of truculence and defiance as because he didn't clearly perceive what he was not to do. There is something in nature and something in training. The British officers on the Venezuelan coast did not show the aggressive spirit of their German allies. The acts which offended the sensibilities of the United States came from one source, and they deepened the feeling of our Navy without throwing our Government off its self-contained balance.

It is interesting and reassuring to note the poise and deliberation of President Roosevelt throughout this chapter. It shows the effect of responsibility and experience with a strong man. We all remember his eagerness and impulsiveness, his generous ardor and intrepid determination, at the beginning of the difficulties with Spain. He was almost ready to meet the Spanish fleet midway on the seas. In the present case he was earnestly urged and besought to send our fleet to the Venezuelan coast. The only explanation of such an act would have been to watch the allied fleets and be prepared for any emergency. It would have signified that we did not trust their assurances, and had suspicions, and it would have given provocation. The President judiciously declined to accede to the appeal, and in this refusal he gave new reason for confidence in his sobriety of judgment. He does not shrink from any duty, but he does not plunge into trouble.

Though the Venezuelan episode has been very trying it will accomplish great good. It demonstrates that the Monroe Doctrine is a powerful safeguard of peace. It will diffuse a better understanding of its scope and efficiency. It will emphasize the practical agreement that no European Power will venture upon any infraction. It will at the same time teach the irresponsible and unstable governments of South America that they cannot disregard their obligations with impunity in reliance on the defense of the United States. It will stimulate measures to diminish the trade connections of South America with Europe, which lead to such complications, and to increase their trade connections with the United States, where responsibility, friendship and protection go hand in hand. And, finally, it will deepen the purpose of this country to strengthen its navy, its coast defenses, and its general equipment, not in expectation of war, but as a guarantee of peace, and as a muniment of its continental obligations under the Monroe Doctrine.

A Reminiscence of Edwin Booth

By Barton Hill

IN THE old days when tragedy reigned supreme and people went to the playhouse to joy and weep with the impersonator of Shakespearean characters, stock companies were attached to each important theatre. The "stars" traveled from city to city, in some instances accompanied by the lady who was to play leading parts, a plan to save trouble to the chief impersonator, but as a rule all rôles, except the ones assumed by the visiting actor, were supplied, and amply, by the members of the regular stock company.

Each theatre had its permanent stage manager who conducted rehearsals from the prompt-book of the star next to appear, and in which the stage business of every character in the play was given. Of course, these prompt-books differed, but never violently. But of all the great personages of that halcyon time, Junius Brutus Booth, Edwin Booth, Edwin Forrest and the rest, not one but came to rehearsal with the stock company and entered with ardor into the spirit of the play.

My first meeting with Edwin Booth, with whom in subsequent years I played leading support for so many seasons, was in Pittsburg in 1849, fifty-four years ago. He came with his father, Junius Brutus Booth, merely to help him to dress. He had, however, made his début at Providence a short time before, September 20, 1849, while my own first appearance had been made on November 20, two months later.

Macready had been very particular in rehearsals and gone so far as to mark a certain spot on the stage where an actor playing with him should take up position in a given scene. If he deviated from that spot in public performance, however slightly, the distinguished actor would set him right in a hoarse whisper. In view of this Junius Brutus Booth was asked, "Where shall I stand?"

"Anywhere you like," was the prompt rejoinder, "and I will find you."

My first experiences in rehearsing with Edwin Booth were at Buffalo in 1854; he came then, as later, to every rehearsal and directed it. In 1867, on the burning of the Winter Garden, I was sent for by Mr. Forrest to take the place of John McCullough. Then in the latter years of his life he was vigorously directing all rehearsals of his plays, and kept up the daily routine with that company for three or four weeks after my arrival, when he turned the responsibility over to me, only coming to the theatre to act.

We hear many instances of the peculiarities of those great actors at rehearsal. Booth was never anything but kind, nor was Edwin Forrest. The harsh stories that were told of Forrest I never believed; Edwin Booth had but one peculiarity—his love of his art.

For years Mr. Reed, the father of Roland Reed, played some little bits of parts as captain of the "supers" in Mr. Forrest's company. One night, in charge of his "Citizens," he was standing in the wings waiting to go on. A new stage manager was conducting the first performance of his engagement, and naturally was quite anxious. "Do you know your cue?" he asked of Mr. Reed.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Are you sure?"

"Yes."

"Quite sure?"

"Yes," came the reply.

"What is it?" asked the stage manager, nervously turning the leaves of his prompt-book.

"Go on, you fool," replied Mr. Reed with a bland promptness born of long familiarity with the command.

AT MRS. RIDGIE'S they guessed that Frothingham had proposed to Cecilia and that she had been unnerved by the shock to her widowed heart. He stayed on until the following Monday, neither amused nor amusing, then returned to Mrs. Staunton's for two days. He found her intensely curious as to the trouble between Cecilia and him—she brought up the subject again and again, and with expert ingenuity at prying tried to trap him into telling her; she all but asked him point blank. But he looked vague or vacant, pretended not to understand what she wanted, expressed lively interest in Cecilia's progress toward health, professed keen regret that he must leave before she would be well enough to receive him.

As he was about to go Mrs. Staunton became desperate. "Allerton is a stern man," she said with an air that forbade the idea that mere vulgar curiosity was moving her. "He has the notion that Cecilia was not polite to you—you know, she gives way to strange moods. And he is so irritated against her that he is treating her harshly."

Frothingham looked astonished. "Really!" he said. "How extraordinary. I can't conceive how he happened to wander off into that. Nothing could be farther from the truth."

"I confess," Mrs. Staunton went on, "I'm much disappointed. I've taken a fancy to you. I had rather hoped that you and Cecilia would like each other—you understand."

Frothingham reflected. It was possible, yes, probable, that Cecilia's father could drive her into marrying him, would do it if he should hint to Mrs. Staunton that he did fancy Cecilia and was "horribly cut up" because she didn't fancy him. "What the devil do her feelings matter to me?" he demanded of himself. "A month after we were married she'd forget all this ghost nonsense and would be thanking me for pulling her out of it."

"And," Mrs. Staunton was saying, "I know her father would have liked it as well as I."

But Frothingham didn't follow his impulse and her unconscious leading. "What am I thinking of?" he said to himself in the sharp struggle that was going on behind his impassive exterior. "I'm not that sort of blackguard—at least not yet." Then he drawled his answer to Mrs. Staunton: "I'm tremendously flattered, but really, I fear the young lady and I would never hit it off. I've no great fancy for marrying—never had. I've always thought it a poor business—one of the sort of things that are good for the women and children, you know, but not for the men."

SENATOR BALLANTYNE

Mrs. Staunton looked mild and humorous disapproval. "What is the world coming to? A man asked me the other day why all the nice women were married and all the nice men single. I hadn't thought of it until he spoke. But I must say it's true of my acquaintances."

"I hope you'll let Mr. Allerton know he's wrong," said Frothingham. "I hate it that the poor girl's had the screws put on her on my account."

"Certainly—I'll tell him. But I'm sorry it's not to be as we hoped." She was studying him with a puzzled expression. She had heard from what she regarded as a thoroughly trustworthy source that her young English friend had come over especially to get him a rich wife. If he hadn't come for that, why was he wandering about? Titled foreigners did not come to America for amusement. She could not understand his conduct.

He couldn't understand it himself. "I always was an ass," he thought. "Here am I, sinking straight to the bottom—or, what's worse, the bottomless. Yet I'm squeamish about the kind of line that pulls me ashore. Yes—I'm an ass. Even Lilian, well as I knew her at Oxford, took me in a bit with her trumpery tricks to make a living. She completely foozled me—that is——" Did she "foozle" him? He couldn't banish the doubt. And there was the incident of the horse—Lilian had nothing to do with that, yet it fitted in with her professions as to the spirit world. But hadn't she as good as owned up by apologizing for breaking it off between him and Cecilia? Perhaps she hadn't meant that; perhaps she had meant she was sorry to be the medium for such a letter. "There was a lot of truth in that letter. And there must be something in witches and ghosts and all that or the whole world wouldn't believe in 'em. But what ghastly luck that Lilian should turn up after fifteen years—no, seventeen, by Jove! Gad, how she has gone off since she was bar-maid at the Golden Cross and the prettiest girl that walked the High Street."

He paused in New York a few hours, long enough to get a disagreeable mail from the other side—a dismal letter from old Bagley, a suspiciously cheerful note from Evelyn, a few lines from Surrey with a postscript about Gwen—"I've shipped her off to Mentone. She's a bit seedy this winter, poor girl." Frothingham quarreled at Hutt, drank himself into a state of glassy-eyed gloom and took the three o'clock express for Washington. As he sat in the smoking-car a man dropped into the next chair with a "How d'ye do, Frothingham?" Frothingham's features slowly collected into an expression of recognition, of restrained pleasure. "Glad to see you, Wallingford. Going to Washington?"

"Yes—I'm in Congress, you know."

"No, I didn't know." And it struck him as uncommonly modest in Wallingford never to have spoken of so distinguished an honor.

"My father put me in last year."

"Oh, you've a seat in your family." Frothingham nodded understandingly. "That's very nice. They've almost abolished that sort of luxury with us. Nowadays, to get into Parliament a fellow has to put up a good many thousand pounds. Even then he must take his chances of winning a lot of noisy brutes."

Wallingford's face had flushed when Frothingham said "a seat in your family," and the flush had deepened as he went on. "You haven't got it quite straight, Frothingham—about us, I mean. No one can have a Congressional seat in his family in America. My father has a lot of influence with the party in New York City. He always puts up a lot of money for campaigns. And they give him the chance to name a Congressman—if he's willing to pay for it. That's between us, you understand. It's a bad system. But it applies only to a few districts in New York and perhaps one or two other cities."

"It sounds like our system," said Frothingham. "A good system, I call it. If it weren't for that the lower classes would be chucking us out and putting their own kind in."

"Well, we think it bad. I feel something like a fellow who knows he wouldn't have won the race if he hadn't bribed the jockey on the other fellow's horse."

"That's your queer American way of looking at things. You are always pretending that birth and rank and wealth aren't entitled to consideration. But that's all on the surface—all 'bluff,' as you say. They get just as much consideration here as among us."

"You're judging the whole country by the people in one small class—and not by any means all of them."

"Human nature is human nature," replied Frothingham with a cynical gleam in his eyeglass.

"If you go out West——"

"I'll find what I've found in the East, no doubt—perhaps in a little different form. I'm visiting Western people at Washington—after I've stopped at the Embassy a few days—some people I'm meeting through an American acquaintance of ours in England—Charles Sidney."

"Sidney!" Wallingford laughed. "He's my second cousin. Ain't he a shouting cad?"

"Oh, I think he's a well-meaning chap—most obliging."

"I should say so—to anybody he crawls before. And who are these Westerners he's sending you to?"

"The Ballantynes. I think Mr. Ballantyne's a Senator, is he not?"

Wallingford laughed again. "That's one on me," he said. "Yes, they're from the West. But for everything that isn't American they lay it over anybody you've seen in New York. Ballantyne! I sha'n't say any more. It's of no use to tell you you're going round and round in a circle that's in America but not really of it."

"Do you know the Ballantynes?"

"I've met Mrs. Ballantyne—and the daughter that's married to a Spaniard—the Duke of Almansa. They were at Monte Carlo three years ago when I was there. A handsome woman—amusing, too. She spent most of her time in the gambling-rooms—used to come in always dressed in something new and loud—and what tremendous hats she did wear! She'd throw on the table a big gold purse blazing with diamonds; then she'd seat herself and open the purse and it would be stuffed with thousand-franc notes. She'd plunge like a Russian. Every once in a while she'd go out on the balcony and walk up and down smoking a cigarette. She forbade her husband the Casino unless she was with him; even then he wasn't allowed to stake a single louis. He'd slip away and play in one of those more private rooms upstairs."

"AND WHO ARE THESE WESTERNERS HE'S SENDING YOU TO?"

Frothingham smiled reminiscently.

"You know, the play's higher there," continued Wallingford. "But the crowd of spectators was too small and indifferent for Her Grace of Almansa. When she found out what he was up to she made a scene right before everybody—'How dare you squander my money!' she said, and she led him away like a spaniel on its way to a whipping."

"Charming person!" said Frothingham. "Must have been amusing."

"Indeed she was. They'd talk of her all day without growing tired—and always a new freak. You'll be amused by her."

"Ah—she's here?"

"Yes—left the Duke two years ago—paid him off and came home to her father. She's quite quiet now, they say—educating her children."

Frothingham's three days at the British Embassy were to him days upon an oasis in the desert. It was literally, as well as legally, part of the British domain—Britain indeed, as soon as the outside door was passed. The servants at most of the houses at which he had been entertained were direct and recent importations from England, yet they had already lost an essential something—even his faithful Hutt was not the docile, humble creature he had been. But here in the Embassy the servants, like the attachés, like the Ambassador's family, like the Ambassador himself, were as English in look, in manner, in thought as if they had never been off the island. The very furniture and the arrangement of it, the way the beds were made and the towels were hung in the bathrooms, represented the English people as thoroughly as did the Ambassador.

From this miniature Britain Frothingham on the third day was transferred to the international chaos beneath the turrets and battlements of the Ballantyne castle. When the house was finished, twelve years before Frothingham saw it, the various suites were furnished each on a definite scheme—French or English or Italian of different periods, classical, Oriental, Colonial American. But the Ballantynes had the true American weariness of things that are completed. They were not long interested in their house after it was done. They felt like strangers in it, lived in it only for the sake of show, were positively uncomfortable. More through carelessness and indifference than through ignorance, the movable objects in the suites had become changed about—a gradual process, imperceptible to the inhabitants. There were now specimens of every style and every period in each suite; and Frothingham, who knew about interiors, seeing this interior for the first time thought it the work of an eccentric verging on lunacy.

"Awful, isn't it?" said Madame Almansa, as she was called. She had noted Frothingham's glance roaming the concourse of nations and periods that thronged the walls and floor space of the vast parlor—the Ballantynes used the American term instead of the British "drawing-room."

Frothingham looked at her inquiringly. "What?" he said, pretending not to understand.

"Do you wonder I refuse to live here?" she went on, as if he had not spoken. "There's some excuse for the great houses on the other side. At least the present tenants didn't build them and can put the responsibility upon their ignorant, semi-barbaric ancestors."

"That has struck me as a bit queer," replied Frothingham. "Over on our side we're cursing our ancestors for having burdened us with huge masses of brick and stone—beastly uncomfortable, aren't they?"

"Worse—unhealthful," she answered. "And as dwelling-places for human beings, ridiculous."

"Yes—and it takes an army to keep 'em clean, and then it isn't half done. And it does cost such a lot to keep 'em up. And there's no way of heating them. We don't build 'em any more—except new people that must show off."

"That's the trouble here," said Madame Almansa. "The new people who know nothing of the art of living build palaces as soon as ever they can afford it. It's supposed to be the badge of superiority. Instead, it's the badge of ignorance and vulgarity. I refuse to permit my children to live in the midst of such nonsense. You must come to see us, Lord Frothingham, in our little house just through this square."

Her sister, Isabella, who called herself Ysobel because she fancied it more aristocratic, laughed queerly—almost a sneer, though good-natured. And when Frothingham went away to her father's sitting-room she laughed again. "It's all very well for you, Susanna——"

"Susan," interrupted Madame Almansa.

"Well, Susan, then—though I hate to pronounce such a common word in addressing any one above the rank of servant. It's all very well for you to talk in that fashion. You've established yourself. You can afford to affect simplicity, and to insist on being called Susan, and on dropping your title, and on living in a plain little house, and on bringing up your children as if they were a tradesman's sons instead of the sons of one of the proudest nobles in——"

"You know Almansa," interrupted "Susan." "How can you speak of him as proud or a noble?"

"He is a weazened, oily creature," admitted Ysobel, delighted to make her sister wince by agreeing with her and "going her one better." "And I jumped for joy when you shook him, because I shouldn't have to let him kiss me any more. But, all the same, he's a great noble. And you know perfectly well, Madame Almansa, that if you had it to do all over again you'd marry him just the same—yes, if he were ten times worse——"

"Don't, Bella—please!" exclaimed "Susan" in a large, tragic way. "Mon Dieu!" She clasped her hands and in heroic agitation swept magnificently up and down the small, clear space. "When I think of the heritage of my boys—my Emilio and my Alfonso——"

"My Prince de Rio Blanco and my Marquis de Calamar," mocked Ysobel. "Cut it out, Sue. I loathe—cant!"

"Instead of filling your head with these false notions of nobility," said "Sue" sarcastically, "you would better look to your English, at least. But the vulgar speech you and your girl friends use nowadays is in keeping with your vulgar ideas of aristocracy."

"Yes, Madame la Duchesse," said Ysobel, her good nature unruffled. "And when I've married a title and then shaken the man I'll talk in the same top-lofty way that you do."

Madame Almansa raised and lowered her superb shoulders and changed the subject to dress—she affected an extreme of simplicity, and that required a great deal more time and thought than her former easily gratified craze for the startling. Presently her father came with Frothingham. "You're going to Senator Pope's to dinner, aren't you?" he said absently. Frothingham thought he looked like the pictures of "Uncle Sam," except that his white chin whiskers were rooted in a somewhat larger chin space.

"Not I," replied Madame Almansa. "You know, father, I'm to stay here and do the honors at your dinner."

"Yes, yes, Susie—I remember." Senator Ballantyne seemed pleased, but uneasy. "But you must be careful—very careful. Your grand airs will frighten 'em."

Ysobel laughed. "Mamma and I are going to Mrs. Pope's," she said, "and Lord Frothingham, too. And then we all go to the White House dance afterward."

"No, the White House dance is to-morrow night," said Madame Almansa. "I am going."

"Well, well—no matter," interposed Senator Ballantyne. "All I want is to be sure that you get out of the way before my constituents come. Your mother ought to be ashamed of herself to desert me. But I suppose they won't mind it so long as Sue is here."

"What time's your dinner, pa?" asked Ysobel.

"Half-past six," replied the Senator, and he turned to Frothingham: "At home they have dinner—no, they call it supper—at five o'clock."

"That's 'way, 'way out West, Lord Frothingham," explained Ysobel, "where papa and mamma come from."

"And you, too, young lady," said her father teasingly. "You were born there."

"Yes, but I was caught young and taken to France," retorted Ysobel. "I spoke French before I spoke English."

Senator Ballantyne frowned, became abstracted, was presently sighing. His eldest daughter heard it and gave a theatrical sigh of sympathy. Ballantyne seemed not to hear, but something was irritating him, for he frowned more heavily.

Mrs. Ballantyne came in from her drive. She was a fine-looking woman, had all the outward appearance of the grande dame, and acted the part so well that not even herself had caught her in a slip for many years—a notable triumph in the art of pose when it is considered that she was a country school-teacher until she was twenty-four and had never seen a city or been east of the Alleghanies until she was past thirty. Frothingham helped her relieve herself of a great sable-lined cloak which he handed to a servant. The servant bent double in a bow—Mrs. Ballantyne paid well for obsequiousness. "When do those people of yours begin to come, Samuel?" she asked, framing her sentence and her manner to impress Frothingham.

Ballantyne looked annoyed, and, with a furtive glance at him, said: "Lord Frothingham will carry away a strange notion of democratic institutions as represented by Senators, mother."

Mrs. Ballantyne permitted him to call her mother because it was the only word of address that did not rasp her aristocratic nature. Her name was Jane—that she could not endure even before the days of her grandeur. She had made him call her Mrs. Ballantyne before people until she discovered that it was "shocking bad form." She decided upon mother because the old Austrian Ambassador, whose title was of the highest and whose blood was of the thinnest and palest blue, said to her one day, "I like your American fashion of husband and wife calling each other mother and father. It has a grand old patriarchal ring. My wife and I have adopted it."

"You must get out of the way by six o'clock," continued Ballantyne, addressing himself to "mother." "Several of them said they'd come round early for half an hour's chat before supper."

"I'm sorry we're to be driven out," said Frothingham. "I fancy I'd like to see your constituents."

"Oh, no, you wouldn't, Lord Frothingham," Mrs. Ballantyne answered him—for his benefit she was "laying it on with a trowel," as Ysobel would have said. "They're—but you know how it is in politics. I wish Samuel would leave public life."

"What!" exclaimed Ballantyne in mock horror. "And have all our poor relations that I've got nicely placed at the public crib bounced in a body, and come grunting and squealing to me to be supported! One of the objects in getting public office in this country, Lord Frothingham, is to relieve one's self of the support of one's poor relations and friends. The late President Arthur said to me when he was at the White House: 'The degradation of it! That I should have to lower myself for six hours every day to keeping an employment agency!'"

"But we can't dress and drive round the streets from six o'clock until eight," said Ysobel.

"They'll be in the reception-room by eight," replied her mother, "or else they won't be through dinner. We can get out unseen."

Frothingham maintained his look of blank indifference, but underneath he was vastly amused—"And they're quite unconscious what cads they are," he thought. As if in answer to this, Senator Ballantyne said to him, in a tone of humorous apology: "Our constituents are plain people, Lord Frothingham—honest, simple. They lead quiet, old-fashioned lives. I always send my family away or make them 'come off their perch' when I have to receive any one from home—that is, any but my regular political lieutenants. To tell you the gospel truth, I'm ashamed to have my old friends see how absurd we've become."

At six o'clock Frothingham was idling in a small smoking-room in the rear of the great parlor—it was on the second floor. Senator Ballantyne came in and grew red in the cheeks. "Oh, I didn't expect to see you," he said with an embarrassed laugh.

Frothingham pretended not to notice, but he instantly saw the embarrassment, and the cause of it as well. The Senator was not in evening dress, nor even in his uniform of "statesman's frock." To combat the unfavorable impression his great castle would make upon the excursionists from his distant State he had got himself up in a stained old blue sack suit with torn pocket and ragged cuff, in trousers bagging hideously at the knees and springing fantastically where they met his unblacked boots.

He seated himself and talked absently until there was a ring of the front doorbell. He started up. "I must go," he said. "That's the first ones." And he hurried away.

Frothingham waited a few seconds, then went into the hall and leaned carelessly on the banister where it commanded a view of the front door. He chuckled. Not the pompous and liveried butler or footman was opening it, but Senator Ballantyne himself in his livery of the "plain people." And Frothingham grinned as his great hearty voice—how different, how much more natural, than his usual voice—rolled out a "Why, hello, boys—Hello, Jim! Hello, Rankin. How d'ye do, Mrs. Fisher. Glad to see you, Miss Branigan. The maid wasn't about, so I thought I wouldn't keep you waitin'. Come right in and take off your things. Ladies, I'm sorry to say my wife's run off and left me—had to go to a dinner where the President and his wife are to be. You know, we ain't allowed to decline. But we won't miss her. My oldest girl Sue's in the parlor. You remember Sue?"

THE THREE DESCENDED THE GRAND STAIRWAY

They all went into the "parlor"—that is, the little first-floor reception-room, which had been partly refurnished, or rather, dismantled, for the occasion. The bell rang again. Frothingham chuckled again as he saw not butler, nor footman, nor Senator, but a neatly-dressed upstairs girl, without a cap, hasten to open the door. As he heard the rustle of skirts on the stairway leading to the sleeping-rooms, he prudently strolled into the smoking-room.

When he went up to dress Hutt said to him: "Beg pardon, my lord, but my, hit's queer, the dinner party they're 'avin' hin the little back room."

Frothingham went on shaving and Hutt continued:

"They've sent hoff hall the servants, hexceptin' the maids, my lord. They've got heverythink on the table at once and they're waitin' on themselves."

"Last night," said Frothingham, "you gave me a shirt with a spot on the collar. You're getting careless and impudent, Hutt."

When he reached the parlor Mrs. Ballantyne and Ysobel were waiting—Mrs. Ballantyne ablaze with rubies and diamonds, Ysobel slim and white and golden in an expensively plain white dress with golden spangles. Mrs. Ballantyne rang for a servant. "See that the doors leading into the hall downstairs are closed," she said.

The servant returned and announced that the way was clear. The three descended the grand stairway rapidly, entered the carriage and drove away—"with two on the box."

Presently Ysobel laughed. "You should have seen Susan, Lord Frothingham," she said. "She was rigged up in a black alpaca made with a basque."

"Alpaca?" asked Frothingham. "What's that? And what's a basque?"

"Alpaca is—well, it's a stuff they wear out West in the country when they dress up. I suppose they wear it because the country is so dusty and black alpaca catches and shows every bit of dust. And when you touch it, it makes your teeth ache and the gooseflesh rise all over you. A basque—it's a sort of waist, only it's little and tight and short on the hips and low in the collar, and it pulls under the arms—I can't describe a basque. It has to be seen. My idea of future punishment is to dress for a thousand years in black alpaca made with a basque, and to have to rub your hands over it every five minutes."

Softer than Spun Silk

THE hair of the musk-ox is much finer than silk and considerably stronger than the strongest linen. Twisted into a small strand, two men may pull on it without being able to break it. The musk-ox is prodigally supplied with this hair, which often trails along the ground. In fact, it has an inner and an outer coat like the American buffalo and the Cashmere goat. The outer coat of the musk-ox is very heavy and is shed during the summer season.

The natives of its Arctic habitat weave the silken threads of this animal into garments whose texture is finer and softer than the most delicate fabric known to commerce. The inhabitants in the extreme north of British America, on the Parry archipelago and in the Arctic regions of Alaska, where the musk-ox is found, will not for any price part with these beautiful garments. They are made exclusively for tribal chiefs and shamans. They regard the musk-ox as a sacred animal and the robes made of its hair are reverently cherished.

It is possible that under the scientific auspices of the United States Government the care and propagation of musk-ox herds for commercial purposes will occupy serious attention.

For many years scientific explorers and northern hunters have made attempts to secure live specimens, and on several occasions have succeeded in effecting a capture, but invariably the Indians accompanying the expedition have cut the throats of the oxen rather than allow them to be taken out alive. Their explanation was that the traditions of their people taught that if the musk-ox were taken out alive from that region all the other animals would die or migrate, leaving the inhabitants to perish of hunger. They believe that the odor of musk emitted by these animals is an incense offered to the gods of Wind and Snow, and that it alone insures protection to man and beast in those northern wastes.

The killing of the musk-ox they do not regard with equal disfavor, as that act they look upon as a votive offering. The one musk-ox now in this country was secured by the captain of a whaler, and he was permitted to take it out of the Arctic country only upon assuring the Indians that he wanted the animal for its skin and that it would be duly dispatched. If the natives learn that they have been deceived and that their sacred ox is now on exhibition, they will doubtless redouble their vigilance in safeguarding the species against exportation.

It is not the wish of the Government scientists to deal treacherously with the crude peoples of the far North in this matter, but as the musk-ox roams over vast regions it will be a comparatively easy matter for the Government, going about it methodically in a large way, to secure a herd and arrange either to control it in the latitudes of its natural habitat or to export chosen specimens without running counter to the superstitions of the Arctic tribes.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶Wisdom is profitable to others; common-sense to one's self.

¶Had critics been able to kill, no masterpiece could have survived.

¶There is good in everything with the occasional exception of a good thing.

¶Save the pennies and the dollars will not have to be broken for street-car fares.

¶Men make houses; women make homes; necessity makes boarding-places, and flats happen.

¶The man who fears he will do more than his salary calls for will never have much salary to call for.

¶In the fable the wolf called the ox a robber. In the modern version they get together and form a trust.

¶It is all very well to say that, if you would know the value of money, go borrow some. But the man who loans it and never gets it back also learns a few lessons.

The Indestructible Monroe Doctrine

SEVEN years ago there was a row over Venezuela, and certain papers in London announced that the Monroe Doctrine was wiped out forever. But when the trouble was settled the Monroe Doctrine was found to be in unusually good health. A few weeks ago Venezuela again became a first-page subject in the world's news, and the Italian Parliament was informed by one of its members that England and Germany had knocked the Monroe Doctrine sky-high. This information seemed to be credited, for Italy hastened to subscribe for a ground-floor allotment of stock in the Anglo-German blockade. The international syndicate is now in liquidation, and the subscribers are anxiously looking for an opportunity to dispose of their shares at a discount. Meanwhile the Monroe Doctrine remains an ugly and immovable fact. If it is "sky-high" it is also bedrock-deep, and all the way between.

Intelligent Americans have never claimed for the Monroe Doctrine a place in international law. They have been content to regard it as a declaration of American policy, good just so long as we have the will and the power to enforce it. But the current of events may yet carry it into the law of nations, without any effort on our part to put it there. International law is merely a collection of the usages commonly observed by civilized Powers, and it includes some things queerer than the Monroe Doctrine.

All the American republics, with the possible exception of Chile, have already recognized that Doctrine as part of the public law of the Western Hemisphere. England, in practice and in all but explicit terms, has accepted it as an inviolable principle. Germany has repeatedly disclaimed any intention of violating it. Russia and Spain, which used to have American possessions, have given them up — the former voluntarily, the latter under pressure. France accepted a practical application of the Doctrine thirty-six years ago, and has never displayed any desire to experience another. Austria refrained from sending troops to the help of Maximilian when we pointed to our "No Trespassing" signboard. Italy was careful to assure us that she had no designs on South American real estate when she joined the blockade of Venezuela. Finally The Hague treaty, signed by all the principal Powers of the world, carries a codicil by which our traditional policy toward American questions is reserved.

Since the Monroe Doctrine was first announced, eighty years ago, no attempt to violate it has ever been consummated. The chance that any such attempt ever will be consummated is less now than ever before. If undisturbed possession for from five to twenty years will give a man a title to a farm by prescription, how long a period of unbroken acquiescence in a certain doctrine by the whole world will it take to give that doctrine the force of international law?

The American Holiday

THERE are in the United States nearly thirty holidays of one kind or another, but only five of them receive anything like general observance — Christmas, Thanksgiving Day, Election Day, Fourth of July and the Twenty-second of February. We have no national holiday, but by the proclamation of the President of the United States and the action of the different States we get something that resembles it. Washington's Birthday comes as near to a real recognition by the whole nation as any other, the only flaw being that, in Mississippi, where there are no statutory holidays, it is observed only by exercises in the public schools. But the day itself stands forth unique and distinct as the nation's greatest tribute to any individual.

As time goes on we seem to be reaching a higher appreciation of Washington's character. We have had in the past decade numerous new books exploiting sides of his private life that belong more to yellow journalism than to literature, but the splendid point is that not even in their microscopic investigations have these writers found anything that detracts from the real elevation of the man. "America has furnished to the world the character of Washington. And if our American institutions had done nothing else, that alone would have entitled them to the respect of mankind," said Daniel Webster in his magnificent oration at Bunker Hill.

It has been smartly said that we have made of Washington a chromo, and perhaps we owe something to the industrious literary microscopists for their discoveries as to some of the human traits which he possessed. Certain it is that each time we go back to study his work and life we return refreshed with the nobility of plain, simple duty — duty not only in doing that which a man and a patriot should do, but in keeping himself clean and upright. "I hope," wrote Washington in his Moral Maxims, "I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain what I consider the most enviable of all titles, the character of an 'honest man.'" He did that with absolute success, and he was enabled to do it by the observance of another of his maxims: "Associate with men of good quality if you esteem your own reputation, for it is better to be alone than in bad company."

With this vantage his life along higher lines moved nobly to its goals. He knew misrepresentation and abuse of the most harrowing and discouraging kind, but he kept on, and time cleared his good name of all the stains that bad men sought to put upon it in the times of stress and passion. "To persevere in one's duty and be silent is the best answer to calumny," he said, and never was a truth better illustrated than in his own experience.

We have on Christmas the opportunity for love and charity, at Thanksgiving the occasion for gratitude, on Election Day the right of self-government, on the Fourth of July the display of patriotism, and on the fifth of our great holidays, which is the first in the year, comes the call for duty — duty as shown in the life of a great man who did his work well, and lived up to his ideals without shirking any task or fearing any danger.

Dinner-Parties for the Million

SIMPLICITY in social life is the thing most constantly advised by those who, in print, attempt to regulate our manners. Be simple, we are told; be informal; when you have people at your house don't make "a party" of it. Let us by all means be simple; it is cheaper, more healthful, in better taste, incidentally more democratic and more American. But why not be formal, why not "make 'a party' of it"? Parties are rather nice things. "Where are we dining to-night, my dear?" asks some proud member of the "400" of his wife in a novel of smart New York life.

"At the Winslow-Thingumajigs," replies that lady. And many a woman throughout the land who doesn't "dine out" once a year feels the glamour of a more splendid life than her own throw its spell over her. One possible result of this is snobbishness, spasmodic extravagance, and silly, ineffectual pretentiousness. But there might be another result. Let us consider a Wednesday evening — shall we say? — in, for example, Akron, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. John Smith sit down to their dinner of Julienne soup, roast beef with vegetables, a salad of tomatoes, rice pudding and coffee. Two blocks away Mr. and Mrs. James Brown discover upon their board tomato soup, boiled mutton with caper sauce, and potatoes, chocolate, ice cream and coffee. The Browns are planning to run in and call on their neighbors during the evening. But Mrs. Smith found it so difficult to get a roast of beef small enough for two people that they might just as well have been "dining out" at the Smiths'. And by the mere postponement of the purchase of mutton until next week they themselves might have given a "little dinner" to which they could have asked their hosts of to-night, and very possibly Amy Truesdale and that nice young Doctor Saunders. There is absolutely no extra expense involved, and no trouble beyond that of laying extra places. Both Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Brown received as wedding gifts a quantity of pretty silver which is only too rarely used and which makes the table look extremely attractive. The social life of Akron would be diversified by two parties, instead of by none at all, and the two evenings of the Smiths and Browns would be unquestionably brightened.

To any one with social instincts the mere fact of being invited out or of inviting people in gives enormous pleasure. There is no need of attempting to prove that it is as pleasant being asked to boiled mutton as to the superb dinner of a cordon bleu; it is sufficient that it is so much pleasanter than not being asked at all.

We have plenty of big "functions." What American social life lacks is the quiet, simple gathering of a few friends, which has, nevertheless, been arranged beforehand and has about it the air of considered and meditated hospitality. As it is now we entertain far too elaborately and far too rarely.

The Blot on the Great Man's Name

NOW it is our friend — the country's friend — Edward Everett Hale — who has robbed us of a popular belief. Daniel Webster was not a drunkard! In the twenty-six years during which Mr. Hale "knew him intimately he saw him thousands of times, read thousands of his letters, ran in and out of his house constantly, and never once saw him under the influence of liquor."

Of course we all will say we rejoice to hear it. But in our secret souls we don't altogether rejoice.

Why is this? Are we at bottom a kind of malignant animal? Is there a nasty vein of malice in every heart?

Or is it only that the ordinary man and woman are chilled and stifled by these faultless ruling folk — Powers and Dominions, as John Milton would call them? The dazzle and shine of an archangel awes us, but a dab of coal-soot on his wing makes him human at once. He is our brother now. We can claim fellowship with him at last: he "calls cousin" with us on account of that smut upon his wing.

We all remember when Edward Lear, Washington's secretary, first told the story of how the Father of His Country rushed one day out of his room half shaved to resent an insult, given to a poor little maid, by a kick and an oath, how the whole nation chuckled with delight! After all, then, he was no deity, but a man! And we all secretly thanked God.

The votaries of the godlike Daniel in Massachusetts elevated him above humanity, until he was as remote and icy as a peak in Labrador. Then came this ugly slander which Doctor Hale now beats to death so vindictively. It gave red blood to the idol. Every well-meaning bloated loafer at the Cross-Roads now struck hands in his secret mind with the demigod and did him honest homage.

All this is but another way of showing that plain human nature is the base of all power. It is not the statesman we reverence, nor beauty, nor royalty — not even many-sided William — but the man underneath — who is like ourselves.

The ugly old Queen who in her nightgown rushed into her box at the theatre crying out, with sobs, "Our Charlotte has got a boy!" won the hearts of the English people to her family by that one sentence, when all expedients and diplomacy had failed.

The advice which every young worker in the world can gain from these vague hints — whether he wants to win fortune or fame or the other and better successes — is: Make your leverage on humanity. That — not money nor rank nor reputation — is the real stuff out of which to make life.

About the Des Moines News

IN AN article entitled The Man Without a Pull, which appeared in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST of January 31, 1903, the statement was made incidentally that the Des Moines News suspended publication shortly after Mr. Robert B. Armstrong became connected with its staff. The publishers of the Des Moines News have called our attention to the fact that this statement is incorrect, and that the News has not missed an issue since its first publication in 1881, and has never been in financial difficulties. We gladly take this opportunity of correcting the error.

THE LITERARY SENSE

By E. Nesbit—THE LOVE OF ROMANCE

SHE opened the window at which no light shone. All the other windows were darkly shuttered. The night was still; only a faint breath moved among the restless aspen leaves. The ivy round the window whispered hoarsely as the casement, swung back too swiftly, rested against it. She had a large sheet in her hands. Without hurry and without delaying she knotted one corner of it to the iron staple of the window. She tied the knot firmly, and further secured it with string. She let the white bulk of the sheet fall between the ivy and the night, then she climbed on to the window-ledge and crouched there on her knees. There was a heart-sick pause before she grasped the long twist of the sheet as it hung—let her knees slip from the supporting stone and swung suddenly by her hands. Her elbows and wrists were grazed against the rough edge of the window-ledge—the sheet twisted at her weight and jarred her shoulder heavily against the house wall. Her arms seemed to be tearing themselves from their sockets. But she clenched her teeth, felt with her feet for the twisted ivy stems on the side of the house—found foothold and the moment of almost unbearable agony was over. She went down, helped by feet and hands and by ivy and sheet, almost exactly as she had planned to do. She had not known it would hurt so much—that was all. Her feet felt the soft mould of the border: a stout geranium snapped under her tread. She crept around the house, in the house's shadow—found the gardener's ladder—and so on to the high brick wall. From this she dropped, deftly enough, into the suburban lane; dropped, too, into the arms of a man who was waiting there. She hid her face in his neck, trembling, and said, "Oh, Harry—I wish I hadn't!" Then she began to cry helplessly.

The man, receiving her embrace with what seemed in the circumstances a singularly moderated enthusiasm, led her, with one arm still lightly about her shoulders, down the lane. At the corner he stood still, and said in a low voice:

"Hush—stop crying at once! I've something to say to you."

She tore herself from his arm and gasped:

"It's not Harry," she said. "Oh, how dare you?" She had been brave till she had dropped into his arms. Then the need for bravery had seemed over. Now her tears were dried swiftly and suddenly by the blaze of anger and courage in her eyes.

"Don't be unreasonable," he said, and even at that moment of disappointment and rage his voice pleased her. "I had to get you away somehow. I couldn't risk an explanation right under your aunts' windows. Harry's sprained his knee: cricket. He couldn't come."

A sharp resentment stirred in her against the lover who could play cricket on the very day of an elopement.

"He told you to come? Oh, how could he betray me!"

"My dear girl, what was he to do? He couldn't leave you to wait out here alone—perhaps for hours."

"I shouldn't have waited long," she said sharply; "you came to tell me: now you've told me—you'd better go."

"Look here," he said with gentle calm, "I do wish you'd try not to be quite so silly. I'm Harry's doctor—and a middle-aged man. Let me help you. There must be some better way out of your troubles than a midnight flight and a despairingly defiant note on the pincushion."

"I didn't," she said; "I put it on the mantelpiece. Please go. I decline to discuss anything with you."

"Ah, don't!" he said. "I knew you must be a very romantic person or you wouldn't be here—and I knew you must be rather—well, rather young—or you wouldn't have fallen in love with Harry. But I did not think, after the brave and practical manner in which you kept your appointment, I did not think that you'd try to behave like the heroine of a family novelette. Come: sit down on this heap of stones; there's nobody about. There's a light in your house now. You can't go back yet. Here, let me put my Inverness round you. Keep it up round your chin and then if any one sees you they won't know who you are. I can't leave you alone here. You know what a lot of robberies there have been in the neighborhood lately; there may be rough characters about. Come, now, let's think what's to be done. You know you can't get back unless I help you."

"I don't want you to help me; and I won't go back," she said.

But she sat down and pulled the cloak up around her face.

"Now," he said, "as I understand the case—it's this. You live rather a dull life with two tyrannical aunts—and the passion for romance."

"They're not tyrannical—only one's always ill and the other's always nursing her. She makes her get up and read to her in the night. That's her light you saw."
